ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. I.

EVERY periodical writer has, I believe, experienced the difficulty of fixing upon an appropriate title for his work: it has been expressed by many, it has been felt by more. In the present day, this difficulty is experienced in a tenfold degree, for so numerous has been the tribe of adventurers in this department of literature, that almost every name, expressive of the character or the writings of a desultory essayist, has been anticipated. What a variety of appellations has been assumed, from the Tatler of Isaac Bickerstaff, Esq. down to the Port Folio of Oliver Oldschool, Esq.!

Under these circumstances, the attempt to invent a name for my paper, which should be perfectly original, was utterly repugnant with my love of ease; my only difficulty was, to discover a title among the fugitive writers of Great-Britain, which would best suit my habits and dispositions, and I could then easily appropriate it, by the addition of the epithet American. With a rapid glance, I reviewed the catalogue, and found objections to almost every name which had been assumed. The airy levity which seemed connected with that of the "Tatler," would have suited me tolerably well; but I have, for some time, endeavoured, and I flatter myself, not wholly without success, to form myself upon the model of some of the fashionably nonchalant characters, which may be met with in some modern novels. Besides, with all submission to the superior knowledge of Isaac Bickerstaff, the title seems so appropriate to the fairer part of the creation, that I was afraid of being supposed, in this revolutionary age, to be actuated by a wish of encroaching upon one of the inalienable and imprescriptible rights of woman.

The Spectator, I was informed, had been already adopted; the Guardian conveyed unpleasant sensations to my mind, as more than four months must elapse, before I shall be emancipated from the controul of an unpolished being, who, under that appellation, has presumed to curtail many of my elegant expenses. To the "Rambler" I objected, because, to adopt the style of the author himself, it "savoured of loco-motion." The "Idler" I had almost determined to adopt; but I was terrified by observing, that his very idleness is instructive; and, independently of the opinion so justly and universally entertained, that the world cannot be mended or instructed, I am the last person in the world that would be impertinent enough to undertake such a task. But, not to detain my readers, by a minute exposition of my motives for rejecting all other appellations, I was at length determined to adopt the title of the American Lounger, by remarking its coincidence with my disposition, my habits, and my name.

Thus much for the appellation which I have adopted: I shall now follow the example of many of my predecessors, in giving an account of myself, and of my qualifications; and, "upon that favourite topic, on which the dull can expatiate with brilliancy, and the sterile with copiousness," I shall be as brief as possible.

With respect to my personal appearance, I may remark, that I have overheard more than one young lady, in a half whisper, acknowledge, that I had "most elegant eyes." With this remark, I have been, hitherto, not a little gratified, 'till the unlucky appearance of an essay in the 49th number of the Port Folio, with the signature of Restorator, very much abated my self-complacency. As the author observes, that this epithet is occasionally applied to a piece of beef, to a peach, and to many other articles, equally differing in their natures from each other, I must acknowledge, that I have been rather puzzled ever since, to form a definite idea of what the dear creatures mean. I could also repeat many soothing observations upon the elegance of my person and dress, were it not for the ambiguity already mentioned. I can assure my female readers, that my attention to the latter circumstance costs me nearly as much time as the duties of their toilet, especially since the happy introduction of wigs saves them the two hours, heretofore appropriated to the hair-dresser. Not that I would have them imagine, that my person is attired with studied nicety; on the contrary, I can honestly say, that it always takes me some time, to give that careless air to my habiliments, which is suitable to the character of a loungeur.

With respect to my qualifications, I may observe, that I am a most acceptable visitant at tea-parties; for I have something pretty to say, to each of the fair assembly, and talk sentiment with an interesting simper. I hand a young lady to and from the piano-forte, with an easy air, and applaud her execution, although I can hardly distinguish between the much admired air of "The Cottager's Daughter," and "Go to the Devil and shake Yourself." Add to this, that I always go to the assembly, and to all private dancing parties, to which I am invited; although, in compliance with the example of many of my ingenious brother loungeurs, I soon profess myself tired of dancing. I frequent the theatre pretty constantly, not to attend to the play, but to join a knot of ingenious young friends, in parading the lobby, with as much noise as possible, talking loud, laughing at the most serious passages in tragedy, and abashing the performers. These traits in my character, will, I trust, establish my claim to the appellation which I have assumed; yet, I must candidly own, that, without assistance from correspondents, the American Lounger will boast but a short existence. From professed indolence, much cannot be expected; but, if each of my worthy brethren, and I may add sisters also, in this city, will only contribute one letter each, upon some fugitive topic, I am confident, that my existence will be more protracted than even that of the Spectator of Great-Britain; and I should not be at all surprised to read, ten years hence, the American Lounger, No. 500.

The plan, therefore, that I propose to myself in this paper, is to take an occasional glance, in which I hope, that I shall be assisted by the friendship of correspondents, at the fleeting topics and manners of the day. It will be, particularly, an object with me, to attract the attention of the fair; and I am not without hopes of assistance, from the pen of many an ingenious female. Their communications would always be received with particular pleasure, and meet with particular attention. I can assure my readers, that I am very good-humoured, and that personal satire, or private malevolence, shall never pollute these papers. Should I be occasionally detected in addressing letters to myself, I may plead the example of preceding writers, and remark, that none can so completely trace all the beauties of a composition, as the writer himself. Should I occasionally draw a character, whether male or female, I would humbly warn any person from appropriating it. It may be ten to one that I may never have heard of persons, the lineaments of whose characters may, nevertheless, be supposed to be traced, with an exactness almost equal to that, with which Stuart would copy their features. I could enlarge upon this subject; but Dr. Smollett has treated it in so admirable a way, and illustrated it so happily, in his prefatory apologue to Roderic Random, that I shall, without further ceremony, conclude my introductory paper, with referring my readers to the perusal of it.

* * Those of our friends, who may be disposed to correspond with SAM SAUNTER, are requested to address their communications to the Editor of the Port Folio, as usual; but to prefix to their contributions the words "For the American Lounger."

REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

"Reports of Cases, adjudged in the Circuit Court of the United States, for the third Circuit. By JOHN D. WALLACE. Octavo, pp. 146, Philadelphia: published by Asbury Dickins, S. C. Ustick, printer, 1801."

THE industrious reporter of these cases has, with a very laudable ambition, chosen to commence his professional career, by a history of law cases and decisions, in a tribunal, distinguished for the learning of its officers, and the purity of its justice. It is but too common for young men of genius, destined for the profession of the law, to consider their legal noviciate in a barrister's office, but a genteel retreat for indolence, and who have no object more legitimate, than to while away their awkward hours, in "a calm, middle state of mental and moral inactivity."

The number of those, who have substituted poetry for special pleading, swells the catalogue of British biography; and POPE, with no exaggeration of satire, lampoons that class of lawless loiterers,

"Who study Shakspeare—at the inn of court."

With this species of indifference to black letter reading, and professional cares, Mr. Wallace appears to be in no wise chargeable. Without neglecting or contemning polite literature, he has judiciously given his most eager attention to BLACKSTONE; and the good fruits of his diligence and perseverance, appear abundantly in the volume before us.

As we think our reporter's preface is vigorously written, and as its neatness and perspicuity of phrase gives us the assurance that Mr. Wallace has mingled classical with law books, we transcribe it with much pleasure. It will convey, moreover, a very luminous idea of the nature of his design, of the "disadvantages" attendant on his task, of his anxiety for the present, and his hope for the future.

PREFACE.

"BY those who are conversant with subjects of municipal jurisprudence, the design of publishing memorials of adjudged cases in the circuit court of the United States, for the third circuit, will, no doubt, be received with approbation.

"Questions on the constitution and laws of the United States, on general commercial law, and the law of nations, must furnish a series of decisions, highly valuable to every juridical officer, and of great importance to the community; and such are the questions which will principally occupy the attention of this court.

"It is only for the execution of the task, that I feel anxiety. I am no ways satisfied that this first essay will be thought to augur favourably of the reporter. It may serve, however, to soften the rigour of judgment, to know that it has been made under considerable disadvantages, which will not attend upon future efforts: and if, in these circumstances, the present publication should meet with patronage, I shall feel encouraged to proceed, in the hope of arriving much nearer to the point of merit.

"The state of each case will, I think, be found to be accurately given; and the opinion of the court, generally, in the words in which it was delivered; with only such slight departures, in mere phraseology, as to create no variation in the sense. It does not come within the power of any one but the stenographer, to exhibit a copy of an oral discourse, that shall, in every particular, comport with the original. Where the opinions were written, I have been favoured by the judges, with leave to take copies. As to the arguments of counsel, from their nature, they require much compression: where several are concerned, the arguments of all on each side, must be thrown together. In doing this, much of the spirit, and many of the beauties of an eloquent debate will be lost. I have to lament, that it is not within the compass of such compilations, to do justice to the great abilities, which are conspicuous at the bar of the court, in which these cases were decided. All that I can profess to have given on this head, is a correct state of the points made by the counsel, and the substance of the arguments on each side. It may be thought, that I sometimes give to the arguments, a cast rather more forensic than is usual in the modern style of reporting; and that I too frequently introduce, into the principal report, colloquial and incidental matter. I am not conscious, however, of having indulged this too far; and, where I have yielded to it, I promise myself, it will be found to answer some useful purpose; and to present, if not so much of symmetry, at least a more natural exhibition of the case.

"I have only to add, that, in the outset of a great national judicature, it appeared to me proper, not only to record the more solemn sentences of the law, but also to preserve rules of practice, and the course of proceeding. In courts long established, and where the practical forms and principles are well understood, or may be traced to digested systems, the preservation of these incidental cases of a discretionary kind, would not be so important. But, in this court, which must, in some measure, originate a code of practice, points of that nature, when settled, become of considerable consequence.

"Should my design be approved, I purpose to continue a report of the adjudged cases in the third circuit.

"Philadelphia, October 1st, 1801."

Mr. Wallace's motto to his book, though, at first, it may appear a circumstance, not of sufficient consequence to justify a particular memorial, yet deserves quotation, for its aptness and propriety. It is from CICERO, and declares a salutary and an eternal truth.

"Optimum est MAJORUM sequi vestigia."

The judges of the court, in which these "cases" were "adjudged," are the Honourable William Tilghman, of Pennsylvania, chief judge, Honourable Richard Basset, of Delaware,

Honourable William Griffith, of New-Jersey.

The cases reported are, Hammond's lessee against Haws—Penn against Butler—The United States against Duane—the same against King—the same against Moore—Echeveria against Nairac —Ferrer against the same—Duncan against Koch—Hollingsworth against Duane—the same against the same—Bentaloe against Pratt—Cowan against Magauran—Hollingsworth against Duane—Knox and Co. against Greenleaf—Bowerbank against Morris—the United States against Wayne—Boudinot against Symmes—and Hollingsworth against Duane.

It is worthy of an incidental remark, that, in a brief period, no less than five of these reported cases are those, in which the editor of the Aurora was a party. Law herself seems to hold to this partizan, the language of ULYSSES,

"Peace, factious monster! born to vex the state!"

It is evident, from the fidelity and precision of these reports, that Mr. WALLACE is not neglected by those, whose juridical skill and experience may give sanction and currency to his work. To those, who delight in the progress of enterprise, and the advancement of industry, no less than to law students and practitioners, it will be pleasing to learn, that Mr. WALLACE determines to persevere. His work, modest and humble in its pretensions, may soon reach a "high and palmy state;" and, we doubt not, that future purchasers will have occasion to remember, and apply the "crescit eundo" of Virgil.

We cannot conclude this article more advantageously to Mr. WALLACE, than by transcribing the following passage, from a very ingenious critique, originally published in that respectable journal, "The Gazette of the United States."

"The portrait of the cause is, in every case, just to the counsel, honorary to the court, and, as far as can come within the knowledge of a few individuals, perfectly true throughout; and when, in the report, the state of the case, the argument, and the judgment, have these merits, the reporter cannot want the aid of apology. The style of reporting is essentially the same as that of Durnford and East; and the collateral digest of the whole case, which Mr. Wallace has given in the beginning or course of the report, answers many purposes that an index cannot always subserve, while it furnishes, for a common-place book, the point of the cause already dressed. Many of the reports, particularly those of Cowan vs. Magauran, the United States vs. King, and Hollingsworth vs. Duane, are exhibited with singular perspicuity; and cannot but determine the readers to extend that encouragement to Mr. Wallace, which will insure a continuation of the work."

POLITICS.

[Many have complained that, in our last volume, too small a share of our attention was given to POLITICS. As we have enlarged the Port Folio, we shall often render it a magazine of political disquisition, obtained from principals, or derived from the leading papers of the country. We resume, this week, the New-York exposition of the political imbecility of the president of the United States.]

NUMBER II.

The next most prominent feature in the message, is the proposal to abandon at once all the internal revenue of the country. The motives avowed for this astonishing scheme, are, that "there is reasonable ground of confidence that this part of the revenue may now be safely dispensed with...that the remaining sources will be sufficient to provide for the support of government, to pay the interest of the public debt, and to discharge the principal in shorter periods, than the laws or the general expectation had contemplated...and that, though wars and untoward events might change this prospect of things, and call for expenses, which the impost could not meet...yet that sound principles would not justify our taxing the industry of our fellow citizens, to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen, but from the temptations offered by that treasure."

If we allow these to be more than ostensible motives, we shall be driven to ascribe this conduct to a deficiency of intellect, and to an ignorance of our financial arrangements, greater than could have been suspected: if but ostensible, it is then impossible to trace the suggestion to any other source, than the culpable desire of gaining or securing popularity, at an immediate expense of public utility, equivalent, on a pecuniary scale, to a million of dollars annually; and at the greater expense of a very serious innovation of our system of public credit.

That these, at least, are the certain consequences of the measure, shall be demonstrated by arguments, which are believed to be unanswerable.

To do this the more effectually, it is necessary to premise, that some of the revenues, now proposed to be relinquished, are, with every solemnity of law, pledged for paying the interest and redeeming the principal of our public debt, foreign and domestic. As to the interest, and such parts of the principal, as, by the original constitution of the debt, are payable by annual instalments, the appropriation is absolute. As to the residue, it is qualified. On the third of March, 1795, was passed an act of congress, which forms a main pillar in the fabric of our public credit...which, maturing and perfecting the establishment of a sinking fund, endeavours, with peculiar solicitude, to render it adequate, effectual, and inviolable. By the eighth section of this act, it is provided, "That all surpluses of the revenue, which shall remain at the end of any year, and which, at the next session of congress, shall not be otherwise appropriated or reserved by law, shall, ipso facto, become a part of the sinking fund." This fund, by other provisions of the same act, is vested in commissioners, in trust, to be applied to the redemption of the debt, by reimbursement or by purchase, until the whole shall be extinguished: and the faith of the United States is expressly engaged, that the monies, which are to constitute the fund, shall inviolably remain so appropriated and vested, until the redemption of the debt shall be completely effected.

The simple statement of these provisions goes far to confirm the character, which we have given to the proposition. But a distinct examination of the reasons, by which it is supported, will, when taken in connexion with those provisions, place beyond doubt, its absurd and pernicious tendency.

The first inducement offered for relinquishing the internal revenue, is a reasonable ground of confidence that it may safely be dispensed with.

When it is considered that we are in the very crisis of an important change of situation; passing from a state, in which neutrality had procured to our commerce, and to the revenue depending on it, a great artificial increase...with good reason to look for a diminution, and without satisfactory data, to enable us to fix the extent of this diminution: can any thing be more rash, more empirical, than voluntarily to abandon a valuable and growing branch of income, of which we are already in possession? Can it be said, that merely "a reasonable ground of confidence" is a sufficient warrant for so important a surrender? Surely we ought to have been told, that there was at least a moral certainty of the fact. But even this would not have been deemed enough by a prudent statesman. Nothing less than experimental certainty ought to have been relied upon. There was no pressure of circumstances making it proper to precipitate the measure. It would have been ridiculous to pretend that the burden is so heavy as to demand immediate relief, and, without this incentive to relinquishment experience ought undoubtedly to have been taken, as the only fit and sure guide.

Not only is it problematical what the present duties on imposts, will, for succeeding years, produce; but it is in a degree questionable, whether it may not be found necessary to reduce the rates. That they are now high, when compared with the commercial capital of our country, is not to be denied, and whether they may not be found too high for a beneficial course of our trade, is yet to be decided by experiment. The latter augmentations of the rates of duty, were made at times, and under circumstances, in the situations of this and other countries, which forbid us to regard past experience as conclusive on the point.

Should it be said, in answer, that the revenues can hereafter be renewed, if, on trial, it shall be found that they have been prematurely abandoned, the decisive reply is, that this is to invert the natural order of just reasoning. Were it now the question, whether such revenues should be created, in anticipation of a possible deficiency, the correct answer would be, let experiment first ascertain the necessity: as they already exist, on a question to abolish them, the answer equally ought to be, let experience first shew them to be unnecessary.

But how can they be unnecessary? Let us grant that the remaining sources will be equal to the purposes enumerated in the message, does it follow that it will not still be wise to retain the internal revenue? Is it not desirable that government should have it in its power to discharge the debt faster than may have been contemplated? Is not this a felicity in our situation, which ought to be improved? A precious item in the public fortune, which ought not rashly to be squandered? But it is not even true that the laws have exclusively contemplated a definite period, for the ultimate redemption of the entire debt. They have only made a determinate provision for its extinguishment, at all events, within a given term of years: but, anxious to shorten the period, they, in the clause, which has been quoted, respecting the surpluses of revenue, have made an auxiliary provision for the purpose of abridging that term. The message, while it goes to impair the efficacy of the principal provision, proposes formally to renounce the auxiliary, and thus to disappoint the provident care of the laws to accelerate the discharge of the debt.

How reconcileable is this with the wanton and unjust clamours heretofore vented against those, who projected and established our present system of public credit; charging them with a design to perpetuate the debt, under the pretext that a public debt was a public blessing! It is not to be forgotten, that in these clamours Mr. Jefferson liberally participated! Now, it seems, the tone is entirely changed. The past administrations, who had so long been calumniated by the imputation of that pernicious design, are, of a sudden, discovered to have done too much for the speedy discharge of the debt, and its duration is to be prolonged, by throwing away a part of the fund destined for its prompt redemption.... Wonderful union of consistency and wisdom!

Before we yield our approbation to the proposal, we ought to have a guarantee for the continuance of our peace, long enough to give effect to the leisurely operation of that residue of the fund, which it is intended to retain: else war, which never fails to bring with it an accumulation of debt, may intervene, and we may then rapidly hasten to that period, when the exigencies of government may render it necessary to appropriate too large a portion of the earnings of labour. To guard against so unfortunate a result, towards which there is always too great a tendency, in the affairs of nations, our past administrations have evinced a deep foresight, and exercised a truly patriotic care. Unhappy will it be, if any succeeding projector shall be permitted to frustrate their salutary plan.

It has been seen that the message anticipates, and attempts to answer objections to the dereliction of revenue: the answer is, that "sound principles will not permit us to tax the industry of our citizens, to accumulate treasure for wars to happen we know not when, and which might not perhaps happen, but for the temptations offered by that treasure." Unless, however, the accumulation of treasure be the necessary consequence of retaining the revenue, this argument is evidently futile. But the president had only to open our statute book to learn, that this consequence is chimerical. All future surpluses of revenue, being already eventually appropriated to the discharge of the public debt, it follows, that, till the whole debt shall have been extinguished, there could be no accumulation of treasure....no spoil from that source, to tempt the rapacity of a greedy invader. Here we fix the charge of ignorance of our financial arrangements: to which there can be no alternative, but a deliberate design to delude the people. Between the two, let the worshippers of the idol make their option.

NUMBER III.

HAD our laws been less provident than they have been, yet must it give us a very humble idea of the talents of our president as a statesman, to find him embarrassed between an absolute abandonment of revenue, and an inconvenient accumulation of treasure. Pursuing the doctrine professed by his sect, that our public debt is a national curse, which cannot too promptly be removed, and adhering to the assurance*, which he has virtually given, that a sponge, the favourite instrument, shall not be employed for the purpose, how has it happened that he should have overlooked the simple and obvious expedient, of using the supposed excess of income, as a remedy for so great a mischief?

After all we have heard in times past, it would ill become either the head, or any member of the orthodox sect to contend, that a too rapid reimbursement of the debt might be attended with evils. In courtesy, however, this shall be supposed to be urged by some new convert, who has not entirely shaken off the prejudices of former modes of thinking; and it shall be examined, whether this argument will afford a justification of the measure recommended.

It shall not be denied, that the immediate payment of our whole debt, if practicable, would be likely to be injurious in various ways. It would, in the first instance, produce a money-plethora, if the phrase may be allowed, which experience has shown to be inauspicious to the energies, and especially to the morality and industry of a nation. The quick efflux of this money to pay a considerable part of the debt in the hands of foreigners; and to procure from abroad the means of gratifying an increased extravagance, would, after some time, substitute a too great vacuity to a too great fullness; leaving us to struggle with the bad habits incident to the latter state, and with the embarrassments of a defective circulation. To these, other reasons might be added, which, though equally just and solid, are omitted, as being more liable to dispute.

Though an extreme case is here presented, the immediate reimbursement of the entire debt; yet it must be admitted, that the same considerations are applicable, in a less degree, to a summary, or very rapid repayment, by large instalments. But the answer to all this is, that it would have been full time to adopt preliminary measures against evils from such a source, when experience had realized the danger. Till such time, it is certainly the highest wisdom to continue the employment of a fund, which is already provided, and without overburdening the people, for the all important purpose of exonerating the nation from debt, and of placing it in a condition, with competent resources to meet future contingencies, which may threaten its safety. On the other hand, is it not a mark of the highest improvidence and folly, to throw away an important part of this fund, on the mere speculation that it may possibly be superfluous?

But admitting it to be already ascertained, that the fund is greater than what is requisite to extinguish the debt, with convenient celerity; does it follow that the excess, if retained, must be suffered to accumulate, and that no different method could have been found to employ it, which would have been productive of adequate utility?

Whatever diversity of opinion there may be, with regard to military and naval preparation, for the defence and security of the country, there are some things, in which all well-informed and reflecting men unite. Arsenals, foundries, dock-yards and magazines, especially those containing materials for the construction and equipment of ships, so that, upon the breaking out of a war, there may be a sufficient supply of warlike implements, and of means for the speedy creation of a navy; are by all deemed eligible objects of public care. To provide for these objects, upon a competent, though moderate scale, will be attended with expense so considerable, as to leave nothing to spare from the amount of our present income. To persons unacquainted with the subject, the quantities of several articles on hand may appear ample; but, to good judges, there is hardly any one class of supplies, which will not be thought to require much augmentation. As far as a navy is concerned, the deficiency is palpable.

If dock-yards are to be established in earnest, they ought certainly to be well protected. For this purpose, fortifications of a substantial and durable nature, very different from the temporary shifts hitherto adopted, ought to be erected. And if the president will inquire into the cost of even these trifling constructions, in the instances where they have been managed with all practicable economy, he will become convinced, that the erection of proper works would call for an expenditure forbidding the supposition of a superfluity of revenue.

In addition to objects of national security, there are many purposes of great public utility, to which the revenues in question might be applied. The improvement of the communications between the different parts of our country, is an object well worthy of the national purse, and one, which would abundantly repay to labour the portion of its earnings, which may have been borrowed for that purpose. To provide roads and bridges, is within the direct purview of the constitution. In many parts of the country, especially in the Western Territory, a matter, in which the Atlantic states are equally interested, aqueducts and canals would also be fit subjects of pecuniary aid, from the general government. In France, England, and other parts of Europe, institutions exist supported by public contributions, which eminently promote agriculture and the arts: such institutions merit imitation by our government: they are of the number of those, which, directly and sensibly, recompense labour, for what it lends to their agency.

To suggestions of the last kind, the adepts of the new school have a ready answer: Industry will succeed and prosper, in proportion as it is left to the exertions of individual enterprise. This favourite dogma, when taken as a general rule, is true; but, as an exclusive one, it is false, and leads to error in the administration of public affairs. In matters of industry, human enterprise ought, doubtless, to be left free in the main, not fettered by too much regulation; but practical politicians know, that it may be beneficially stimulated, by prudent aids and encouragements on the part of the government. This is proved by numerous examples, too tedious to be cited: examples, which will be neglected only by indolent and temporising rulers, who love to loll in the lap of epicurean ease, and seem to imagine, that to govern well, is to amuse the wondering multitude with sagacious aphorisms and oracular sayings.

What has been observed, is sufficient to render it manifest, that, independent of the extinguishment of the debt, the revenues proposed to be yielded up, would find ample and very useful employment, for a variety of public purposes. Already in possession of so valuable a resource; having surmounted the difficulties, which, from the opinions and habits of our citizens, obstruct, in this, more than in any other country, every new provision for adding to our public income; certainly without a colourable pretence for there being a grievous or undue pressure on the community.... how foolish will it be to resign the boon, perhaps in a short time to be compelled again to resort to it; and, for that purpose, to hazard a repetition of the obstacles, which have been before encountered and overcome; which, however, gave birth to one insurrection, and may give birth to another? Infatuated must be the councils, from which so injurious a project has proceeded!

But admitting the position, that there is an excess of income, which ought to be relinquished, still the proposal to surrender the internal revenue is impolitic. It ought to be carefully preserved, as not being exposed to the casualties, incident to our intercourse with foreign nations, and therefore the most certain.... It ought to be preserved, as reaching to descriptions of persons, who are not proportionably affected by the impost, and as tending for this reason, to distribute the public burden more equitably..... It ought to be preserved, because, if revenue can really be spared, it is best to do it in such a manner, as will conduce to the relief or advancement of our navigation and commerce. Rather let the tonnage duty on American vessels be abolished, and let the duties be lessened on some particular articles, on which they may press with inconvenient weight. Let not the merchant be provoked to attempt to evade the duties, by the sentiment, that his case or interest is disregarded, and that his capital alone is to be elogged and encumbered by the demands of the treasury.

But who and what are the merchants, when compared with the patriotic votaries of whisky in Pennsylvania and Virginia?

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

[From the city of Washington, we have just received a very interesting pamphlet, intended to expose the enormous evils, which will ensue from the abolition of the present judiciary system. It is our duty to reprint this admirable argument. It will be concluded in an extra Port Folio, which will be published on an early day of the ensuing week.]

A FRIEND TO THE CONSTITUTION.

No. I.

To an American, who loves his country, and its present happy frame of government, and ascribes to that frame of government much of the positive good we possess, as well as our escape from those ills, which have, for years, afflicted a large portion of the human race.... who looks to the same source for the surest guaranty of future prosperity, and counts upon it as that from which, if preserved in its purity, the same blessings will flow for his posterity, which have been so amply enjoyed by himself.... any premeditated attack upon the constitution of the United States, which shall endanger its vital principles, and render it less capable of protecting public liberty, and of affording safety to individuals, must cause the most serious alarm. That the great mass of my fellow citizens are of this description, and are truly solicitous to preserve unimpaired, that wise, and, hitherto, beneficial system of civil policy, which now prevails in America, I will not permit myself to doubt. If they can be seduced into measures, which assail the fundamentals of the constitution, and radically change its essential parts, I am persuaded that such melancholy deviations into error must be attributable rather to the fallibility of the human mind, than to an intentional abandonment of principles, it is alike their duty and their interest to maintain. Unfortunately for the happiness and liberty of man, the warmth of discussion in popular governments, produces a zeal, and too often a malignity in party, peculiarly calculated to favour and produce these deviations. Under their influence, so unpropitious to the exercise of judgment, or the dominion of reason, we overlook the prostration of the most sacred principles, provided our political antagonists be prostrated with them. In the triumph of victory, we forget that we are triumphing over the constitution of our country; and, while we speak only of eradicating mischiefs, against which we have been in habits of declaiming, we not unfrequently establish precedents, fatal to the choicest institutions of society.

It is then in the first moments of success, that the honest men of a party, for such there are in all parties, ought to distrust themselves, and examine, with cautious attention, their own measures. That spirit of party, which generally animates an opposition, is no longer allowable, when, ceasing to be a mere opposition, it has become the government of the country, and has acquired the power of dictating the measures of the nation. While new in this opposition, and yet under the influence of those irritations experienced in acquiring it, there is much danger of being still actuated by the spirit of revenge, rather than that of a liberal policy; by the spirit of party, rather than that of the nation. To guard against this danger, which, in republics, has often produced such serious calamities, which has seldom been more imminent, than in the present moment, all those who love real liberty ought, unmindful of former distinctions or animosities, to rally together, round the standard of the constitution, and form one indissoluble band for its protection.

To prove that the times require this virtuous effort, and that the constitution of our country is in danger, needs no other evidence, than the openly avowed plan, formed by persons, high in the new ministerial party, to annihilate the independence of the judiciary of the United States.

If any one political truth has been demonstrated by unvarying experience, it is, that life and property can only be secured under a system of government, in which the judges are withdrawn from that influence, which results from dependence on the will of others, for the continuance in office. There is no proposition, on which the best political writers have more generally concurred, than on this. There is none, on which the judgment of America appears to have been more completely formed. There is none, which the constitution of our country seems to have more cautiously guarded.

How daring, how criminally daring then must be that hand, which can pollute the sacred page containing this principle, so replete with human happiness, so admired by the wise and virtuous of all nations, so approved by the sober judgment of America.... and blot it forever from our code of fundamental law! How completely must the spirit of party, instead of that of the nation, predominate, if such measures can prevail! How entirely must the spirit of revenge have supplanted that of patriotism, if matured opinions, founded on the solid base of experience, are to be abandoned forever, in order to serve the malignant purpose of the moment! How unsafe, how miserably unsafe, must be every other principle of the constitution, if one so important to our happiness, and so strongly fenced in by express provision, in the great charter we profess to reverence, can be offered up a sacrifice to resentments, which ought never to have been felt!

I believe I need not fear contradiction, when I say, that had the dependence of the judiciary been suggested in the convention of sages, which formed our constitution, no member could have been found, who would not with all his powers have reprobated a principle, which puts into hazard the first objects, for which men enter into society, by leaving their persons and their property insecure. In that day of genuine patriotism, when party had not yet unfolded its powers, when faction had not yet erected its crest: when the only effort, without view to men, was to establish wise and correct principles, no man could have been found departing so far from the theories of the statesman, the lessons of experience, and the opinions of his country, as to have maintained the political heresy, that judges ought to depend on the legislature for their continuance in office.

Had such a doctrine stolen into the constitution, offered to the states for their acceptance, we need only examine the several governments they have framed for themselves, to determine what would have been its fate. We cannot doubt but that so pernicious a principle would have been universally execrated; the opponents of the constitution would, throughout our continent, have taken this strong ground: from every quarter of the union, the danger, to which liberty would be exposed, from an enslaved judiciary, would have resounded in our ears: and not all the necessity, not all the other excellencies of that instrument, could have saved it from rejection. For this I appeal to the opinions then entertained by those, who acted either in the general or state conventions, and conjure them by the sacred flame of patriotism, which then glowed in their bosoms, and which cannot yet be intirely extinguished, to examine well the causes, which have changed their opinions, before they yield to that change.

If, at any time before the late revolution in men, I hope not fatally in measures, the abstract proposition, unapplied to particular characters, of creating a dependent judiciary, had been made to the people of America, who would have been found to support it? Who would not, with all his powers, have reprobated a doctrine so fraught with baneful consequences, so surcharged with danger to the dearest rights of man? If the first or second administration could have so deviated from their principles, as to have countenanced such a measure, how would it have been received by those, who, under a third administration, are themselves its patrons? Let their efforts to agitate the public mind on the mission of Mr. Jay answer this question.

What can have produced this ominous change? The very men, who then affected to tremble for the independence of the judiciary, because a judge might be bribed by being appointed to a temporary employment, without emolument, who affected to tremble for the constitution, because a judge entered on the performance of duties he was not forbidden to discharge: now boldly and openly support a measure, which totally prostrates that independence, by making the office dependent on the will of the legislature, and at the same time inflicts a vital wound on the constitution, which explicitly declares the tenure of the judicial office to be during good behaviour.

These things require the serious consideration, not only of the wise and good, but of all those, who, from any motives whatever, wish to perpetuate to themselves and their posterity, the blessings of civil liberty.

The subject will be more closely examined in a succeeding number.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The success of the elegant poems, which have appeared, under the title of The Pleasures of Hope, and The Pleasures of Memory, seems to have encouraged the attempt of an author (Mr. P. Courtier), who has lately published a little volume, called The Pleasures of Solitude. From a perusal of his work, we cannot assign to him so honourable a station in the temple of Fame, as that already occupied by his celebrated predecessors, Rogers and Campbell. He has adopted, in his poem, the stanza of Spenser, a measure which is now read with far less pleasure than the common heroic line, which fatigues, with the repetition of the same sound, and which, we think, has been successfully adopted by two authors only, in modern times, Beattie, in his exquisite poem of The Minstrel, and Sotheby, in his animated translation of Wieland's Oberon. We have not forgotten The School-mistress of Shenstone; but, as this is a perfect imitation, and does not extend to any considerable length, it scarcely constitutes an exception to the remark.

The poem of The Pleasures of Solitude is in three books. We shall transcribe the arguments, as these will give the most adequate idea of the plan of the author.

ARGUMENT OF BOOK I.

Introduction—General design of the Poem—Some effects of Solitude—Nature, Fancy, Solitude—Lord Bacon's observation on the subject of the Poem—Whom Solitude delights—Expostulations with those inimical to Solitude—Distinction between Solitude, as it applies to the virtuous, and as it is apprehended by the dissipated—Conclusion of book the first.

ARGUMENT OF BOOK II.

Solitude promotes Gratitude and Friendship—The concentration and fixedness of the Affections, arising in Solitude, necessary to their strength—Utility of partial feelings—Strictures on Philosophical Universalists—Nature invariable: the Happiness resulting from this order—Solitude soothes the mind, often supplies the want of social resources; it aids the moral feelings, and calms the Passions—Different effects of similar objects, as varied by circumstance: exemplifications of this truth—Conclusion of Book II. that we are indebted to Solitude even for the gratifications which we experience from public Pleasures.

ARGUMENT OF BOOK III.

Nature of Book III—Retrospective thoughts—Youth the happier state—Solitude as it affects Childhood; as it tends to assuage the troubles of maturer life—Affliction—Fame—Solitude by no means local—Improvement—Solitude highly conducive to Piety—Conclusion of the Poem.

In the execution of his plan, the author has been occasionally, but by no means uniformly, successful. The first stanza has a degree of obscurity which is unpleasant.

Some best mad dissonance shall entertain,
In these is tumult or ambition rife;
Other such passions view with sweet disdain,
They love the insipidities of life;
Again, there are whom both its ceaseless strife
And idle vacancies alike disgust;
And some who hourly dread assassin's knife;
For ever struggling in the toil unjust,
These hate the eye of man, and mourn beneath the dust

The second is far more happy.

No exile I, from social converse driven,
Who sing of Nature, Fancy, Solitude;
No surly misanthrope, to whom is given
To shroud where sympathies dare not intrude.
Though I, alas! have borne the buffet rude,
Have dregged the chalice, brimming with deceit,
And known of fortune in her darkest mood;
I from the world but ask some kind retreat,
Where storms remotely frown, and billows vainly beat.

Of the following three stanzas, the first is harsh, but the second and third contain a well-drawn picture.

His was a dogma specious, but confined,
Who of retirement this drear semblance drew
The man secluded, either, far refined,
Claims kin with angel, or, to that vile crew,
Ycleped satanic, must belong; a view
Unworthy this of one, whom vulgar lore
Vainly resisted.....Bacon, who, still true
To science, dared the path untrod before,
And sought, with untired steps, its limits to explore.

Sure, 'twas not Solitude the sage portrayed,
But gloomy banishment to wilds forlorn;
Not the calm breezes of the rural shade:
But sullen thought, in love and madness born;
The sad resolves of him, from whom are torn Life's opening dreams, who hates even human kind;
For whom no carols wake the merry morn;
Nor suits there aught the aspect of whose mind,
Save the dark gathering skies, and rough and howling wind.

And, at such time, O see! by frenzy sped,
The melancholy man yon summit gain,
To the bleak tempest bare his burning head,
Then, like the tempest, scowl upon the plain.
Ah! not to him those kindly pains pertain,
Which heal and harmonize, and renovate;
Known only these to that high-favoured train,
Who, while by nature touch'd, their souls dilate,
Can speed the hour with bliss, and smile at frowning fate.

We occasionally trace a coincidence of thought between Mr. Courtier, and the elegant author of the Task, in the favourable effects of solitude upon the heart. The following stanzas, which represent it as highly conducive to piety, conclude the poem:

In secret best the humble soul may rise,
As grateful incense, to the Eternal Power!
Winging its way above yon passing skies,
To Him, who loves the world-excluded hour.
'Tis now, that streams of heavenly radiance shower
On the misguided thought; now, that the ways
Of chequered Providence no longer lower;
Now that the enlightened eye can firmly gaze
Beyond the precincts drear of this benighted maze.

And whether Spring descend in vesture bright,
Or Summer wanton in a thousand hues,
Or Autumn cast around a mellowing light,
Or leafless Winter moral truth infuse;
Whether in nature's various path we muse,
Or lonely pause amid the city's roar;
Be it in youth or age; the mind pursues
That, which alone shall halcyon smiles restore,
The solitary haunt by foe unharassed more!

Upon the whole, we have perused this poem with some pleasure. The author appears to be a sincere friend to the cause of religion and morality, and though he has sometimes sketched the world in colours of too dark a hue, he uniformly evinces a benevolent design to advance the best interests of his fellow-creatures.

MUSICAL REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In our former articles, under this head, we have principally confined our attention to foreign publications; we shall now cheerfully notice a work of this class, which is edited in our own city. The third volume of Mr. Carr's Musical Journal has just commenced; and the three numbers of it, which are already published, give fair promise of the merit which it will be found to possess, when completed. In the vocal section, two numbers have appeared. The first commences with the "Exile of Erin," composed by Mr. Carr; the music of which expresses, with his usual success, the spirit and pathos of a ballad, possess of unusual poetical merit. The scientific hearer will admire, and the common one will applaud, the felicity of the transition into the major key, in the fifth line of each stanza, the return to the minor in the last, and the abrupt singularity of its close. This is succeeded by a pleasing melody of Mazzinghi's, introduced in the comedy of Life; and the number concludes with a canzonet by Hook, which may be numbered among the more happy efforts of one, who, in our opinion, has composed too much for his reputation. The second contains a charming little ballad, called "The Sails are Bent," the song with which Mrs. Merry enchanted us in the Wedding in Wales; the animated and cheerful melody of "Each coming Day," sung by Mrs. Jones in Il Bondocani; and a ballad, called "Lady Alice," which we remember to have perused with pleasure, among Percy's Reliques of Ancient English Poetry. If the music of this ballad be modern, we must admire the felicity with which it has been adapted; but we rather suspect it to be an ancient melody harmonized.

Of the instrumental section, one number only has appeared, containing a waltz, by Clementi; which will be an acceptable exercise for the young performer, during the present rage for dances of that description.

Mr. Shaw has issued proposals for a volume of Sacred Music. We wish him success in his undertaking; for we are the decided votaries of the old school in that science. Our ears are soon satisfied with the general run of modern compositions; but we can always listen, with fresh delight, to the impressive combinations of those "mighty magicians of harmony," who are emphatically called "the old masters."

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A new musical instrument has lately been invented at Paris, by an ingenious German. It is called The Harmonicon. It is of a round form, about a foot and a half in diameter, hollow in the middle, and the distance between the two ends about three or four inches. In the upper end, or top, a number of metal bodkins are inserted, from the length of an inch, to seven or eight inches, in progressive proportion. With these are connected a number of brass wires, like those of a piano-forte, and which cover the surface of that end. The instrument is played with a common fiddle-stick. When skilfully touched, it produces the most agreeable sounds, and very similar to the musical glasses. The music is very sweet.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The London satyr is continually making himself and his readers merry, by sarcasm or declamation against face painting. But we reverently presume, that in Philadelphia, the pure and the pious, where no cheeks are crimsoned but by modest suffusion, or the glow of christian charity, there cannot be the least foundation for the subsequent charge.

In this enlightened age, the visage that time had tintured with a philomet hue, now assumes the mellow blush of Hebe. Circassia sends her bloom to animate the face of American beauty; exotic blushes are imported, as superior to those suffusions, formerly celebrated by our poets; and art, wonder-working art, is the creator of fashionable beauty. Hoary locks and wrinkles are banished, and washes, which render the ladies "ever fair and ever young," may be obtained for gold.

These irresistible arms of the ladies are chiefly compounded of ingenious chymical preparations. Mercury, that conqueror of the sons of pleasure, and lead, that destroyer of heroes, form the principal ingredients, with which some of our painted dolls so plentifully lacker their skin. Ah! spare us, ye fascinating matrons, and ever-blooming virgins, nor thus encase yourselves in a coat of mail, that, at once, allures and destroys.

THE FINE ARTS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THIS article is derived, in substance, from a foreign journal. We are induced to insert it, not merely because it describes a beautiful copy from a lovely original, but because it contains a narrative of very extraordinary peculiarities in the human form.

The portrait of Miss Hervey, or, as she is technically termed, The beautiful Nyctalope.

The original, from whom this picture has been painted and engraved, by J. R. Smith, engraver to his royal highness the prince of Wales, was publicly exhibited in the course of the year 1800, in Piccadilly. She was 19 years old, of a very elegant form, her eyes of a sparkling red, and her hair, which was of great length, of unparalleled whiteness and silken texture. Her countenance was described to be remarkably interesting, and her complexion remarkably clear.

Of this lovely lady Mr. Smith has produced a very pleasing half-length portrait, which he has made fully correspondent to the above description, excepting that it displays something too much of en bon point for the original. The print is, of course, coloured to shew the natural peculiarities of the young lady.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

MRS. Shaw, a Welsh lady, lately bequeathed principal part of her property, amounting to 15,000*l.* to her house maid. The heir at law doubted the validity of the will, and endeavoured to prove that the deceased was in a complete state of intoxication, when she executed the deed. This allegation was not substantiated, and the fortunate house maid, of course, sweeps off the whole of the legacy.

Among the innumerable stories, related of Dr. Johnson, we believe the following has not been often repeated:....

He was once prevailed upon to listen attentively to a composition of Scarlatti's, at Mrs. Piozzi's. When it came to a period, all, but Johnson, exclaimed bravissimo, exquisitissimo, charmante, superbe, &c. Then "it was so beautifully chromatic, and so extremely difficult." The doctor replied, "I would to the Lord it had been impossible."

The witty author of "Symptoms of the Millennium," the new year's verses of the carrier of the "Connecticut Courant," thus apostrophizes this fortunate country:....

O, happy people, happy land,
What can thy bright career withstand!
When "labour's mouth" is cramm'd with bread,
When nought is tail, and all is head;
When taxes all are swept away,
And "LIVING CHEAT" the only play.

What stupid mortal's head can doubt,
The devil's time is almost out;
That Gog and Magog must retreat,
And own their troops are fairly beat;
And that our country soon will find
A FRENCH MILLENNIUM to her mind.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

AFTER some delay, the unavoidable result of new arrangements, No. 1, of the New Series of the Port Folio is submitted to the friends of the Editor, and of a magazine, conducted upon principles neither timid, versatile, nor complying. The brief history of its fortune may be boldly written. It is supported, and always will be supported by the liberality of the catholic, and the energy of the stedfast. It has been, and will be forsaken by many, either captious, or hostile. But neither a subscription, angrily withdrawn, nor the insolence of democratic dictation, will urge a disciple of the OLD SCHOOL to temporize; to court the populace, or tremble with the pusillanimous; to surrender up the manliness of sentiment; and forfeit the title of consistency; or, by a miserable process, to soften and dilute the ink of his press, till nothing but a weak and watery infusion remain, too indistinct to be looked at, either for brilliancy or use.

By the employment of a type entirely new, which, though small, is of a face beautiful and bold, we are enabled, without any augmentation of price, to give nearly two additional pages of letter press. Hence, the numbers of the Port Folio for a month greatly exceed, in quantity, the ordinary limits of a magazine, and we have the satisfaction, with Mr. Nichols, the conductor of a well-known literary journal, in London, "to give a great plenty of matter for a cheap consideration."

TO THE PUBLIC.

IN future, all epistolary applications or communications, for this paper, must be addressed, "To the Editor of the Port Folio, No. 25, North Second Street, Philadelphia," on whom the sole management of the concern has devolved.

Gentlemen of Philadelphia, inclined to take in this paper, will please to leave their names, address, and subscription money, with WILLIAM FRY, bookseller, No. 36, Chesnut street, by whom they will be regularly and punctually furnished with the Port Folio, to whom they will prefer any complaint of negligence, and by whom all mistakes in the delivery of the paper will be rectified. During the past year, the Editor was constantly chagrined by the carelessness of carriers, and the croak of complaint. His city subscribers may rest assured that they will be attended to with courtesy and diligence by Mr. Fry.

Gentlemen throughout the United States, and in British America; in England, or her colonial possessions, will please to apply to the Editor, No. 25, North Second-street, Philadelphia. Their orders and letters will be straightway answered.

No paper will be delivered in the city, nor transmitted to the country, without payment in advance.

As the publication of the paper has been delayed until to-day, we shall print two numbers the ensuing week. Fifty-two papers will be delivered, as usual, in the course of the year.

For the accommodation of the curious, who wish to please the eye, or the careful, who choose to bind their files, a few copies of the Port Folio will be printed on superfine paper, at six dollars, the annual subscription.

Our Theatrical review will be resumed next week. "The Drama" will receive a due share of our attention.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN OCCURRENCES.

—On the 29th of October, the KING met both houses of parliament, and opened the session with a speech. He congratulates the country upon her pacification with France, adverts to the adjustment with the Northern powers, and is of opinion that the essential rights of England are secured, and her substantial interests regarded, by the late pacific scheme of policy. In the house of Commons, in the debate on the answer to the speech, an animated discussion was maintained by Messrs. Addington, Pitt, Windham, Sheridan, and Fox. These gentlemen seemed to anticipate an opportunity to give their sentiments upon the peace, and, although the subject was not before the house, Mr. WINDHAM, in his usual bold and explicit language, expressed his strongest sentiments of disapprobation of the preliminaries. As this nervous speech is Anti-Gallican; as it is a war speech; as it is a wise one; as it is the honest idiom of an undaunted and prescient legislator; as it is exactly such a speech as EDMUND BURKE would applaud, and Dr. JOHNSON endure, it is proper to present to the public its bolder features. "Mr. Windham said he should have contented himself with giving a silent vote of approbation of the address, had it not happened that some things were dropped, which seemed to imply an approbation of the preliminaries of peace. His friend did not intend it so, but from what he said, he seemed to convey an idea, that all the members of the house approved of that measure; he was desirous to give no countenance to opinions, to which he did not assent. This matter being clearly understood, he should have no disposition to say more this night, upon the subject, reserving the opinion he had formed, and the reasons he had to support it with, to the occasion which might regularly call for it, which would, he presumed, be a day appointed for that purpose; but as his honourable friend had gone a little further, and had given his opinion upon the outline of the subject, Mr. Windham said, he must likewise state his, which was, unfortunately, as decidedly against the peace, as that of his friend was for it. He was aware, that to dissent from any such general opinion as that of his honourable friend, was at all times painful to him, it was still more so, since that opinion was so generally approved of and supported. He could have no delight in being a mourner, in a scene of general rejoicing.....to wear a countenance of sorrow, while others seemed to sparkle with joy.....to sink into despair, while others were lifted up by hope, was a singularity not to be envied, nor should he be longer in assigning his reason for it, than would be necessary in order to be understood. In his view of things, which might, perhaps, be a mistaken one, there was no cause for rejoicing at the peace we were about to have; he foresaw that this rejoicing might be turned into bitter lamentation: this he said, because he thought that the advantages, as some people called them, which this peace would bring with it, would pave the way to the ruin of this country. The general illuminations were to him no sign of comfort, for he saw no reasonable cause for the people of England to rejoice. He must, before he assented to it, ask himself, "Are these the lights of the sepulchre, or the tokens of the knell of our funeral?" Before I put on my wedding garment, I must know whether I am invited to the feast, or the funeral; FROM THE BOTTOM OF MY HEART I THINK THIS PRECEDES THE BITTERNESS OF SORROW, AND THE LAMENTATIONS OF DEATH. Considering the situation in which we now stand, I think that the moment my honourable friends signed this treaty, they signed the death warrant of their country; or, at least, they have given it a blow, which I think it can never recover from. He said, he knew how unpleasant it was to the house, nay, he felt it unpleasant to himself, to dwell upon observations, which were made against his wishes, although dictated by his judgment. He knew the uncertainty of human affairs, and how vain it was in man to attempt to prescribe bounds to the dispensations of Providence, the ways of which were invisible to human sight. He could not tell what changes there may be without and within us; what temper, what spirit, the people of this and other countries may have: what may be done for our political salvation. He did not say we should entertain no hope, for he knew that hope might exist, when reasonable confidence was extinguished; and he knew that exertions ought to be continued, after reasonable expectation was gone; and, therefore, he did not wish the people of this country to despair; but he would say, that upon no view he could take of public affairs, from no principle that he knew induced a reasonable man to act, could he state to himself the way, in which this country could come out of the difficulty, into which this peace would throw it. There was one thing more, which he wished to take notice of: he had long thought there was one way, by which this country could escape from the dreadful effect, which we all apprehended from the gigantic power of France: and that was by preserving the superiority of our commerce. It had appeared to him also, that there was but one thing wanting for France, to enable it to extend its empire, and to become as much the terror of other nations by sea as it had by land, and that was, to extend its commerce; this, in a fatal moment, in his opinion, we had given to France. How our ruin could be avoided he did not know. Others, undoubtedly, entertained hopes; how well founded such hopes were, time would shew. All that he had hitherto heard upon that subject, appeared to him to be either very doubtful, or entirely defective. What might be the effect of what we now saw, no man could know: but he apprehended nothing to us but our ruin. This was nearly all he had to say, and which, he apprehended, was called for by what had preceded it on this occasion; he should not have added another word, if the expression of an "honourable peace" had not occurred to him. It need not have been introduced; it seemed to have been improvidently and unpolitically mentioned: for it was more than was asked. He would not ask for an honourable peace; not that he undervalued the honour of the nation; no, he thought honour one of its dearest possessions, but for the sake of argument, and for that only, he would put it out of the way, and say, in this particular case, "Show me it is a safe peace, and I shall be contented." Now, after saying this, which was certainly his opinion on this peace, whether that was a subject of censure or applause, there was certainly no disapprobation of the present address, implied by what he said, although he had no wish to dissemble any sentiment he entertained; because, if what had gone abroad was true, we were really driven to agree to this peace by necessity. If that was the case, the framers of the peace, on the part of this country, had great merit. We were not to condemn them for what they gave up, but to applaud them for what they had saved; not for Ceylon or Trinidad, but for saving to us Portsmouth or Plymouth, or preserving Ireland to the British empire, and for preventing greater humiliation. If this was really our state, and we made peace from necessity, we must applaud them for the peace, because the value of the peace would then be judged of, not from the thing itself, but from the necessity which gave it birth. That, however, was a subject, which should be discussed hereafter; and the questions would be, how far the peace was a peace of necessity? and what the degree of the necessity was? for nothing, in his apprehension, could justify the putting of the state into such danger, as this peace would, but absolute necessity. This was all he had to say at present upon this subject, except merely to add, that, as to the address now before the house, he concurred with the two gentlemen, who had just preceded him (Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox), in giving it his assent.—Alexander I of Russia, who is called "an universally beloved sovereign," has been crowned at Moscow, and has commenced the exercise of his imperial functions, by several acts of grace and favour.—The captain of the Tripolitan corsair, after receiving from the brave captain Sterret, what BUTLER would call a "magnificent rib-roasting," shaped his weary way to Tripoli, where, according to a very summary process, long known in Barbary, he received the bastinado, for suffering himself to be beaten. Flogged at sea, and flogged on shore, defeated abroad, and disgraced at home, this buccaneer has nothing to do but to blow out his renegade brains, and, by way of elegy and dying speech, recite a passage from the well known ballad of "Jacky Lines," who, as the learned reader may remember, had the triple misfortune

"To be catch'd, and trapann'd, and well scourged for the same."

—A violent quarrel happened at Cadiz, between the French general, who commanded the batteries at Algesiras, and the Spanish commandant. The former absolutely struck the latter with his sabre, in the public walk. The Spaniard tamely suffered this outrage. O, high minded Castilian, how are the mighty fallen, and the weapons of thy warfare perished!—On the authority of "The Glasgow Courier," and from other respectable sources, we learn, that the debates in both houses of the imperial parliament were anticipated as highly important, on the great question of the necessity, the good, or the evil of the late accommodation between England and France. The opposition, composed of characters of the most resplendent genius, though, heretofore, of the most discordant principles, will be very formidable. The marquis of Buckingham and earl Fitzwilliam are to take the lead against the treaty in the house of lords. Mr. Windham, one of the greatest political characters in England, will move for the amendment in the house of commons, and the celebrated George Canning will be a powerful auxiliary. From the talents, energy, and zeal of these accomplished characters, the most ingenious and powerful arguments against a bad peace may be expected.—

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

—A letter from a member of congress, to his friend in New-York, published in the Evening Post, corrects a mistatement, which has been current in most of the public prints. Our letter-writer alludes to a paragraph, purporting, that "the French convention was before the senate, because of a new article inserted in it, &c." but this is declared to be a mistake, which might lead to a dangerous error. It is true that the president, ex majore cautela, laid the ratification of the first consul before the senate; but it is equally true, that the senate declared it to be their opinion, that the treaty was fully ratified. It is also true, that in the proclamation, the first consul's ratification, as translated, contains a proviso to the effect mentioned in the paper I have just seen; but it is equally true, that in the original, there is no such proviso. The effect of the alterations made in the convention by the senate, last winter, is, indeed, clearly ascertained by the form of expression usual on such occasions, and which, in plain English, means, It being well understood, but no new clause, nor any new interpretation of an old clause, is to be found after these words. So far, indeed, was the first consul from inserting a proviso, or any limitation or condition, that what he has added, is in mere conformity to, and confirms what was already done.—A letter from Washington, and from the pen of a principal, printed in the New-York Evening Post, contains the following sentiments upon the politics of the president and his party. As no article, which has appeared since the commencement of the session, contains more truth and information, succinctly expressed, we copy it with much satisfaction:....."Things go on smoothly in congress, as yet. Economy of time and money is the pretended order of the day, with the majority; but, notwithstanding these pretensions, you will see, that they have adjourned from Friday until Monday. I do not censure the measure; but mention it merely to shew the difference between profession and practice. Every measure of the executive departments appears to me to emanate from one source. What are called heads of departments, may as well be without heads as with; for, I believe, they make very little use of them; performing, as they do, every direction of the prime mover, with mechanical accuracy. Their private judgments appear suspended, and, in the minutest particulars, they act only as they are bidden. As far as my observations have extended, I think I ought to except from the above observations the secretary of state, who appears to me, "a man not fashioned for these times." I am more and more convinced, that the great cause which moved the president to address the legislature by message, was the fear of submitting his recent conduct to the scrutinizing investigation of the minority of congress. Although the majority of the ministerial members would doubtless vote to whitewash their chief, however sable he might appear, there are, nevertheless, in my opinion, many of the majority who are men of nice honour; who would never sacrifice their reputation for propriety and magnanimity, to flatter any one. Of such, if I mistake not, is Mr. Nicholson, of Maryland, and Dr. E. from New-York. I am sorry any notice has been taken in the papers, of the grammatical errors, and obscure sentences in the message. There are other points in it, which ought to call forth all the energies of the pen and press, to expose, confute, and reprehend. It is true, some of his thoughts are involved in a labyrinth of words, which he has left to be disentangled by his readers, if they are able....But a truce to verbal criticisms. The promised abolition of the internal taxes will be popular; though it is well known, that three-fourths of them are paid by the wealthy, who can well afford the contribution, and who have never complained of it. But I imagine the object in the measure lies deeper than the mere extinction of these taxes:....The impost duties will probably be lessened one-third by the peace in Europe; and, of course, the receipts of the treasury will not be adequate to discharge all the demands thereon. To what then will congress resort?....Certainly not to the renewal of taxes just abolished. What then?....The public funds. You must not start at this idea, but make up your mind for the event, at no very remote period..... Such are my fears ;...may they prove groundless!.....The recent dreadful fires, which have so materially injured the capital of New-England, are supposed to have been kindled by some incendiary. The town officers have proffered a liberal reward, to the detector of this enormous villainy. —A newspaper commences with the year at Baltimore. It contains bright evidence of talents, usefully directed. The style of the prospectus, the editor's address, and the initial essays, are luminous and forcible, and the object of the undertaking cannot be sufficiently applauded. It is entitled The Anti-Democrat. —The portrait of General Washington, drawn at full length, by that eminent artist, Stuart, a native of Newport, Rhode-Island, has been placed in the senate chamber of the state house in that town. This excellent likeness is said to do great credit to the artist, and the execution is in the first style. —Congress are said to be indolent, or luxurious, during the holidays, and the bustle of business is exchanged for festal pleasure. The mouth of the orator, and the door of the committee room are shut, and even the most vigilant nod over the poppy columns of Albert Gallatin. As during the present pitiful politics of this country, no spirited man will exert himself to varnish over the rottenness of our institutions, a state of oblivion appears to be the one thing needful! Let those, therefore, who are proud and honourable, who love a strong government, a genuine independence, and a protected freedom, drug themselves with many an opiate, or be lulled by the ripples of the lazy Potomac, into a forgetfulness of recent men, and recent measures. Happy, thrice happy would be even the death-like state of such indefatigable sleepers!.... Hence they could not see the gigantic folly of the time, and hence they could not hear the lying tongues of patriots, the bawl of stupid democracy, the gibberish of usurping renegadoes, nor the unwarlike alarum of the militia drum. —The 22d of December, the anniversary of the landing of our pilgrim forefathers, at Plymouth, in the memorable year 1620, was commemorated at Boston, by upwards of one hundred of their descendants..... The honourable Stephen Higginson presided; and we observe, among the list of distinguished guests, the late president of the United States, Colonel Pickering, John Q. Adams, George Cabot, and Fisher Ames, Esquires. Among the toasts, we note the following:

THE PORT FOLIO.

The liberty of our forefathers, as they have defined it, "a civil, moral, federal liberty."

The federal constitution....May it govern those, who govern us.

Some democratical creature, who writes very obscurely, in S. H. Smith's National Intelligencer, the official paper at Washington, speaking of Gallatin's report, declares, in words that Godwin's self might use, that "it will be found to contain a mass of facts, embracing views of the past, present, and future resources of the government, that will enable the public, with less difficulty than has hitherto been experienced, to understand distinctly the objects to which the revenue has been applied, and those which at present, or prospectively require its application." It is fortunate for America, that she can obtain from Geneva, a high treasurer, with his "mass of facts," and such "embracing views."

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

—The editor of "The Farmer's Museum" remarks, that "among the great variety of literary works, which are occasionally published, we find the fate of them to vary, not always in proportion to their merits. A fortunate title to some, will ensure the fate of the third or fourth edition, where the intrinsic value of the work is trivial; while another, which is written with genius and ingenuity, and which may not happen to catch the capricious taste of the public, is considered as only literary lumber. Some again are only neglected for a while, till their deserts call them from an unjust oblivion. Amongst the latter, may be classed the Algerine Captive, written by R. Tyler, Esq. a work of much humour and merit, and for which we are happy to see a late and increasing demand." From our partiality for Mr. Tyler, and our conviction of the ingenuity of his mind, we are much delighted with the above information. A second edition of his work, enlarged to two volumes octavo, and published in the style of "Mordaunt," by Dr. Moore, is greatly wanted, and would afford the author an opportunity, to extend his chapters, which are now too brief, and fill a fine outline, with very captivating colours. —Mr. Thomas Dobson, bookseller, of this city; has just published a second edition, with additions, of "Essays and Notes on Husbandry and Rural Affairs, by John B. BORDLEY." In the advertisement, the bookseller states, that the first edition of this work having met with a favourable reception from the public, the author has been induced to revise it, and, by many additions, to render the book still more valuable, not only to the practical farmer, but also to private families, where it will prove a very useful companion, furnishing a great number of instructions, which will be found very serviceable in domestic life. From general testimony, we are convinced that this system of rural economics is worthy of the above commendation; and, for the honour of our country, for the benefit of the husbandman, for the profit of the respectable bookseller, and for the reputation of the author, we sincerely wish it may have a very general perusal.

SONG TO ECHO.

WRITTEN FOR MR. B. CARR.

I.

IN yon deep grove, oh let me stray,
Unmark'd by any human eye!
There let me keep my lonely way,
And Echo only hear my sigh.
And, as in pity to my woes,
Her voice more sweet shall whisper every close,
Yes, Echo, thou may'st hear my sigh.

II.

For thou, like me, wert doom'd to prove Neglected love and wounded pride;

Like mine, thy sorrows fill'd the grove,
When thy belov'd Narcissus died:
He died; and still the lover's woes
Provoke thy voice to whisper every close,
Yes, Echo, thou, like me, hast sigh'd.

III.

Let no rude sound thy slumbers wake,
List to the lover's plaints alone,
Then let thy voice the silence break,
Responsive to the softest tone!
Then, oft as Night's pale Queen shall rise,
To thee I'll haste to break my plaintive sighs:
Yes, Echo, thou shalt hear my moan.

OMICRON.

SELECTED POETRY.

The style of Shenstone has been so languidly imitated, by the herd of poetasters, that we exult to laugh at his drawling verse, with the author of the following burlesque.

Your zephyr I cannot espouse,
For often my corn he will parch;
And I know that the roof of my house
Was blown off most sweetly last March.

The cow in my yard, which I keep,
All night does her calf so bemoan,
That I can't get a wink of good sleep,
Tho' I'm weary, and lying alone.

Of nymphs and of swains what they say,
I never could read, but I smil'd,
For my shepherd's at....Botany-bay,
And my dairy maid's always with child.

EPIGRAMS.

Gold is so ductile, learned chymists say,
That half an ounce will stretch a wondrous way;
Our metal's base, or else the chymists err,
For now-a-days a guinea won't go far.

TO A POET.

Unthrifty wretch, why still confine
Thy toil and homage to the nine,
'Tis time to bid the nine begone,
And now take care of number ONE!

A wag once hearing a countryman say,
Pray tell me to prison the readiest way;
There are many bye-paths, the punster replied,
But the highway's the road the most commonly tried.

JUVENAL.

All human actions, wishes, fears or rage,
Pleasures, or joys, or reasonings of the sage,
Compose the motley matter of our page.

THERE is, perhaps, no mode of writing so well calculated to excite universal attention, as the productions of the essayist. Few men are disposed to pursue, systematically, the concatenation of historical events, to watch the unfolding of characters in a novel, or lose their senses in its labyrinth; but all can find time, and supply it patience, for a short essay on life or literature.

But the great difficulty in undertaking a periodical paper for the public, is to find an appropriate title. I have been anticipated in almost every name that my mind could suggest. The Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, and Rambler; the Idler, Mirror, World, and Lounger, are titles become classical by prescriptive veneration; and, for a common writer to assume either of these, would be to incur animadversion, and provoke the insolence of contempt. To the preceding writers, have succeeded a seruum pecus, an ignoble herd, of Bablers, Triflers, Philanthropes, and Quizzes, whose productions are fast descending to the peaceful shelf. But from this censure must be exempted the Looker On, Observer, and Indian Observer, whose remarks on life are acute, whose criticisms are just, and whose style is always pure.

When Mr. Boyd entered on the duty of Censor Morum at Madras, he assumed the title of Indian Observer, and advanced steadily in his march, gratified by the voice of public approbation, and undisturbed by those literary reptiles, whom the rays of his genius called forth into a momentary existence. That I am as much an American, as Mr. Boyd was an Indian, no man, of any country, will deny; but that I shall not equal him, either in acuteness of research, profoundness of criticism, or inculcation of moral duties, I fear the whole world will affirm. Yet confidence is necessary to great undertakings, and, as I consider this a very important one, I, far from servilely deprecating the severity of my readers, call boldly on them to read my essays, admire the justness of my thoughts, the naivete of my humour, and the melody of my periods.

But it is not my purpose, in the progress of this paper, to enter into abstract reasoning, or grave discussions of moral duty. Let those who write, says Horace, chuse subjects that are suitable to their genius. It belonged to a Johnson to make the atheist tremble, and impiety shrink at his rebuke; for me only is left the hope of harmlessly amusing, and to shoot the lighter follies that eluded his giant grasp.

It has been observed, both by an ancient sage, and a modern poet, that

"The proper study of mankind is man."

I, therefore, leave the joy and the depression, the loves and hatred of plants, to Dr. Darwin and his enthusiasts; I purpose to make life and manners the object of my investigation; and, as some men take delight in determining the specific gravity of the air, fabricating a cheese of vast dimensions, collecting the bones of an overgrown animal, or ascertaining the distinction between mushrooms and toad-stools, so my felicity consists in examining the volume of the world, and tracing the emotions of the soul, in the human face divine.

If I labour under some privations in this city, I also enjoy many advantages. For models of eloquence, I have only to repair to the "siege of York," where my ear is ravished by the music of periods, that out-Cicero Cicero; where the action is suited to the word, and the word to the action; where every recess of the human character is explored, from the white to the black man; and, lastly, where the mind can sublimely digress from Charles of Sweden to Svedenborg, and from Buonaparte to Barnaby Rattle.

I conclude this first number, with inviting all those, who are desirous of literary reputation, and eager virum volitare per ora, to rouse from their lethargy, and contribute their help to promote cheerfulness, and a love of erudition. The correspondence of the fair shall be particularly noticed; for place aux Dames was ever a favourite maxim of the Observer.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

To night, after my return from the theatre, into which I sometimes saunter, to smooth the wrinkles of my brow, to surrender myself to the illusions of imagination, and derive fresh spirits for my lucubrations, I could not help reflecting, in consequence of witnessing the new pantomime of Obi, upon the universal belief of the existence and potency of supernatural and malevolent beings. Magical rites and incantations; the charm and the cauldron, the loathsome reptile and the dragon's blood, have been successfully employed by the cunning, and implicitly dreaded by the timid, in every age. The striking similarity observable in most of the mummeries of superstition, lead me to the collation of the "charms" of sorcery, as described by three different authors. The substance of the first account is extracted from the British Magazine. The circumstances, on which this piece is founded, are related in Dr. Moseley's Treatise on Sugar, and Medical Observations. A revolted negro, named Jack, of gigantic strength and great intrepidity, took up his residence in the inaccessible parts of Mount Lebanon, in Jamaica, and by his boldness, bravery, and depredations, became the terror of the island. Many attempts were made to subdue him, but without success; in one of these conflicts with a negro, named Quashee, he lost two fingers, and thus acquired his nickname. He was dreaded by the negroes, on account of his supposed magical powers, and the influence of his obi. This obi consisted in a composition of dirty and disgusting materials; namely, grave dirt, ashes, the blood of a black cat, and human fat, mixed into a paste, kept in the end of a goat's horn, and worn about the neck. He had also in a bag, a dried toad, a pig's tail, and a slip of virginal parchment of kid's skin, inscribed with characters of blood. His repeated enormities, at length, induced the government to offer a large reward for killing him, which was finally effected by two negroes, Quashee and Sam; aided by a little boy. Before they set out on the expedition, the negroes took the precaution to be baptized, in confidence that by such means, they would be enabled to resist the effects of obi.

The following article contains some additional information touching this African magic.

Obi, or, as it is pronounced in the English West Indies, obeah, originated, like many customs among the Africans, with the ancient Egyptians. Obi, for the purpose of bewitching people, or consuming them by lingering illness, is made of grave dirt, hair, teeth of sharks and other animals, blood, feathers, egg-shells, images in wax, the hearts of birds, liver of mice, and some potent weeds, roots and bushes, of which Europeans are at this time ignorant. A negro, who thinks himself bewitched by obi, will apply to an obi man or an obi woman for cure.

The next narrative of these baleful rites is to be found in BEN. JONSON, who, in his "Masque of Queens," has thus minutely described a nocturnal meeting of the hags of witchcraft. As this description is not generally known, as it is most wildly poetical, and of vivid interest, as the form of invocation is tremendous, and as it describes things "most fanciful and strange," we recommend it to the curious reader.

Dame, dame, the warch is set:
Quickly come, we all are met,
From the lakes, and from the fens,
From the rocks, and from the dens,
From the woods, and from the caves,
From the church-yards, from the graves,
From the dungeon, from the tree
That they die on, here are we.

The owl is 'broad, the bat and the toad,
And so is the cat a-mountain,
The ant and the mole both sit in a hole,
And frog peeps out of the fountain;
The dogs they do bay, and the timbreis play,
The spindle is now a turning;
The moon it is red, and the stars are fled,
But all the sky is a burning:
The ditch is made, and our nails the spade,
With pictures full, of wax and of wool;
Their livers I stick, with needles quick;
There lacks but the blood, to make up the flood.
Quickly, dame, then bring your part in,
Spur, spur upon little Martin,
Merrily, merrily, make him sail,
A worm in his mouth, and a thorn in his tail,
Fire above, and fire below,
With a whip i' your hand, to make him go.
O, now she's come!
Let all be dumb.

* "Three-Fingered Jack."

I have been all day looking after
A raven, feeding upon a quarter;
And, soon as she turn'd her beak to the south,
I snatch'd this morsel out of her mouth.

I have been gathering wolves' hairs,
The mad dog's foam, and the adder's ears;
The spurning of a dead man's eyes,
And all since the evening star did rise.

I last night lay all alone
O' the ground, to hear the mandrake groan;
And pluck'd him up, though he grew full low;
And, as I had done, the cock did crow.

And I ha' been choosing out this skull!
From charnel houses, that were full;
From private grots, and public pits;
And frighted a sexton out of his wits.

Under a cradle I did creep,
By day: and, when the child was asleep
At night, I suck'd the breath: and rose,
And pluck'd the nodding nurse by the nose.

I had a dagger: what did I with that?
Kill'd an infant to have his fat.
A piper it got, at a church aisle,
I bade him again blow wind i' the tail.

A murderer yonder was hung in chains,
The sun and the wind had shrunk his veins;
I bit off a sinew: I clipp'd his hair;
I brought off his rags, that danc'd i' the air.

The screech owl's eggs, and the feathers black,
The blood of the frog, and the bone in his back,
I have been getting: and made of his skin
A purset, to keep Sir Cranion in.

And I ha' been plucking (plants among)
Hen-lock, henbane, adders-tongue,
Night-shade, moon-wort, libba-d's bane;
And twice, by the dogs, was like to be ta'en.

I, from the jaws of a gard'ner's bitch,
Did snatch these bones, and then leap'd the ditch:
Yet went I back to the house again,
Kill'd the black cat, and here's the brain.

I went to the toad breeds under the wall,
I charm'd him out, and he came at my call;
I scratch'd out the eyes of the owl before,
I tore the bat's wing: what would you have more?

DAME.

Yes, I have brought (to help our vows)
Horned poppy, cypress boughs,
The fig tree wild, that grows on tombs,
And juice that from the larch tree comes,
The basilisk's blood, and the viper's skin:
And now our orgies let's begin.

Dame Earth shall quake,
And the houses shake,
And her belly shall ache,
As her back were brake,
Such a birth to make,
As is the blue drake,
Whose form thou shalt take.

The sticks are across, there can be no loss,
'The sage is rotten, the sulphur is gotten
Up to the sky, that was i' the ground.
Follow it then, with our rattles, round;
Under the bramble, over the brier,
A little more heat will set it on fire:
Put it in mind, to do it kind,
Flow water and blow wind
Rouncy is over, Robble is under,
A flash of light, and a clap of thunder,
A storm of rain, another of hail.
We all must home i' the egg-shell sail;
'The mast is made of a great pin,
The tackle of cobweb, the sail as thin,
And if we go through and not fall in.....

DAME.

Stay, all our charms do nothing win
Upon the night; our labour dies!
Our magic feature will not rise;
Nor yet the sorm! we must repeat
More direful voices far, and beat
The ground with vipers, till it sweat.

Bark dogs, wolves howl,
Seas roar, woods roll,
Clouds crack, all be black,
But the light our charms do make.

Not yet! my rage begins to swell,
Darkness, devils, night, and hell,
Do not thus delay my spell.
I call you once, and I call you twice;
I beat you again, if you stay my thrice;
Through these crannies where I peep,
I'll let in the light to see your sleep.
And all the secrets of your sway
Shall lie as open to the day,
As unto me. Still are you deaf?
Reach me a bough that ne'er bare leaf,
To strike the air; and Aconite,
To hurl upon this glaring light;
A rusty knife to wound mine arm;
And as it drops, I'll speak a charm,
Shall cleave the ground, as low as lies
Old shrunk-up Chaos, and let rise.
Once more, his dark and reeking head,
To strike the world and nature dead,
Until my magic birth be bred.

Black go in, and blacker come out;
At thy going down we give thee a shout.

Hoo!

At thy rising again thou shalt have two,
And if thou dost what we would have thee do,
Thou shalt have three, thou shalt have four,
Thou shalt have ten, thou shalt have a score.

Hoo. Har. Har. Hoo!

A cloud of pitch, a spur and a switch,
To haste him away, and a whirlwind play,
Before and after, with thunder for laughter,
And storms for joy, of the roaring boy;
His head of a drake, his tail of a snake.

About, about, and about,
Till the mist arise, and the lights fly out.
The images neither be seen nor felt:
The woollen burn, and the waxen melt:
Sprinkle your liquors upon the ground,
And into the air: around, around.

Our last quotation is sufficiently familiar, but it would be high treason to the majesty of SHAKS-PEARE, to omit the subsequent passage from his "Mucbeth."

Thrice the brindled cat hath mew'd,
Thrice; and once the hedge pig whin'd.
Harper cries: 'tis time, 'tis time.
Round about the cauldron go,
In the poison'd entrails throw;
Toad that under the cold stone
Days and nights hast thirty one Swelter'd venom sleeping got,
Boil thou first in the charmed pot.

Fillet of a fenny snake,
In the cauldron boil and bake;
Eye of newt, and toe of frog,
Wool of bat and tongue of dog,
Adder's fork, and blind worm's sting,
Lizard's leg, and owl's wing,
For a charm of powerful trouble,
Like a hell-broth, boil and bubble.

Scale of dragon, tooth of wolf,
Witch's mummy; maw and gulf
Of the ravin'd salt sea shark;
Root of hemlock, digg'd in the dark;
Liver of blaspheming Jew;
Gall of goat; and slips of yew,
Sliver'd in the moon's eclipse;
Nose of Turk, and Tartar's lips;
Finger of birth-strangled babe,
Ditch deliver'd by a drab;
Make the gruel thick and slab;
Add thereto a tiger's claudron,
For the ingredients of our cauldron.

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

AN EXAMINATION OF THE PRESIDENT'S

MESSAGE, CONTINUED,

NUMBER IV.

IT is matter of surprise to observe a proposition to diminish the revenue, associated with intimations which appear to contemplate war. The suggestions in the Message respecting the Barbary States, plainly enough imply, that treaties are found to be too feeble cords to bind them; and that a resort to coercive means will probably be requisite to enforce a greater sense of justice towards us. Accordingly, as a comment on this hint, we have seen a resolution brought into the House of Representatives, authorising the President to take measures effectually to protect our commerce against those states. Believing it to be a sound position, that these predatory nations will never be brought to respect sufficiently the rights of this country, whether derived from nature or from compact, without first being made to feel its power, there is no disposition to condemn the efficacious employment of force. Yet, considering the maxims by which those states are governed, and the obstinacy which they have evinced upon other occasions, it is likely that a policy of this sort will be attended with considerable, and with no very temporary expense. This alone is conceived to be a conclusive reason against parting with any portion of our present income: nothing could be less advisable, at a moment when there is the prospect, if not the project, of a general rupture with them.

Hitherto the proposal for sacrificing the internal revenue, has been tried almost wholly by the test of expediency;—it is time to put it to a severer test: to that of Right. Can the proposed abolition take effect without impairing the PUBLIC FAITH?

This is a question of infinite moment to the character of our Government—to the prosperity of our nation. If it is to be answered in the negative, it must be matter of profound regret, that a proposal which could give rise to it, should have come from the first Magistrate of the United States.

It is hardly necessary to premise, by way of explanation, that to pledge or appropriate funds for a public debt, is, in effect, to mortgage them to the public creditors for their security. Retracing our financial system to its commencement, we find the impost and the excise on distilled spirits, repeatedly and positively pledged, first, for the payment and interest of the debt, next, for the reimbursement of certain instalments of the principal.
It is true, the appropriation is qualified by the words, "so much as may be necessary," but the public faith is engaged in express terms, that both the funds shall continue to be levied and collected, until the whole debt shall be discharged; with the single reserve, that the government shall be at liberty to substitute other funds of equal amount. It follows, that these two items of revenue constitute a joint fund for the security of the public creditor, co-extensive in duration with the existence of any portion of the debt: and it is to be inferred, that the Government, contemplating the possibility of a deficiency in one, intended that the other should serve as an auxiliary, and that the co-operation of the two should effectually guard the creditor against the fluctuations and casualties to which either singly, might be exposed. Anticipating, however, the possibility that the one or the other, in whole or in part, might in practice be found inconvenient, a right was reserved to exchange either for an adequate substitute. But it is conceived that this does not imply the right to exchange the one for the other. The effect would be essentially different in the two cases: in the first there would always be two funds, aggregately, of the same or similar force and value, to secure the creditor; in the last there would be only one: from being double, the security would become single.

This mode of reasoning is the only one, upon which the rights and the interests of the creditors can safely rest: It is plain and intelligible, and avoids the danger of erroneous speculations about the separate sufficiency of the respective funds. Admitting, however, for the sake of the argument, that this is too rigid a construction of the contract, and that when one of the two funds should have acquired a stable increase, which would render it equal to the purpose of the pledge, it might then be made to stand in the place of both: yet, surely, neither the purity of the public faith, nor the safety of the creditor, will endure the application of this principle to any other, than an ascertained result.—Neither, certainly, will tolerate, that merely a reasonable ground of confidence shall authorize so material an alteration in the essence of the security which protects the debt.

THE foregoing reasoning as to the question of right, may be further elucidated by the particular provision in the Act* which introduced the excise on distilled spirits. After a permanent appropriation of the proceeds of the tax to the interest of the debt, it provides, that the surplus if any there shall be, at the end of each year shall be applied to the reduction of the principal; unless that surplus or any part of it should be required for public exigencies of the United States, and should be so appropriated by special "Acts of Congress." While at this early period of our finances it was not thought expedient to appropriate this surplus absolutely to the Sinking Fund, it was contemplated that it should not be diverted except for public exigencies. Gratuitously to relinquish it, is therefore contrary to the letter as well as to the spirit of the original institution of the fund. The like observations, though with less force, apply to the provision noticed in another number, respecting the surplusses of the revenue generally, which, as we have seen, are all appropriated to the Sinking Fund. At the session of Congress immediately succeeding any year in which such surplusses may accrue, they may be specially appropriated or reserved by law, for other purposes; but if this be not done, they are then to go of course to the Sinking Fund. To appropriate or to reserve, plainly, can never mean to relinquish. The true meaning of the provision appears, therefore, to be that, though Congress, under the restriction expressed as to time, may appropriate or reserve those surplusses for other objects of the public service, yet if not wanted for such other objects, they shall continue to inure to the fund for the reduction of the debt, so long as by the laws regulating their duration they are to continue to be levied.

Thus, on whatever side it is viewed, there is a temerity and a levity in the proposition which confounds and amazes.—If, unhappily, it shall receive the sanction of Congress, there will remain nothing in principle of our system of Public Credit—nothing on which the confidence of the creditor can safely repose. The precedent of a fatal innovation will have been established; and its extension to a total annihilation of the security, would be a step, not much more violent, than that by which the inroad had commenced. But it is devoutly to be hoped, that the delirium of party spirit will not so far transport the Legislative Representatives of the nation, as to induce them to put the seal to a measure, as motiveless—as precipitate—as impolitic—as faithless—as could have been dictated, even by a deliberate hostility to the vital principles of our national credit. Particularly the guardians of the PUBLIC FAITH, and of the Public Purse, they surely will not consent to impoverish the one, and the other, through an abject and criminal complaisance.

It is a fact not unknown to himself, that abroad as well as at home, a diffidence has been entertained of the opinions and views of the person now at the head of our government, with regard to our system of public credit. This undoubtedly ought to have been with him a strong reason for caution, especially at so early a stage of his administration, as to any step which might strengthen that diffidence; which was in the least equivocal in its tendency. Nor ought it to have been overlooked, that the interest of the State, and a regard for his own reputation demanded this caution. The appearance of instability in the plans of a government, particularly respecting its finances, can never fail to make injurious impressions.—To a government, the character of which has not yet been established by time, the example of sudden and questionable innovations, may be expected to be in the highest degree detrimental. Prudent men every where are apt to take the alarm at great changes not manifestly beneficial and proper; a disposition which has been much increased by the terrible events of the present revolutionary era. Yet, disregarding these salutary and obvious reflections, the President has ventured, in the very infancy of his administration, upon the bold and unjustifiable step of recommending to the legislative body, a renunciation of the whole internal revenue of the country; though the nation is at this moment encumbered with a considerable public debt; and though that very revenue, is, by the existing laws, an established fund for its discharge.

What then are we to think of the ostentatious assurance in the Inaugural Speech as to the preservation of PUBLIC FAITH? Was it given merely to amuse with agreeable, but deceptive sounds? Is it possible that it could have been intended to conceal the insidious design of aiming a deadly blow at a System which was opposed in its origin, and has been calumniated in every stage of its progress?

Alas! How deplorable will it be, should it ever become proverbial, that a President of the United States, like the Wierd Sisters in Macbeth, "Keeps his promise to the ear, but breaks it to the sense!"

NUMBER V.

IN the rage for change, or under the stimulus of a deep-rooted animosity against the former administrations, or for the sake of gaining popular favour by a profuse display of extraordinary zeal for economy, even our judiciary system has not passed unassailed. The attack here is not so open as that on the revenue; but when we are told that the states individually have "principal care of our persons, our property and our reputation"; constituting the great field of human concerns; and that therefore we may well doubt whether our organization is not too complicated, too expensive; whether offices and officers have not been multiplied unnecessarily and sometimes injuriously to the service they were meant to promote;" when afterwards it is observed that "the Judiciary System will of course present itself to the contemplation of Congress;" and when it appears that pains had been taken to form and communicate a numerical list of all the causes decided since the first establishment of the courts, in order that Congress may be able to judge of the proportion which the institution bears to the business; with all these indications it is not to be misunderstood that the intention was unequivocally to recommend material alterations in the system.

No bad thermometer of the capacity of our Chief Magistrate for government is furnished, by the rule which he offers for judging of the utility of the Federal Courts; namely, the exact number of causes which have been by them decided. There is hardly any stronger symptom of a pigmy mind, than a propensity to allow greater weight to secondary than to primary considerations.

It ought at least to have been adverted to, that if this circumstance were a perfect criterion, it is yet too early to apply it, especially to the courts recently erected: And it might have merited reflection, that it would have been prudent to wait for a more advanced period of the Presidential term, to ascertain what influence the great change which has lately happened in our public functionaries may have on the confidence, which in many parts of the Union has heretofore been reposed in the State courts, so as to prevent a preference of those of the United States.

But to enable us duly to appreciate the wisdom of the projected innovation, it is necessary to review the objects which were designed to be accomplished by the arrangement of the Judiciary power, as it is seen in the constitution, and to examine the organization which has been adopted to give effect to those objects.

It is well known to all who were acquainted with the situation of our public affairs, when the constitution was framed, and it is to be inferred from the provisions of the instrument itself, that the objects contemplated, were, 1st. To provide a faithful and efficient organ for carrying into execution the laws of the United States, which otherwise would be a dead letter. 2d. To secure the fair interpretation and execution of our treaties with foreign nations. 3d. To maintain harmony between the individual states; not only by an independent and impartial mode of determining controversies between them, but by frustrating the effects of partial laws in any one, injurious to the rights of the citizens of another. 4th. To guard generally against the invasions of property and right by fraudulent and oppressive laws of particular states enforced by their own tribunals. 5th. To guard the rights and conciliate the confidence of foreigners, by giving them the option of tribunals created by and responsible to the general government; which having the immediate charge of our external relations, including the care of our national peace, might be expected to be more tenacious of such an administration of justice as would leave to the citizens of other countries no real cause of complaint. 6th. To protect reciprocally the rights, and inspire mutually the confidence of the citizens of different states in their intercourse with each other, by enabling them to resort to tribunals so constituted as to be essentially free from local bias or partiality. 7th. To give the citizens of each state a fair chance of impartial justice through the medium of those tribunals, in cases in which the titles to property might depend on the conflicting grants of different states.—These were the immensely important objects to be attained by the institution of an adequate Judiciary power in the government of the United States. Nor did its institution depend upon mere speculative opinion, though indeed even that would have been sufficient to indicate the expediency of the measure: but experience had actually in a variety of ways demonstrated its necessity.

The treaties of the United States had been infringed by state laws, put in execution by state judicatories. The rights of property had been invaded by the same means, in numerous instances, as well with respect to foreigners as to citizens; as well between citizens of different states, as between citizens of the same state. There were many cases in which lands were held or claimed under adverse grants of different states, having rival pretensions; and in respect to which the local tribunals, even if not fettered by the local laws, could hardly be expected to be impartial. In several of the states the courts were so constituted as not to afford sufficient assurance of a pure, enlightened and independent administration of justice; an evil which in some of them still continues. From these different sources, serious mischiefs had been felt. The interests of the United States, in their foreign concerns, had suffered; their reputation had been tarnished; their peace endangered; their mutual harmony had been disturbed or menaced; creditors had been ruined or in a very extensive degree much injured; confidence in pecuniary transactions had been destroyed, and the springs of industry had been proportionably relaxed. To these circumstances, as much, perhaps, as to any other, that accompanied a defective social organization, are we to attribute that miserable and prostrate situation of our affairs, which immediately before the establishment of our present National Constitution, filled every intelligent lover of his country with affliction and mortification. To the institution of a competent judiciary, little less than to any one provision in that constitution, is to be ascribed the rapid and salutary renovation of our affairs which succeeded.

The enumeration* of the component parts of the Judicial power, in the constitution, has an evident eye to the several objects which have been stated: And considering their vast magnitude, no sound politician will doubt that the principal question, with the administration, ought to be, how to give the greatest efficacy to this essential part of the system; in comparison with which the more or less of expense, must be a matter of trivial moment. The difference of expense between an enlarged and a contracted plan, may be deemed an atom in the great scale of national expenditure. The fulfillment of the important ends of this part of our constitutional plan, though with but a small degree of additional energy, facility, or convenience, must infinitely overbalance the consideration of such difference of expense.

The number of causes, which have been tried in these courts, as already intimated, can furnish but a very imperfect test by which to decide upon their utility or necessity. Their existence alone has a powerful and salutary effect. The liberty to use them, even where it is not often exercised, inspires confidence in the intercourse of business. They are viewed as beneficent guardians whose protection may be claimed when necessary. They induce caution in the state courts, and promote in them, a more attentive, if not a more able administration of justice. Though in some districts of the union the federal courts are seldom resorted to, in others they are used in an extensive degree, particularly as between foreigners and citizens, and between citizens of different states.

That their organization throughout the United States ought to be uniform, will not be denied; and it is evident that it ought to be regulated by the situation of those parts in which a greater degree of employment denotes the courts to be most necessary: Of consequence, if the quantity of business were at all a guide, the scenes in which there is the greatest employment for the federal courts, ought to furnish the rule of computation; it ought not to be sought for in the aggregate of business, throughout the union.—In reference to this point, it is likewise material to observe that, from the manner in which the federal courts were constituted, previous to the last arrangement, the organization of the state courts was so much better adapted to expedition, as to afford a strong motive for giving them a preference. The establishment of circuit courts, as now modified, will vary that circumstance, and therefore, attract more business; but it is evident that, it must require a course of years, fully to exemplify its operations, which cannot be seen in a few months, or in a single year. To attempt, therefore, to draw important inferences from the short experience hitherto had, is worse than puerile.

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

A FRIEND TO THE CONSTITUTION.

No. II.

THE constitution ordains that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish....The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

A prior section provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removable from office on impeachment.

At the last session of congress, an act passed ordaining and establishing in each state, circuit courts inferior to the supreme court. The judges who were to administer justice in these courts have been appointed, and, in conformity with the constitution, have received commissions during good behaviour.

It is now contended that these judges are dependent on the will of congress, who may repeal the law, abolish the office, and discontinue the judge.

This is the opinion I mean to controvert.

The words of the constitution leave it in the discretion of the legislature to ordain and establish such inferior courts as, from time to time their wisdom may suggest.

The reason of this is apparent. The situation of the United States, a country increasing beyond calculation, in population, in wealth, and resources, will continue to change. The necessity for inferior courts will very probably change with this change of situation, congress is rightly permitted to judge of this necessity, and, from time to time, to establish such courts; but when established, "the judges," says the constitution, "shall hold their offices during good behaviour." The constitution then has submitted to legislative decision the establishment of the court, but not the permanence or independence of the judge. So soon as he is appointed, the constitution adopts him, and declares that he shall hold his office by the firm tenure of "good behaviour." He is recognized by the constitution, and becomes a judge under it, not merely by virtue of the law.

If it be possible to make this subject still more clear, and it is in the charter of our government, I would attempt it by varying somewhat the expression of that instrument. Suppose, instead of ordaining that there should be a supreme court, the article had allowed still greater latitude to the legislature, and had declared that the judicial power of the United States should be vested in such courts as congress should, from time to time, ordain and establish, and that the judges of such courts should hold their offices during good behaviour, could it have entered into the mind of any man to say, that the provision for the permanence of the judge had been totally annulled, by the power given to congress, from time to time to establish the courts? That, because the necessity for exercising the power of establishing courts was a continuing necessity, and, consequently, the power ought not to be terminated by the first exercise thereof, nor the number of courts limited in the constitution, therefore the constitution was unable to provide for the independence of the judges, and the attempt made to do so, by positively ordaining that they should hold their offices during good behaviour, was a void and ineffectual attempt? This proposition would seem too absurd to be maintained, nor would it be less absurd to contend, that, by establishing absolutely a supreme court, the force of the clause, declaring that the judges of the inferior courts "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is in any degree impaired.

The letter of the constitution, then, which declares in terms that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is unaccompanied by other expressions, which might give colour to a construction hostile to the very words themselves.

If we examine the duties, which must have been contemplated for the supreme and inferior courts, we shall perceive no reason to admit the possibility of an intention, varying from the words, which have been used. The original jurisdiction of the supreme court extends only to "cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those, in which a state shall be party." The great residuary mass of jurisdiction, involving life, personal liberty, reputation, and property, is committed to the inferior courts; and the appeal to the supreme court is allowed, "with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make." The most interesting objects, therefore, may be decided ultimately by the inferior courts. Indeed, in cases of imprisonment, should an appeal from the judgment be always allowed, the punishment might often be suffered, pending the appeal.

But if the strange opinion that any discretionary agency of congress, in the establishment of courts, over-rides the positive and explicit regulation of the constitution, concerning the tenure of office, is to be supported, it applies as well to the supreme as inferior court. The constitution, which declares that the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may establish, does not fix the number of judges, who shall compose that court. The number is fixed by law; and that law may be repealed, and the number reduced; so that, according to this opinion, all the judges of the United States would be removable by the repeal of the laws, establishing the courts, of which they are members.

But the continuance of the individual in office is not secured by that part of the article, which declares, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts, as congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish." Had the article proceeded no farther, the exterior form of the system would indeed have been marked out, the parts to compose it would have been designated, but the rights of the individual would have been left to the discretion of the legislature. The judge might certainly have held his office at the will of the president or of congress, or in any other manner the law might have prescribed. It is the subsequent part of the article, ordaining that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," which constitutes their independence, and this plainly embraces the judges of the one court as well as of the other.

The right to permanence in office is then alike bestowed, by the constitution, on the judges of the supreme and inferior courts, and the inquiry is reduced to this naked question, do they really hold their offices during good behaviour, or at the will of congress?

This question, if indeed it can, without insult to the human judgment, be termed one, shall now receive a brief consideration.

The proposition, that the constitution is the paramount law, and that it limits the powers of the legislature, as well as that of the other departments of government, is no longer a problem in the United States. Had the members of the legislature even not sworn to observe it, still they have no power, as a legislature, to pass the boundary it

A FRIEND TO THE CONSTITUTION.

No. II.

THE constitution ordains that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish....The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

A prior section provides that all civil officers of the United States shall be removable from office on impeachment.

At the last session of congress, an act passed ordaining and establishing in each state, circuit courts inferior to the supreme court. The judges who were to administer justice in these courts have been appointed, and, in conformity with the constitution, have received commissions during good behaviour.

It is now contended that these judges are dependent on the will of congress, who may repeal the law, abolish the office, and discontinue the judge.

This is the opinion I mean to controvert.

The words of the constitution leave it in the discretion of the legislature to ordain and establish such inferior courts as, from time to time their wisdom may suggest.

The reason of this is apparent. The situation of the United States, a country increasing beyond calculation, in population, in wealth, and resources, will continue to change. The necessity for inferior courts will very probably change with this change of situation, congress is rightly permitted to judge of this necessity, and, from time to time, to establish such courts; but when established, "the judges," says the constitution, "shall hold their offices during good behaviour." The constitution then has submitted to legislative decision the establishment of the court, but not the permanence or independence of the judge. So soon as he is appointed, the constitution adopts him, and declares that he shall hold his office by the firm tenure of "good behaviour." He is recognized by the constitution, and becomes a judge under it, not merely by virtue of the law.

If it be possible to make this subject still more clear, and it is in the charter of our government, I would attempt it by varying somewhat the expression of that instrument. Suppose, instead of ordaining that there should be a supreme court, the article had allowed still greater latitude to the legislature, and had declared that the judicial power of the United States should be vested in such courts as congress should, from time to time, ordain and establish, and that the judges of such courts should hold their offices during good behaviour, could it have entered into the mind of any man to say, that the provision for the permanence of the judge had been totally annulled, by the power given to congress, from time to time to establish the courts? That, because the necessity for exercising the power of establishing courts was a continuing necessity, and, consequently, the power ought not to be terminated by the first exercise thereof, nor the number of courts limited in the constitution, therefore the constitution was unable to provide for the independence of the judges, and the attempt made to do so, by positively ordaining that they should hold their offices during good behaviour, was a void and ineffectual attempt? This proposition would seem too absurd to be maintained, nor would it be less absurd to contend, that, by establishing absolutely a supreme court, the force of the clause, declaring that the judges of the inferior courts "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is in any degree impaired.

The letter of the constitution, then, which declares in terms that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is unaccompanied by other expressions, which might give colour to a construction hostile to the very words themselves.

If we examine the duties, which must have been contemplated for the supreme and inferior courts, we shall perceive no reason to admit the possibility of an intention, varying from the words, which have been used. The original jurisdiction of the supreme court extends only to "cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and those, in which a state shall be party." The great residuary mass of jurisdiction, involving life, personal liberty, reputation, and property, is committed to the inferior courts; and the appeal to the supreme court is allowed, "with such exceptions, and under such regulations, as the congress shall make." The most interesting objects, therefore, may be decided ultimately by the inferior courts. Indeed, in cases of imprisonment, should an appeal from the judgment be always allowed, the punishment might often be suffered, pending the appeal.

But if the strange opinion that any discretionary agency of congress, in the establishment of courts, over-rides the positive and explicit regulation of the constitution, concerning the tenure of office, is to be supported, it applies as well to the supreme as inferior court. The constitution, which declares that the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as congress may establish, does not fix the number of judges, who shall compose that court. The number is fixed by law; and that law may be repealed, and the number reduced; so that, according to this opinion, all the judges of the United States would be removable by the repeal of the laws, establishing the courts, of which they are members.

But the continuance of the individual in office is not secured by that part of the article, which declares, that "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts, as congress shall, from time to time, ordain and establish." Had the article proceeded no farther, the exterior form of the system would indeed have been marked out, the parts to compose it would have been designated, but the rights of the individual would have been left to the discretion of the legislature. The judge might certainly have held his office at the will of the president or of congress, or in any other manner the law might have prescribed. It is the subsequent part of the article, ordaining that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour," which constitutes their independence, and this plainly embraces the judges of the one court as well as of the other.

The right to permanence in office is then alike bestowed, by the constitution, on the judges of the supreme and inferior courts, and the inquiry is reduced to this naked question, do they really hold their offices during good behaviour, or at the will of congress?

This question, if indeed it can, without insult to the human judgment, be termed one, shall now receive a brief consideration.

The proposition, that the constitution is the paramount law, and that it limits the powers of the legislature, as well as that of the other departments of government, is no longer a problem in the United States. Had the members of the legislature even not sworn to observe it, still they have no power, as a legislature, to pass the boundary it has marked out; and beyond its lines, they are mere individuals.

The injunction of the constitution, then, is to be religiously observed, and we have only to inquire what that injunction is. For this we must resort to the instrument itself. The words are, "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." If words are the fixed representatives of ideas; if they convey to the mind any distinct meaning; what idea, let me ask, is represented, what meaning is conveyed by the words "shall hold their offices during good behaviour?" When they proceed from an authority, which admits of no opposition, which cannot be disobeyed, they amount, certainly, to an exclusion of any other possible mode of terminating the office, by the act of government, than by convicting the officer of a breach of good behaviour. They "shall hold their offices during good behaviour," is certainly equivalent to saying they shall hold their offices until they misbehave. And this imperative sentence will admit of the substitution of no other event for misbehaviour, unless it be by an equivalent authority. If their offices may be terminated by the legislative will, expressed by the repeal of the law, or in any other manner, then they do not hold their offices during good behaviour, merely, but during the will of the legislature also.... But the words of the constitution do not admit of any additional condition, encumbering the pure tenure of good behaviour. They unequivocally exclude any other condition. The mind is irresistibly referred to the conduct of a person holding a commission during good behaviour, as the sole standard, by which his right to remain in office can be measured.

If a person, declared by the constitution to be in office during good behaviour, can be removed by the legislature, then, either the constitution does not bind the legislature, or good behaviour and legislative will are synonymous terms.

The first part of the proposition has long since been decided, and the last can be, by the common sense of mankind, but in one manner. I appeal to every man, learned and unlearned, and do not fear finding one, who will assert that the two phrases make on his mind the same impression; that he understands by an office held during good behaviour, an office held during the will of the legislature.

A mode of eluding the intent of the constitution has by some been suggested. These ingenious gentlemen have discovered, that, though the man cannot be removed from his office, yet the office can be removed from the man. As if an office could be holden during good behaviour, and could yet be separated from the holder, by other means than his misbehaviour. This rare piece of cunning, unworthy the integrity of the American character, will not serve the purpose of those, who resort to it. The plain stubborn words of the constitution admit of no such evasion. The man does not hold an office, if the office be struck from his hands.... When a superior, having a right to command, ordains that an office shall be held for a certain time, or until a certain event, the inferior, who, by any means, forces that office out of his hands, before the period arrives, or the event happens, which is to terminate its duration, plainly disobeys the order of his superior; so when a constitution ordains that a judge shall hold an office during good behaviour, the legislature, which would deprive him of that office, without misbehaviour, equally disobeys the plain mandate of the constitution, whether the illicit attempt be made, by removing the man, or annihilating the office.

Those, who maintain the existence of this power in the legislature, are reduced to the necessity of contending substantially, that where the constitution forbids a particular object, that object may be effected circuitously, though not directly: that a measure may be adopted, which, by a necessary consequence, produces the forbidden effect, although the effect cannot be immediately produced. This unworthy artifice can impose on no man. All those, who read the constitution, must perceive that it is the end itself, and not the mean effecting the end, to which that instrument attends; and, consequently, all means, which defeat the end proposed, are alike unlawful.

It cannot escape the most cursory observer, that the views of the constitution must be as entirely defeated, and the independence of the judges as entirely destroyed, in allowing the legislature to deprive them of office, by destroying it, as by removing them from it. In the one mode or the other, the judge becomes entirely dependent on the legislature, who may, at will, terminate his official character. Indeed it would be a work of more difficulty to feign accusations against an upright judge, in order to justify his removal, than to discover that the public good requires some modification of the courts, which would silently displace one set of men, to make room for another.

But if gentlemen could solace themselves under this apparent violation of the constitution, by the miserable attempt at evasion, which has been noticed, even this consolation is unattainable. The office cannot be put down. It is that of a judge, not of this or that circuit, but of the United States. By the express words of the act of congress, the judges, who perform the circuit duty, are judges of the United States. The office to be abolished is that of a judge of the United States.

Have we already made such a progress in a system of reasoning, which is to destroy the constitution of our country, as to come to a conclusion, that the office of a judge of the United States may be abolished by a legislative act?

In the succeeding number, the public attention will be solicited to some opinions, which deserve to be respectfully considered, because they were formed at a time, or on an occasion, when talents and patriotism were not obscured by the spirit of party.

No. III.

AMONG the various commentaries on the American constitution, which were offered to the consideration of the public, while the question of its adoption was depending, no one has acquired or deserved so much reputation, as that written under the signature of PUBLIUS. It is worthy of the pens, to which it has been ascribed: and, while other productions on the same subject have passed away with the occasion, which gave them birth, this valuable political treatise not only continues to be read with admiration, but is resorted to by all parties, as containing the best exposition ever yet presented to the public eye, of the constitution of our country. To this contemporaneous exposition I will now beg leave to refer.

In his seventy-eighth number, PUBLIUS says:.... "According to the plan of the convention, all the judges, who may be appointed by the United States, are to hold their offices during good behaviour, which is conformable to the most approved of the state constitutions, and, amongst the rest, to that of this state. Its propriety having been drawn into question by the adversaries of that plan, is no light symptom of the rage for objection, which disorders their imaginations and judgments. The standard of good behaviour for the continuance in office of the judicial magistracy, is certainly one of the most valuable of the modern improvements in the practice of government. In a monarchy, it is an excellent barrier to the despotism of the prince; in a republic it is no less an excellent barrier to the encroachments and oppressions of the representative body. And it is the best expedient, which can be devised in any government, to secure a steady, upright, and impartial administration of the laws." The residue of the chapter, which is too long to be quoted, contains a very able argument, demonstrating the policy of making the judicial independent of the legislative authority.

It will be readily perceived, and the circumstance is not unworthy of attention, that PUBLIUS does not attempt to prove that the judges, the tenure of whose office is during good behaviour, cannot be deprived of their offices by any legislative act; but, considering that as a position, too clear to be contested, proceeds to defend it. It is also worthy of remark, that no one of those, whose "rage for objection disordered their imaginations and judgments," counted sufficiently on the public folly to hazard the opinion, that men, who were, by the constitution, fixed in their offices, during good behaviour, could, without violating that constitution, be removed by any measure of any department of government. The friends and the enemies of that instrument concurred in a construction, so obviously required by its words.

When the conventions of the states assembled severally, to deliberate on the great question submitted to their decision, and on which the preservation of the union was believed to depend, it will be admitted, that human ingenuity was put on the rack, to devise objections to the instrument under their consideration. The article, relative to the judiciary of the United States, like every other article in the constitution, was scrutinized, with a wish to condemn. It was objected, that the judges were not sufficiently independent of the legislature, because the power of raising their salaries existed; but no one objector, so far as I am informed of the debates of the conventions, was wild enough to imagine, that they were in fact dependent on the legislature, by holding offices which congress could terminate.

It is not known, that in any of the states, except Virginia, this question has been discussed, in relation to the rights of the state judges. As that state, however, is acknowledged to lead, in the present political system, and as some of its members are understood to be peculiarly ardent in support of the measure, here reprobated as a most daring invasion of the constitution, applicable precedents of construction, drawn from thence, cannot be considered as totally improper.

The constitution of Virginia declares, that "the two houses of assembly shall, by joint ballot, appoint judges of the supreme court of appeals, and general court, judges in chancery, judges of admiralty, secretary, and the attorney general, to be commissioned by the governor, and continue in office, during good behaviour."

Another clause subjects them to impeachment for misbehaviour.

By the first judicial system of Virginia, one general court was constituted, with original common law jurisdiction, throughout the state; there was also one court of chancery, with an equitable jurisdiction, equally extensive. To these was added a court of admiralty.... and the judges of the court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty were, by law, declared to constitute the court of appeals. As judges of appeals, no commission was given them. The general court became manifestly incompetent to the business assigned it; and, in order to avoid delays, which amounted to a refusal of justice, a change of system, the necessity of which had become apparent to all, was resolved on.

In 1787, this subject was taken up by the legislature; a system of circuit courts was adopted, and it was enacted, that the judges of the court of appeals should perform the duty of circuit judges. This law the judges refused to execute, as unconstitutional, and agreed unanimously, Edmund Pendleton, George Wythe, John Blair, Paul Carrington, Peter Lyons, William Fleming, Henry Tazewell, Richard Cary, James Henry, and John Tyler being present, on a remonstrance, from which will be extracted such parts, as are deemed applicable to the present inquiry.

After lamenting the necessity of deciding a question between a law and the constitution, and that in a case personally interesting to the judges themselves, they say:

"On this view of the subject, the following alternatives presented themselves to the court; either to decide these questions, or resign their offices. The latter would have been their choice, if they could have considered these questions, as affecting their individual interests only; but, viewing them as relating to their office, and finding themselves called by their country, to sustain an important post, as one of the three pillars on which the great fabric of government was erected, they judged, that a resignation would subject them to the reproach of deserting their station, and betraying the sacred interests of society intrusted with them, and on that ground, found themselves obliged to decide, however their delicacy might be wounded, or whatever temporary inconveniences might ensue; and, in that decision, to declare, that the constitution and the act are in opposition, and cannot exist together; and that the former must controul the operation of the latter.

"The propriety and necessity of the independence of the judges is evident in reason, and the nature of the office; since they are to decide between government and the people, as well as between contending citizens; and, if they be dependent on either, corrupt influence may be apprehended, sacrificing the innocent to popular prejudice, and subjecting the poor to oppression and persecution, by the rich. And this applies more forcibly to exclude a dependence on the legislature, a branch of whom, in cases of impeachment, is itself a party.

"This principle supposed, the court are led to consider, whether the people have secured or departed from it, in their constitution or form of government. In that solemn act, they discover the people, distributing the governmental powers into three great branches, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in order to preserve that equipoise, which they judged necessary to secure their liberty; declaring, that those powers be kept separate and distinct from each other, and that no person shall exercise, at the same time, an office in more than one of them. The independence of the two former could not be admitted, because, in them, a long continuance in office might be dangerous to liberty, and therefore they provided for a change, by frequent elections; at stated periods; but, in the last, from the influence of the principle before observed upon, they declared, that the judges should hold their offices during good behaviour. Their independence would have been rendered complete, by fixing the quantum of their salaries."

After stating the vast increase of duty, without a correspondent increase of salary, which they deemed such an attack on their independence, that it would be inconsistent with a conscientious discharge of duty to pass it over, they say: "For vain would be the precaution of the founders of our government to secure liberty, if the legislature, though restrained from changing the tenure of judicial offices, are at liberty to compel a resignation, by reducing salaries to a copper, or by making it part of the official duty, to become hewers of wood, or drawers of water."

Without attempting to defend, in its full extent, the opinion advanced by the court of appeals of Virginia, an opinion which very clearly goes beyond the letter of the constitution, and beyond the principles maintained in these numbers, the public attention is solicited to some parts of it, which are believed to be unquestionably correct in themselves, and which are peculiarly applicable to the subject we are discussing.

The judges consider themselves as forming "one of the three pillars, on which the great fabric of government was erected," and that, when this pillar was endangered, "a resignation would subject them to the reproach of deserting their station, and betraying the sacred interests of society, intrusted with them." They say, that "the propriety and necessity of the independence of the judges is evident in reason, and the nature of their office;" and "this," they say, "applies more forcibly to exclude a dependence on the legislature, a branch of whom, in cases of impeachment, is itself a party." Under the influence of these principles, the people, continues the court of appeals, have, in their form of government, "declared that the judges should hold their offices, during good behaviour. Their independence would have been rendered complete, by fixing the quantum of their salaries."

According to the unanimous opinion then, of all the judges of Virginia, an office held under the constitution, during good behaviour, and of which the quantum of salary is fixed, is completely independent of the legislature; and, whenever the legislature can be so unmindful of its high duties, as to assail the independence of the judiciary, the "constitution and the act are in opposition, and cannot exist together, and the former must controul the operation of the latter."

The legislature appears to have acquiesced under this decision of the court. The law was new modelled. A separate court of appeals was established, the judges of which were to be elected by joint ballot, in conformity with the constitution. Several members were added to the general court, and it was declared to be their duty to ride the circuits. The judges of the court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty, who had not been elected, in pursuance of the constitution, judges of the court of appeals, but on whom that duty was imposed by law, were relieved from the further discharge of it. In making this arrangement, several of the judges were understood to have been consulted; and, on the ballot, the six senior judges were elected, five into the court of appeals, and the sixth into the court of chancery.

Yet this arrangement, so agreeable to many of them, and formed in concert with them, was not accepted without a protest, asserting their rights.

On the fifth of March, 1789, the act was laid before them, Mr. Pendleton, Mr. Wythe, Mr. Blair, Mr. Lyons, Mr. Fleming, Mr. Mercer, Mr. Parker, Mr. Cary, and Mr. Tyler being present, when, after stating reasons for not proceeding on the docket, they say: "But, before the close of their session, they conceive (however painful the repetition) that they are again under an indispensable obligation to advert to an act of assembly, which they are constrained to consider as incompatible with their independence. The act intended, is an act of the last session, for amending the act entitled 'an act constituting the court of appeals.' The direct operation of this law is the amotion from office, of the whole bench of judges of appeals, and the appointment of new judges to the same court.

"But although the office of a judge of the former court of appeals was in the mode of election as established by the act of 1779, accessory and appendant to an office in one of the superior courts, yet a judge of this supreme court properly invested, was by the constitution intended to be equally independent and equally secure in the enjoyment of that office as of the office of judge of one of the superior courts to which it is annexed, and therefore could not be constitutionally deprived of it.

It appears to the court probable that the general assembly were so much engrossed by the idea of the utility of their great object, the establishment of district courts, as either to have overlooked this difficulty which stood in their way, or, if they perceived it, to have counted on the acquiescence of those whose rights were thus to be invaded; and in this expectation (if it was indeed entertained) the legislature were not deceived. The court is truly willing to make any voluntary sacrifice for the attainment of so desirable an object as the establishment of courts which by the expeditious administration of justice, will not only give that relief to suffering creditors which has already been too long withheld from them, but contribute much to the increase of industry and improvement of the morals of the people. Yet whatever concessions this court may be willing to make, they think it their duty to guard against encroachment. And in conformity to these sentiments, after protesting against every invasion of the judiciary establishment or any deprivation of office in that line in any other mode than is pointed out in the constitution,* they do hereby in their mere free will in order to make way for the salutary system lately adopted, resign their appointment as judges of the court of appeals, and as they do not hold any separate commission for that office which might be returned, do order the same to be recorded."

It is to be recollected that by the act here noticed, no judge was to be divested of his judicial character or of his salary. No constitutional court of appeal then existed. No judges had been elected or commissioned for that court in the manner prescribed by the constitution, and its duties had been assigned by an ordinary legislative act, to the judges of the court of chancery, general court, and court of admiralty. The legislature thought itself competent to relieve these judges from this extra duty, but without diminishing their salaries, and to erect a court of appeals in pursuance of the constitution. The judges in this state of things, delivered opinions, which, however, they might have been misapplied on that occasion, are unquestionably correct in themselves, and directly applicable to the present situation of the circuit judges of the United States. They declare, that "they are constrained to consider" the act repealing the law by which the court of appeals was constituted, "as incompatible with their independence." That a judge of the supreme court properly invested was intended by the constitution to be equally independent and equally secure in the enjoyment of that office, as of the office of judge of one of the superior courts to which it was annexed, and, therefore, could not be constitutionally deprived of it." That "whatever concessions the court may be willing to make, they think it their duty to guard against encroachments;" and they protest "against every invasion of the judiciary establishment," or "any deprivation of office in that line in any other mode than is pointed out in the constitution."

These were the sentiments of the court of appeals of Virginia, when that court was composed of all the judges of the commonwealth, and when its bench was graced with law characters of whom she does not yet cease to boast. The miserable quibble (if indeed it be not even below that epithet) of distinguishing between a blow at the office and at the man, was then undiscovered. The judges declare that they cannot be constitutionally deprived of office. And this declaration is made in consequence of a law repealing that by which the duties of judges of appeals were assigned to them. Their protest is against every legislative invasion of the judiciary establishments, and any legislative deprication of office, no matter by what mode, as unconstitutional. It was at that time the opinion of Virginia that no means could be lawful, which were adopted to effect an unlawful end.

FESTOON OF FASHION. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AS it is notorious that the Ladies of America neither paint their cheeks, nor "daub their tempers o'er with washes, as artificial as their faces," we publish the following merely as a satire upon European deception. We do not dream that any Domestic application can be made.

Great praise is unquestionably due to those beautifiers of the human countenance, the inventors of Cosmetics, aided by the miraculous powers of lotions and tinctures, new beauties reanimate the face, and we behold the roscate bloom of youth smile like morning light on the varnished visage of age.

While a superabundance of paints and lotions renovate beauty, the fair artist daily improves in taste; she guides the pencil with such skill over every line of her face, and imitates nature with such elegance that we may soon be able to boast of female portrait painters, who will excel, even sir Joshua Reynolds himself. One great advantage in favour of female genius in this instance is the superior texture of the skin to canvas, or any other artificial ground. It is to be regretted, however, that too many of our female artists grow negligent after marriage, and, reflecting that the portrait is sold, take little pains to improve its tints; nay, it is asserted, that they often become hideously deformed in a few years. This is certainly a great imperfection, for the works of the most eminent male artists have generally become more estimable in the eyes of the connoisseur in proportion to their antiquity.

As it is a matter of infinite importance that the Belles of Philadelphia should be acquainted with the movements of the belles of New-York, we hasten with the speed of a Lauriston, to communicate the following from the "New-York Evening Post."

On new year's eve the City Assemblies commenced for the season, with a display of much beauty and fashion: the company though not large was select and brilliant. The Ball was particularly distinguished, by the presence of six young ladies, who had chosen this evening for their first appearance; and whose attractions promise to add much to the brilliance of our succeeding assemblies.

It was further honoured by the attendance of the lovely Mrs. F——, who made her bridal debut with undiminished charms, and received from the managers the customary compliment.

At eleven, a handsome cold collation was served up: in which was provided, with a laudable omission of expensive superfluities, an abundant supply of such substantial refreshment as the season affords. After the active amusement of the evening, the pinion of a partridge appeared not unacceptable to the most youthful and delicate of the party: while the ladies of a certain age, to speak in courtly French style, whose pleasure had been derived from witnessing the enjoyment of their juvenile friends, regaled with the sedatest satisfaction on the plentiful variety of wild and tame with which the tables were furnished.

After being invigorated by this seasonable repast, the company returned to their favourite amusement; and, with great good humor, bade adieu to the past, and welcomed the present year.

Rose in the prevailing colour at Paris. They seem to use reluctantly black velvet for the hats of the season. Black crape hats are still much worn; on these are remarked large comets, placed at equal distances, and forming chequered squares. The morning caps are of white crape, and have bands of Chinese ribbon across them. The ends of the ribbons are left very long, and cut in the form of horns. The horns are particularly noticed on the Spartie straw hats.—Short jackets have replaced the spencers.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

—Proposals, by G. F. Hopkins, No. 113, Pearl street, New-York, for publishing, by subscription, in two handsome octavo volumes, THE FEDERALIST, on the New Constitution, by Publius; written in 1788. To which is added, PACIFICUS, on the Proclamation of Neutrality, written in 1793. The whole revised and corrected, with new passages and notes.....The Federalist was written in a series of numbers, under the signature of Publius, shortly after the promulgation of the federal constitution, addressed to the people of the state of New-York, with the design of enforcing the propriety and necessity of its adoption. It is principally the production of a man, whose name will be held in sacred respect long after the pitiful attempts, which have been made to slander his fame, shall have sunk into oblivion. Two other gentlemen, of distinguished talents, occasionally contributed some essays, which will be marked in the publication*. All parties seem, at length, united in professions of regard for the constitution; if they are sincere, the consideration cannot fail to enhance the value of a work, which, by employing all the energy of argument, and all the persuasion of eloquence, was eminently useful in promoting its general ratification. Whoever is desirous of being well informed of the principles and provisions of our government, and the manner, in which they have been supported and vindicated; of the objections, that were made to the constitution by its first opposers, and how they were answered, will find these volumes fraught with ample and satisfactory instruction. The study of them must form an essential part of the education of the American statesman. Politicians, indeed, of every country, will here discover materials in the science of government, well worthy of their attention; a science, of all others, the most interesting to mankind, as it most deeply concerns human happiness. The Federalist contains principles, that may be remembered and studied with advantage, by all classes of men, in other countries than our own, and in other ages from that, in which we live. The people of America, alone, have afforded the example of a pure representative republic. In this work it will appear, that the principles of this form of government have been well understood, and thoroughly developed; and should, uniformly, the experiment which we have made, hereafter fail, it will be in vain to attempt the renewal of similar systems, as no rational hope can be entertained, that more correct notions, on this subject, will prevail, than are here exhibited. To preserve these papers, therefore, which have so much intrinsic merit, and such lasting utility, in a dress suitable to their character, is the inducement to their re-publication. Pacificus is from the pen of the same enlightened statesman, who was the chief author of the Federalist. These essays were written in defence of the first leading step, which our government took to preserve that neutrality, which it continued to maintain, during the late Trans-Atlantic conflict; a conflict, which has annihilated the minor powers of Europe; and shaken the civilised world. Now that the storm has passed over, and the angry and tumultuous passions, which, at that time, agitated our country have, in some measure, subsided, these papers will be read with profit and pleasure, by the intelligent man of every party. Candour will probably wonder, that any should have doubted of the fitness of the measures, which this writer has so ably advocated, and which experience has so forcibly proved to have been the best adapted to the interests of the country. To give to these latter essays a form which shall outlive the fleeting impressions of a newspaper, they are incorporated in these volumes. Publius and Pacificus will serve to keep in just remembrance two very important events in the history of our country.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE annual ode, by the Connecticut wits, for the new year, sarcastically opens in the following manner, at the expense of our political visionaries:

" Oft has the period been foretold,
By prophets and by seers of old,
When men and beasts should all be blest,
With long and universal rest;
When fists no more 'gainst fists should rise,
No bloody nose, no blacken'd eyes,
When galls should into taverns turn,
The gallows be cut up to burn,
"Oppress'd humanity" no more
Should wander to Botania's shore;
But birds of every note and feather,
And snakes and toads should flock together,
And bears and wolves should learn to browse,
And go to pasture with our cows.
Then every child, well brac'd with health,
Well fed, well cloath'd, and fill'd with wealth,
No crows in his bosom ranking,
Shall die as old as Dr. Franklin.
And Satan, source of all our evils,
Chief Consul of the other devils,
Shall for his sins, and tricks, and strife,
To Sanbury mines be sent for life.
That this best moon approacheth nigh
Behold the beams in yonder sky.
The cock has crow'd; from spray to spray
The songs ere greet the god of day;
The day-spring dres the east with red,
And smiles on every mountain's head.

A late writer, of some humour and knowledge of the world, introduces, in an ingenious novel, the characters of a libertine and a man of chaste habits and deportment. The former is made to say, that he should avoid marriage, on the principle, that it would be impossible to keep the flame of love burning longer than during one moon. The other, in reply, dryly observes, that this is precisely the case of the man, who declines partaking of a good dinner, lest it should spoil his appetite. [P. Museum.]

A New-York paper mentions the marriage of a Mr. Wallace to miss Helena Fortan. All Fortan's daughters, but the eldest, is a common toast. We hope Mr. Wallace is not wedded to miss fo-

tune, but that he is rich with the boon of a smiling sister, and that he may have reason loudly to laugh

"Quoties voluit Fortuna jocari."

The "New-England Palladium" commences the new year with augmented spirit. The daily increase of the value and circulation of this excellent paper is manifest to every delighted reader. No paper in the union receives so much literary and political aid.

One can scarcely forbear smiling at a marginal note of lord COKE, in which he gravely acquaints his reader with an excellence, which he might otherwise have overlooked: "This," says he, "is the thirty-third time that Virgil hath been quoted in this work." The mixture, however, is so preposterous, that to those, who can read Coke with pleasure, these passages will appear like a dancer, who should intrude on the solemnity of a senate; and to those, who have a taste only for polite literature like a fountain or a palm tree, in the deserts of Arabia.

A Wilkesbarre wit, with many an arch allusion to a great man's speech, thus describes the "procedure" of a herd of kine, a sort of democratic party, rather more respectable, in point of talents, sense, and integrity, than any popular herd.

"On Thursday last, a number of democratic cows held a meeting, for the purpose of devising means to 'restore harmony to social intercourse,' when it was observed, that the only sure method of accomplishing this desirable end, would be, by seizing on all the federal cow bells, and giving them to the democratic cows; until this should be done, it was contended that the cows, without bells, would keep up a continual bellowing, and peace could not be expected. A cow of a different 'sect' was opposed to the motion, as unjust, but the mob, in their zeal for peace, declared the end would justify the means, and, to prevent any further opposition to their laudable plan, rushed upon the unfortunate cow, and gored her to death."

The Editor of the Gazette of the United States, in a late paper, indulges himself in some very successful sneers, at the expense of the administration. He laughingly tells us, that since, unhappily, we are doomed to have the monied matters of the treasury conducted by a foreigner, one would suppose we might, at least, have the treasury language managed by an American. In the late report of the secretary, there is such a derangement and confusion of the auxiliary verbs and prepositions, that, in some places the language is totally unintelligible. Mr. Gallatin should be reminded of the anecdote of the unfortunate Frenchman, who, in falling into the Thames, cried out, "I will be drowned, nobody shall save me."

It is said, that commodore Dale is to be tried, for the indignity brought upon the American flag, by feeding his crew on English beef at Gibraltar. It is understood, that the commodore means to rebut the charge, by proving that he employed French cooks....ibid.

The attorney general of the United States is supposed to be the author of a series of rumbling and incorrect essays, called "The Worcester Farmer."

When the Mammoth cheese arrived at Washington, the president, as we are informed by the Evening Post, stood in his door to receive it, dressed in his suit of customary black, with shoes on, that closed tight round his ankles, laced up with neat leathern strings, and absolutely without buckles, considering them as superfluous and anti-republican, especially when a man has strings.

A northern paper wittily proposes the following cheap method of radical reform:

"Take the salaries of all the judges, and divide their amount by the number of cases which have been decided, and the quotient will show the cost of each decision. Then, by another operation, see whether the justice is worth the money."

Certain it is, says a grave writer, that the finest show in the world excites but little curiosity in those, who have seen it before. "That was a very fine picture," says the connoisseur, "but I had seen it before." "Twas a sweet song," says the amateur, "but I had heard it before." "A very fine poem," says the critic, "but I had read it before." Let every lady, therefore, take care, that, while she is displaying in public, a bosom whiter than snow, the men do not look as if they were saying, "Tis very pretty, but we have seen it before!"

What HORACE WALPOLE and lord CHESTERFIELD thought on the undress of the ladies, in the year 1753, may, perhaps, be applicable to some of our Talliens.

"It may be urged that the nakedness in fashion is intended only to be emblematical of the innocence of the present generation of young ladies, as we read of our first mother, before the fall, that 'she was naked, and not ashamed; but one cannot help thinking, that her daughters of these days should convince us, that they are entirely free from original sin, as well as actual transgression, or else be ashamed of their nakedness.'"

Some of our sensitive politicians of the new sect, talk, amid the figures of arithmetic, a great deal about public "sensation," and "public sensibility.".... Mr. DANA, member of congress from the state of Connecticut, a sound and spirited politician, who, in the worst of times, has the courage, careless of a vulgar popularity, boldly to express, what he justly conceives, lately declared:

"He could not, for his part, feel all that horror of public sensibility that had been pourtrayed. What have we to fear, suppose we interfere with that sensibility? If we do so, in the discharge of our duty, he was perfectly willing it should be excited; nay, it would be useful to the people themselves."

These sentiments are not at all to the taste of the frantic populace, the infuriated democrats, and "acquitted felons" of this distracted country.

The ridiculous mummery of the "Mammoth cheese," and the curious circumstance of its being conveyed to Washington by a priest, are most poetically satirized in the new year's verses at Hartford:

"A parson LELAND too at ease,
High mounted on a Mammoth cheese,
From curds and skimmers lifts his sight,
Like Moses on Mount Pisgah's height;
Thro' whey and rennet darts his eye,
And sees new milk beyond the sky!"

This place has been lately honoured with a visit of the learned pig; and we might have been wonderfully edified by this time, if he had not been hurried away, the swinish multitude, perhaps, being displeased to see any creature that is wiser than themselves.

A correspondent doubts, whether the presence of the learned pig may not be necessary at the Federal City, for putting an end to the disputes that prevail there at present. It is certain he set off thither, in great haste; but it is all in vain for us to dive into the secret motives of pigs and politicians.

There seems to be a perfect opposition betwixt the views of the founders of seminaries in former times, and those of our enlightened age. The founders of seminaries in Europe, took care that learned men should eat and drink, and be free from care and anxiety for their support, being persuaded that, in that situation, they would exert themselves most effectually, for promoting the interests of learning; and the respect that was paid them, by persons of all ranks, gave weight and authority to their instructions. But, in our glorious republics, men of letters are hired, like mechanics, at the lowest rate that they can be found, and a certain labour, or opus operatum, is imposed on them, by ignorant task-masters, who proceed on mere mechanical ideas, and consider the business of instructing youth, as entirely the same with that of squaring logs, or hammering bar iron, on which a certain number of percussions produce a certain and determinate effect. They insist that you should make bricks, not only without straw, but without clay, fit for the purpose, and accuse you of idleness or incapacity, if you do not perform impossibilities. When this grievance will be removed, is dubious. It is certain that it never will be removed, during the reign of the sovereign people.

One of the most remarkable events of the present time is, that Mr. Jefferson has been seen at church, and has assisted in singing the hundredth psalm. But whether his devotions were addressed to one God, or to twenty Gods, or to no God, or to the sovereign people, by whom Robespierre was wont to swear as the Supreme Being, neither his own writings, nor our information enable us to determine. It is probable, however, that he prayed that his legs might not be broken, nor his pockets picked, that he might continue to be president, and not be obliged to pay his British debts. It is uncertain whether he offered any petition for the people; nor can we imagine what he could ask for them, according to his principles, as they are already possessed of all power, all wisdom, and all property. If he asked any thing for them, it is probable that he prayed they might enjoy as much liberty and peace under his administration, as the citizens of the French republic enjoy, under the dominion of Buonaparte, or as the negroes of St. Domingo, "God's chosen people, if he ever had a chosen people," enjoy, under the dominion of Touissant.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. II.

I CANNOT insert the following favours from correspondents, without returning them my thanks. I had anticipated the approach of another Saturday, with some degree of dismay; for, with my usual procrastination, I had deferred the performance of my task, till too late a period, and had intended, to have announced that the Lounger, would in future, make his appearance once a fortnight, when an examination of the letter-box relieved me from my anxiety.

The subject of the first letter renders it somewhat doubtful, whether it were intended for insertion in my paper, or for my private admonition only. If in publishing it, I have done wrong, I ask pardon of my correspondent. His letter sets in a strong point of view, some of the difficulties, which attend the writer of a periodical paper; and besides, it helps to fill a column which the indolence of the Lounger, might perhaps have induced him to leave unoccupied.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

From the earliest appearance of the Port-Folio, I have been in constant expectation of seeing the commencement of a series of essays, upon a plan, similar to that pursued by the periodical writers of Great-Britain. It had always appeared to me, that such a paper would afford the most convenient vehicle, for fugitive remarks, or good-humoured satire on the topics of the day. I was disappointed upon seeing the year close without any such plan having been attempted, and was proportionably gratified, when I saw the second volume commence with an "American Lounger." Now that such an undertaking is begun, although you have my best wishes for its success, I cannot help being apprehensive of its failure. You disclaim, with much propriety, every idea of wounding private feeling; and you declare, and I am sure that I am not disposed, for an instant, to question your sincerity, that "personal satire, or private malevolence shall never pollute your pages." Yet I doubt, pardon my abruptness, whether your assertion will be generally credited. In your speculations upon characters and manners, you will probably be inclined to fix the scene of action, to "give to airy nothing, a local habitation, and a name;" and if you do this, I consider the existence of your paper in jeopardy. It will afford amusement and interest to the curiosity of some readers, and to the malignity of others, to trace out the real or supposed resemblances of the characters which you may draw; and if the scene be laid in any street, from Vine to South in one direction, or from Delaware to Schuylkill in the other; the name of the person supposed to be alluded to, will be confidently "proclaimed upon the housetops," although their names, their persons, and their chaacters may be equally unknown to you. Even personal vanity, (and who is exempt from this?) will perhaps induce some persons to think themselves brought by you into notice, whom you might deem absolutely below it. Impelled by a feeling similar to that which actuated the artist so pleasantly introduced in one of Peter Pindar's earlier publications, they may perhaps think with him, that it is "better be damn'd than mention'd not at all."

Upon this rock, I fear that your newly-launched bark will most probably split; at the same time, I can with truth say, that I hope, that my prediction will prove a mistaken one; and with wishes for its successful career,

I am sir,

Your friend and well wisher,

MONITOR.

In answer to my correspondent "Monitor," I can only say, that I had, in some degree anticipated the dangers which he points out. He has indeed displayed them before me in a more formidable light, than I had been accustomed to contemplate them. The experiment, however, shall be made: with what degree of success, time only can determine.

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

SIR,

"THERE is an evil under the sun," of no great magnitude, it must be confessed, but sufficient, nevertheless, to induce the wish that it were corrected. I allude to the habit of interlarding common conversation, with cant phrases, from the fashionable dramas of the day. I well remember, that when the Road to Ruin was first exhibited on the American Stage, every one, who aspired to fashionable ease in conversation, introduced the phrase, "That's your Sort," into one sentence at least out of every three, to which he gave utterance. "The Cure for the Heart-ach" deluged the city with young Rapid's characteristic injunction, "Dash on, keep Moving;" and there have recently appeared some symptoms of a general adoption of Ollapod's facetious acknowledgment "I owe you one." This phrase, however, I humbly hope, will not continue in fashion much longer, as it has already descended among the very dregs of the community. Passing, a few evenings since, along Fifth-street, I observed under the wall of the State-house garden, two black fair ones, who were engaged in a scene of most vehement altercation. Their clamours were, for some time, equally loud; till at length, one of them suddenly ceased from reply, and coolly walked away. Her enraged adversary followed her retreat; with a repetition of that monosyllable, which is said by the facetious Henry Fielding, to be, of all other, the most offensive to female ears, and the purport of which he conveys by the more modest periphrasis of she dog. The other turned round, dropt a courtsey with the most provoking composure; and simply replied, "Thank you Mqam" with a drawl upon the a, which, if sounds could be measured by feet, would have extended to a yard at least, "I owe you one,"

As I look upon you sir, to be in some degree a censor morum, an inspector of the minor morals of our city, I must request you to declare, by your censorial authority that the use of these phrases, is prohibited in all polite companies for the future.

I am, sir, yours, &c.

OMICRON.

My correspondent Omicron, shews, by his request, that he entertains by far too exalted an opinion of the extent of my authority. But even if it were a just one, I should be cautious of promulgating the required declaration. Such a step would rob the conversation of several worthy young gentlemen with whom I have the honour of being acquainted, of the only rhetorical figures, with which it is ever embellished; and would at once, condemn them, either to absolute silence, or, to discussion of the state of the weather, and the occurrences of the tea-party of the preceding evening.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

WE must now call up in review a host of plays, which the temporary suspension of the Port-Folio has compelled us to neglect. Of "Harlequin Invasion" a pantomime, which followed up "The Wedding in Wales," justice obliges us to speak harshly. When we remember that it is the production of Garrick, that when originally represented it was the favorite of the nation, and detained many a gazing croud, we were astonished at the pitiful appearance which it made here. The proverbial patience of a Philadelphia audience was exhausted long before the curtain dropped;

"And welcome sleep reliev'd the drowsy pit"

From a mangled entertainment, in which neither memory nor judgment, nor fancy appeared to take any part.

During the holidays, George Barnwell was represented to confirm or correct the principles of the 'prentices of Philadelphia. Mr. Cain, in the character of the tempted youth, displayed occasional excellence, but, from timidity, indifference, or lassitude, he was too often languid and uninteresting. Mrs. Whitlock acted admirably the part of Millwood, a courtizan of no vulgar class, a strange compound of dignity and meanness, whose infamy excites abhorrence, yet whose talents extort reluctant admiration.

After the tragedy a new pantomimical drama was represented, for the first time, called, Obi, or Three Finger'd Jack. Entertainments of this class, are in general, calculated for the meridian of the holiday frequenters of the theatre only, but this is, by no means, the case with the piece under consideration. It is an interesting dramatic story, well told in action. Obi is said to be the appellation of a species of witch-craft, in use among the negroes; the exercise of which has been, if we mistake not, prohibited in the West-Indies under the severest penalties: as the superstitious reverence connected with it, animated the possessor of it, in the cause of the villainy, and paralyzed the opposition of the innocent, who were destitute of this mysterious protection. An advertisement containing various extracts on this subject from the writings of Dr. Moseley, is prefixed to the book of the songs in this drama; it exhibits a curious proof of the uniformity of the operations of superstition in all countries. The mysterious rites of Canidia, as related by Horace, the dark spells of the witches in Macbeth as portrayed by the pencil of Shakespeare, and the revolting ingredients in the charmed composition of the Obi magician, as specified by Dr. Moseley, all bear striking analogy to each other: Fortified by the awe, inspired by the possession of spells of this kind, and by his own desperate valour, Three Finger'd Jack was long the terror of a certain district in the island of Jamaica. He was at length, suddenly discovered by three negroes, two men and a boy, who had long been engaged in the pursuit of him, and after a desperate conflict was slain. This outline of his real history is faithfully adhered to: But other incidents have been interwoven in the tissue of this piece, which considerably improve its dramatic effect.

This drama commences with the festivities of the negroes on account of the birth-day of Rosa, their master's daughter. An officer, sent in pursuit of Jack, arrives at the plantation, at this instant; and a mutual attachment takes place between him and Rosa. He is shortly after brought in wounded by Jack, whose name excites the terror of all the negroes. Upon his recovery, he goes on a shooting party with the planter, and being accidentally separated from him, his steps are unfortunately directed to the vicinity of Jack's retreat; he is again, desperately wounded by him, and dragged into the cave.—The disconsolate return of the planter strongly excites the interest of Rosa, and a proclamation is issued, offering freedom and a pecuniary reward to the destroyer of Jack. This offer stimulates Quashee and Sam, to undertake the achievement; Tuckey the captain's servant begs permission to accompany them, and before they depart they are joined by Rosa in boy's clothes. In the spot, which had proved so fatal to captain Orford, they are overtaken by a tempest, and Rosa takes shelter in the cave, while her companions continue the pursuit. Jack enters shortly afterwards, and forces her into the interior part of his retreat. He there compels her to perform the offices of a servant in providing the evening meal, and afterwards to sing him to sleep. Her ears are now assailed by a groan from a dungeon in the cavern, and the repetition of her own name. The door is opened, captain Orford is discovered, and a most interesting scene succeeds, in which, after baffling the numerous precautions adopted by Jack to secure his captives, they effect their escape. The piece concludes with the union of Orford and Rosa, and the festivities of the negroes, on account of the death of the ruffian, who had been so long the object of their terrors.

The interest of the story is increased by the songs and musical accompaniments, which are truly beautiful, and often highly appropriate. The scenery is in a style of superior excellence, and it was uniformly well performed. We should, however, be guilty of injustice, did we neglect to notice the striking excellence of Mrs. Snowden, in Rosa. Her action was at once graceful, interesting, and correct. Mr. Fullerton gave to Three-fingered Jack his appropriate force; and in his last conflict with his pursuers, was remarkable for the ferocious energy, with which he sustained it. Mrs. Oldmixon sang as charmingly as usual, and Miss Arnold gave new proofs of increasing vocal excellence.

As we did not scarcely for a moment listen to "The Lover's Vows," by one Kotzebue, we shall not stop an instant to speak of this jacobin, but hurry away to the comedy called "Life, or a Trip to Margate." This, though very well played, seems to be no favourite of the town; and even the pleasant character of Sir Harry Torpid induced but few to exclaim

"Life let us cherish,
Whilst yet the taper glows."

In "The Clandestine Marriage," we were charmed with the excellent performance of Mrs. Whitlock, in Fanny, and Mr. Bernard, as the decrepid and gallant nobleman. The mere appearance of the Swiss valet was, in Johnson's phrase, a constant renovation of merriment; and Mrs. Shaw, as Mrs. Heidleburg, deserved the most unqualified praise. We never witnessed a more picturesque and faithful exhibition of character.

The first part of Henry IV is one of the most amusing plays of Shakspeare. We always welcome its announcement with high pleasure, when we anticipate its correct performance. But, in the hands of the present theatrical corps, we confess our strongest, if not our only inducement to witness its representation, was Warren's Falstaff, and this alone beguiles an evening's hour.

We feel much gratified, when the managers hazard the loss of a few dollars, to indulge us with Shakspeare, and duly appreciate their motives. They have too much taste, and too high a regard for the goodly customs of our ancestors, to applaud the blasphemous modern philosophy, and the flat, uninteresting dialogue of Kotzebue, and of Holcroft. But the vitiated state of the times has made the vile forgeries of these philosophers pass current as coin, and the managers must receive it, or become bankrupt. Situated thus, they merit great applause, when they join the contest against the corruptions of an enlightened age! But their support is feeble, and prudence bids them take care of themselves.

Mr. Wignell played the king correctly. We praise his exertions, and respect his talents. He brings his whole stock into partnership, and what he can do, is cheerfully done. He seldom needs the prompter's aid.

Mr. Wood, it is our pleasure and our pride to praise. Educated on our boards, he is no exotic. We witness, with increasing satisfaction, the expansion of his powers. We see in him the legitimate successor of Moreton. He has toiled to acquire a slow, distinct, and clear pronunciation, and a graceful action, and his success is great. We would only remind him, that, in trying to speak slow, and articulate distinctly, he is oft inanimate. In the merry frolics of Hal, and in the military feats of the Prince of Wales, he discovered a pleasing contrast of powers. We can assure him that the studies of his closet shall be well rewarded, and when we reflect on his amiable deportment in the private circle, the reward shall be bestowed with increased pleasure.

It is unnecessary to speak of Falstaff. Mr. Warren seems to have understood the character of the fat knight "by instinct," and to have studied his part "without compulsion." Always correct, he was great in this character. If not the most brilliant, he is the most useful pillar of the stage, and supports his burthen well.

Why was the character of Hotspur burlesqued by Mr. Fullerton? He is not the successful adventurer

"To pluck bright honour from the pale-fac'd moon," nor will he obtain it on the boards of a theatre.... His voice is unmusically monotonous, and his action might be mended by an attention to Hamlet's advice to the players. We speak not this in bitterness. If there were no other performer to supply his place, or if he would content himself in a lower character, he might pass the stage doors uncensured. But to see him in the most prominent character, and that character Hotspur, is monstrous. How do these things happen? Did his own vanity, or the want of judgment of the managers deck him with the shield of the fiery and impetuous Fiercy. We believe it will prove no Ajax shield. Did not the voice of displeasure and contempt on this evening, teach him that he was in a situation, to which he is not entitled by his talents? Why does he represent characters, which the powers of Wignell, or Wood, or Cain, would render captivating?

We have little to say of the "Honest Thieves." It contains some humour. It was represented a season or two since. Why then was it announced in the bills as the first time of its representation?

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

NO. VI.

IN answer to the observations in the last number, it may perhaps be said, that the message meant nothing more than to condemn the recent multiplication of federal courts, and to bring them back to their original organization: considering it as adequate to all the purposes of the constitution; to all the ends of justice and policy.

Towards forming a right judgment on this subject, it may be useful to those, who are not familiar with the subject, to state, briefly, what was the former, and what is the present establishment.

The former consisted of one supreme court, with six judges, who, twice a year, made the tour of the United States, distributed into three circuits, for the trial of causes arising in the respective districts of each circuit; and of fifteen district courts, each having a single judge. The present consists of one supreme court, with the like number of judges, to be reduced, on the first vacancy happening, to five; of six circuit courts, having three distinct judges each, excepting one circuit, which has only a single circuit judge: and of twenty-two district courts, with a judge for each, as before: In both plans, the supreme court is to hold two terms at the seat of government, and the circuit courts to be holden twice a year in each district. The material difference in the two plans, as it respects the organs, by which they are executed, is reducible to the creation of twenty-three additional judges; sixteen for the six circuit courts, seven for the super-added district courts, and the addition of the necessary clerks, marshals, and subordinate officers of seven courts. This shews, at a single view, that the difference of expense, as applied to the United States, is of trifling consideration.

But here an inquiry naturally presents itself; why was the latter plan substituted to the former, and more economical one? The solution is easy and satisfactory. The first was inadequate to its object, and incapable of being carried into execution.....The extent of the United States is manifestly too large for the due attendance of the six judges in the circuit courts. The immense journeys they were obliged to perform, kept them from their families for several successive months in every year; this rendered the office a grievous burden, and had a strong tendency to banish or exclude men of the best talents and characters, from these important stations. It is known to have been no light inducement with one chief justice, whose health was delicate, to quit that office for another, attended with less bodily fatigue; and it is well understood, that other important members of the supreme court were prepared to resign their situations, if there had not been some alterations of the kind which has taken place. It was also no uncommon circumstance, for temporary interruptions in the health of particular judges, of whom only one was attached to a circuit, to occasion a failure in the sessions of the courts, to the no small disappointment, vexation, and loss of the suitor. At any rate, the necessity of visiting, within a given time, the numerous parts of an extensive circuit, unavoidably rendered the sessions of each court so short, that where suits were, in any degree multiplied or intricate, there was not time to get through the business with due deliberation. Besides all this, the incessant fatigues of the judges of the supreme court, and their long and frequent absences from home, prevented that continued attention to their studies, which even the most learned will confess to be necessary for those, entrusted in the last resort, with questions frequently novel, always of magnitude, affecting not only the property of individuals, but the rights of foreign nations, and the constitution of the country.

For these reasons, it became necessary either to renounce the circuit courts, or to constitute them differently: the latter was preferred. The United States were divided into six circuits, with a proper number of judges to preside over each. No man of discernment will pretend that the number of circuits is too great. Surely three states, forming an area of territory equal to that possessed by some of the first powers of Europe, must afford a quantity of business, sufficient to employ three judges on a circuit, twice a year, and certainly not less than this will suffice for the dispatch of business, whether the number of causes be small or great. The inconsiderable addition made to the number of district courts, will hardly excite criticism, and does not, therefore, claim a particular discussion, nor will their necessity be generally questioned. They are almost continually occupied with revenue, and admiralty causes; besides the great employment collaterally given to the judges, in the execution of the bankrupt act, which probably must increase, instead of being diminished.

Perhaps it may be contended, that the circuit courts ought to be abolished altogether, and the business, for which they are designed, left to the state courts, with a right of appeal to the supreme court of the United States. Indeed, it is probable, that this was the true design of the intimation in the message. A disposition to magnify the importance of the particular states, in derogation from that of the United States, is a feature in that communication, not to be mistaken. But to such a scheme there are insuperable objections. The right of appeal is by no means equal to the right of applying, in the first instance, to a tribunal agreeable to the suitor. The desideratum is to have impartial justice, at a moderate expense, administered "promptly and without delay;" not to be obliged to seek it through the long, and tedious, and expensive process of an appeal. It is true, that in causes of sufficient magnitude, an appeal ought to be open; which includes the possibility of going through that process: but when the courts of original jurisdiction are so constituted, as not only to deserve, but to inspire confidence, appeals, from the inevitable inconvenience attached to them, are exceptions to the general rule of redress; where the contrary is the situation, they become the general rule itself. Appeals then become multiplied to a pernicious extent; while the difficulties, to which they are liable, operate, in numerous instances, as a preventive of justice, because they fall with most weight on the least wealthy suitor. It is to be remembered, that the cases, in which the federal courts would be preferred, are those, where there would exist some distrust of the state courts; and this distrust would be a fruitful source of appeals. To say that there could be no good cause for this distrust, and that the danger of it is imaginary, is to be wiser than experience, and wiser than the constitution. The first officer of the government, when speaking in his official capacity, has no right to attempt to be thus wise. His duty exacts of him that he should respectfully acquiesce in the spirit and ideas of that instrument, under which he is appointed.

The detail would be invidious, perhaps injurious; else it would be easy to shew, that however great the confidence, to which the tribunals in some of the states are entitled, there is just cause for suspicion as to those of others; and that in respect to a still greater number, it would be inexpedient to delegate to them the care of interests, which are specially and properly confided to the government of the United States.

The plan of using the state courts, as substitutes for the circuit courts of the union, is objectionable in another view. The citizens of the United States have a right to expect from those, who administer our government, the efficacious enjoyment of those privileges, as suitors, for which the constitution has provided. To turn them round, therefore, from the enjoyment of those privileges, in originating their causes to the eventual and dilatory resource of an appeal, is, in a great degree, to defeat the object contemplated. This is a consideration of much real weight, especially to the merchants in our commercial states.

In the investigation of our subject, it is not to be forgotten, that the right to employ the agency of the state courts, for executing the laws of the union, is liable to question, and has, in fact, been seriously questioned. This circumstance renders it the more indispensable, that the permanent organization of the federal judiciary should be adapted to the prompt and vigorous execution of those laws.

The right of congress to discontinue judges, once appointed, by the abrogation of the courts, for which they were appointed, especially as it relates to their emoluments, offers matter for a very nice discussion, but which shall now be but superficially touched.

On the one hand, it is not easy to maintain that congress cannot abolish courts, which, having been once instituted, are found in practice to be inconvenient and unnecessary: On the other, if it may be done, so as to include the annihilation of existing judges, it is evident that the measure may be used to defeat that clause of the constitution, which renders the duration and the emoluments of the judicial office co-extensive with the good behaviour of the officer; an object essential to the independence of judges, the security of the citizen, and the preservation of the government.

As a medium, which may reconcile opposite ideas, and obviate opposite inconveniences, it would, perhaps, be the best and safest practical construction to say, that though congress may abolish the courts, yet shall the actual judges retain their character and their emoluments, with the authorities of office, so far as they can be exercised elsewhere than in the courts. For this construction, a precedent exists in the last arrangement of the judiciary. Though the number of the judges of the supreme court is reduced from six to five, yet the actual reduction is wisely deferred to the happening of a vacancy. The expense of continuing the salaries of the existing incumbents, cannot, prudently, be put in competition with the advantage of guarding from invasion, one of the most precious provisions of the constitution. Nor ought it to be without its weight, that this modification will best comport with good faith, on the part of government, towards those who had been invited to accept offices, not to be held by an uncertain tenure, but during good behaviour.

Weighing maturely all the very important and very delicate considerations, which appertain to the subject, would a wise or prudent statesman hazard the consequences of immediately unmaking at one session, courts and judges, which had only been called into being at the one preceding? Delectable indeed must be the work of disorganization to a mind, which can thus rashly advance in its prosecution! Infatuated must that people be, who do not open their eyes to projects so intemperate....so mischievous! Who does not see what is the ultimate object? "Delenda est Carthago"... ill-fated constitution, which Americans had fondly hoped would continue for ages, the guardian of public liberty, the source of national prosperity!

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

A FRIEND TO THE CONSTITUTION.

No. IV.

IN my last number was exhibited an opinion of the court of appeals of Virginia, pronouncing any law which should in any manner deprive of his office a judge commissioned during good behaviour, to be unconstitutional.

On a subsequent occasion, a contest not very different in principle arose in the same state between the legislative and judicial departments, in which the point in controversy was again yielded by the legislature.

In 1792 it was enacted that the judges of the district courts, who are also judges of the general court, should so far exercise chancery jurisdictions as to grant injunctions to their own judgments, and decree finally, in cases of an equitable nature, which originated by way of injunction.

It will be recollected that by the constitution of Virginia, the two houses of assembly, "by joint ballot appoint judges of the supreme court of appeals and general court, judges in chancery," &c.

Under the act just stated, an application was made to the district court at Dumfries for an injunction, which was referred to the general court, and on solemn consideration, was unanimously rejected on the principle that the law was unconstitutional. In giving their opinions some of the judges stated reasons entirely applicable to the subject we are now considering.

Judge Roane observed—"Though a judge is interested privately in preserving his independence, yet it is the right of the people which should govern him; who in their sovereign character have provided that the judges should be independent: so that in fact, it is a controversy between the legislature and the people, though perhaps the judges may be privately interested."

"If there can be judges in chancery who have no commission during good behaviour, their tenure in office is absolutely at the will of the legislature, and they consequently are not independent. The people of Virginia intended that the judiciary should be independent of the other departments; they are to judge where the legislature is a party, and therefore should be independent of it: otherwise they might judge corruptly in order to please the legislature, and be consequently continued in office. It is an acknowledged principle in all countries that no man shall be judge in his own cause; but it is nearly the same thing where the tribunal of justice is under the influence of a party. If the legislature can transfer from constitutional to legislative courts all judicial powers, these dependent tribunals, being the creatures of the legislature itself, will not dare to oppose an unconstitutional law."

Judge Tyler.

"The constitution says that judges in chancery shall be appointed by joint ballot of both houses of assembly and commissioned by the governor during good behaviour;—and for the most valuable purposes—to secure the independence of the judiciary. Contrary to this express direction, which admits of no doubt, implication or nice construction, that bane to political freedom, the legislature has made the appointment by an act mandatory to the judges, leaving them not at liberty to accept or refuse the office conferred, which is a right every citizen enjoys in every other case—a right too sacred to be yielded to any power on earth; but were I willing to do it as relates to myself, as a judge I ought not, because it would frustrate that important object before mentioned, intended by the constitution to be kept sacred for the wisest and best of purposes; to wit, that justice and the law be done to all manner of persons without fear or reward. For how would the right of individuals stand when brought in contest with the public, or even an influential character, if the judges may be removed from office by the same power who appointed them, to wit, by a statute appointment as in this case, and by a statute disappointment as was the case in the court of appeals.—Might not danger be apprehended from this source when future times shall be more corrupt?" "Let me now compare the law with the constitution in another point; that of the want of a commission during good behaviour, and the reasons will fully or forcibly apply—When I receive the commission, I see the ground on which I stand—I see that my own integrity is that ground, and no opinions but such as are derived from base motives can be sufficient to remove me from office—in which case whensoever an appeal is made to me by an injured citizen, I will do him justice as far as my mental powers will enable me to discover it, without any apprehensions of an unjust attack."

Judge Tucker, in a very elaborate opinion, which will do credit to his talents so long as it shall be read, thus expresses himself.

"The independence of the judiciary results from the tenure of their office which the constitution declares shall be during good behaviour. The offices which they are to fill must therefore be permanent as the constitution itself, and not liable to be discontinued or annihilated by any other branch of the government. Hence the constitution has provided that the judiciary departments should be arranged in such a manner as not to be subject to legislative controul. The court of appeals, court of chancery, and general court, are tribunals expressly required by it; and in these courts the judiciary power is either immediately or ultimately vested.

"These courts can neither be annihilated nor discontinued by any legislative act, nor can the judges of them be removed from their office for any cause except a breach of their good behaviour.

"But if the legislature might at any time discontinue or annihilate either of these courts, it is plain that their tenure of office might be changed, since a judge, without any breach of good behaviour, might in effect be removed from office by annihilating or discontinuing the office itself."

I must again remind those who may not have attended to the constitution of Virginia, that not only the judges of particular courts are recognized by that instrument, which does not proceed to declare that the judges of such other courts as might be created by the legislature, shall also hold their offices during good behaviour. The constitution also prescribes the manner in which these courts which it recognizes shall be filled, and of consequence no person is a constitutional judge in Virginia, but one appointed in the manner prescribed by the constitution, and to a court named by that instrument.

"If," says Judge Roane (now a distinguished member of the supreme court of appeals) "there can be judges in chancery who have no commission during good behaviour, their tenure of office is absolutely at the will of the legislature and they consequently are not independent." It is then a commission during good behaviour (issued according to the constitution) which renders the judges independent of the legislature, and consequently where an office is held by this firm tenure, the holder cannot be deprived of it by a legislative act.

It is also to be noticed that the possibility of being deprived of office at the will of the legislature, is, in the opinion of this able gentleman, totally incompatible with judicial independence.

Judge Tyler considers the independence of the judiciary as constitutionally secured by their commissions during good behaviour, and that valuable object he asserts that he "ought not to yield to any power on earth." This independence he deems essential to the rights of individuals and to an upright administration of justice.—With a commission during good behaviour the ground on which he stands is, he says, "his own integrity, and no opinions but such as are derived from base motives can be sufficient to remove him from office."

Judge Tucker states, that "the independence of the judiciary results from the tenure of their office which the constitution declares shall be during good behavior."—This tenure then places the judge beyond the reach of the legislature. The subsequent reasoning of the gentleman applies with great force. He marks the real distinction between courts, the judges of which are by the constitution to hold their offices during good behaviour, and such as are not noticed by the act of government itself. The former are completely independent... The latter are within the power of the legislature. In Virginia, the judges of the court of appeals, general court, and court of chancery, are alone protected by the constitution: In the government of the United States, the judges of all the inferior courts are recognized by the constitution, and declared to hold their office during good behaviour. Of consequence that reasoning which in Virginia applies to the judges of appeal, of chancery and of the general court, applies in the federal government to the judges of such inferior courts "as Congress may from time to time ordain and establish."

The opinions heretofore quoted are in terms declaratory of the principle that judges ought to be independent of the legislature, and that the constitution, by ordaining the tenure of their office to be during good behaviour, has made them really so. I will subjoin one other opinion, which, though not so positively expressed, is yet sufficiently explicit to be secured from being misunderstood. This opinion is the more valuable, as it is that of a gentleman, from whose judgment the enemies of the independence of the federal judiciary are not in the habit of appealing, and who is appointed to preside over the people of the United States, and to protect their constitution.

In his Notes on Virginia (page 195), after stating the actual despotism of the legislature, in consequence of its assumption of executive and judicial powers, Mr. Jefferson says, "For this reason, that convention which passed the ordinance of government laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive and judicial departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the power of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and executive members are left dependent on the legislature for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it."

From the expression here used it is clear that Mr. Jefferson did not consider all the executive and judicial members as dependent on the legislature for their continuance in office. For subsistence he states all to be dependent....for continuance only some of them. Then for continuance in office some are independent of the legislature. These are not the members of the executive, because the governor is elected annually by the legislature, and the members of the executive council depend for their continuance in office, on the will of the same body, expressed triennially. The judges then are the persons here alluded to, as being, for continuance in office, independent of the legislature. They are only rendered so by the declaration of the constitution, that they shall hold their offices during good behaviour. It is then the avowed opinion of Mr. Jefferson that a judge, the tenure of whose office is by the constitution ordained to be during good behaviour, cannot be deprived of that office by the legislature.

Such is the course of thought which until the present awful crisis, has uniformly prevailed in Virginia. Her judges, her legislature, her writers on government, her practical men and her theorists, have concurred by their declarations and their actions, to maintain the same position.....What can have produced in them a revolution so sudden, it is not for me to conjecture. It is impossible that this revolution can be perceived without serious alarm by any person, who is a friend to the constitution.

NO. V.

THE constitution of our country has now been inspected, and its mandate on the subject of an independent judiciary has been found too clear to be misunderstood. "The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts," say the people of America "shall, hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall, at stated times, receive for their services, a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

To a man who reveres, as does the writer of these numbers, the sacred instrument which binds together the different members of our extensive and growing empire, no other motive than respect for that instrument would be necessary to secure an exact observance of its rules. He would perceive the impracticability of preserving a constitution, the essential principles of which had been openly and intentionally violated....of longer upholding a fabric, one main pillar of which had been prostrated and trampled under foot....and he would tremble at the consequences of such a procedure.

In thus violently tearing off the veil with which public opinion had covered our frame of government; in exposing to every eye its susceptibility of wounds, and demonstrating the impunity with which these wounds might be inflicted; he would perceive an act which must, at one rude blow infallibly demolish all those safe-guards of holy reverence and respect, with which this law, heretofore deemed fundamental, had been carefully surrounded, and which have hitherto protected it from the impious assaults of those who can never cease to wish its destruction.

In this act, which must at the same time divest the constitution of its sanctity, and deprive it of those qualities which endeared it to its friends, he would perceive the certain cause of its dissolution, and of those accumulated miseries which will follow that dreadful event.

To the friends of written constitutions, defining and limiting the powers of the different departments of government, it must be cause of deep and serious regret to discover that the most important principles, expressed with the utmost precision, are incapable of resisting the first shock of party, and must yield to the first popular current that sets against them.

If all were alike the sincere friends of our constitution, if all equally respected mere parchment divisions of power, the views of the writer would have been completely effected by calling the public attention to the sacred text, the authority of which would then have been itself sufficient to secure its own inviolability. But a party respectable for its numbers, and rendered formidable by its energy, the force of which cannot be supposed to have diminished, was from various causes, originally hostile to the adoption of the federal government, and no emollients have been capable of assuaging the irritation at first excited. With the demonstration threfore that the measure against which the reasoning of this paper has been directed, is in palpable opposition to the constitution, it may not be entirely unnecessary to mingle some miscellaneous reflections, which will close the observations, designed to be made on this subject.

To the judicial department in every society is committed the important power of deciding between the government and individuals, and between different individuals having claims on each other. The dearest interests of man...life, liberty, reputation and property often depend on the integrity and talents of the judge. All important as is this department to the happiness and safety of individuals, it is from its structure much exposed to invasion from the other departments, and but little capable of defending itself from the attacks which insatiate ambition, wearing the public good as a mask, will make upon it. It wields not the sword, nor does it hold the purse. It stands aloof from both. What is still more decisive, its purity, its decorum of station requires a total abstinence from the use of those means by which popular favour is to be obtained. In a government, constituted like that of the United States, popularity is real power, and those who hold it will always be found too mighty for such as they may choose to attack. It will be forever arranged on the side of those whom the people elect, and their very election evinces that they possess it. Whenever then the representatives of the people enter into a contest with the judges, power is all on one side, and the issue will seldom be favourable to the weaker party. The judiciary can only expect support from the considerate and patriotic, who see, while yet at a distance, the evils to result necessarily from measures to which numbers may be impelled by their present passions.

The judiciary then, not only possesses not that force which will enable it to encroach on others, to aggrandize itself, or to enlarge its own sphere, but is not even able to protect itself in the possession of those rights which are conferred upon it for the benefit of the people. Incapable of acting offensively its real and only character is that of a shield for the protection of innocence...a tribunal for the faithful execution and exposition of the law. This character it will retain unless it be made subservient to the views of one of the other departments of government. Thus debased, it becomes in the hands of the executive or legislature, one of the most terrible instruments of oppression with which man has been ever scourged. "Were the power of judging," says the justly celebrated Montesquieu, "joined with the legislative, the life and liberty of the subject would be exposed to arbitrary controul, for the judge would then be the legislator. Were it joined to the executive power, the judge might behave with all the violence of an oppressor."

Impressed with the force of these eternal truths, the wise and good of America, the enlightened friends of civil liberty and of human happiness, have sought to separate the judiciary from, and to render it independent of, the executive and legislative powers. They have used all the means they possessed to render this independence secure and permanent, for they have laid its foundation in the constitution of their country. Before we tear up this foundation, and trample into ruins the fair edifice erected on it, let us pause for a moment, and examine the motives which led to its formation.

In all governments created by consent; the essential objects to be obtained are, security from external force and protection from internal violence. In arming government with powers adequate to these objects, the possibility of their being turned upon individuals ought never to be forgotten. It is the province of wisdom so to modify them, as not to impair their energies, when directed to the purposes for which they were given, and yet to render them impotent, if employed in the hateful task of individual oppression. The best security, yet discovered, is found in the principle that no man shall be condemned, no pains or penalties incurred, but in conformity with laws previously enacted and rendered public.

But the acknowledgment of this principle would be of no avail without its practical use. To obtain this, the laws must be applied with integrity and discernment to the cases which occur. If the same passions which direct the prosecution dictate its decision, innocence will cease to afford protection, and condemnation will certainly follow arraignment. It is therefore indispensable to individual safety, that the tribunal which decides should, as far as possible, be a stranger to the passions and feelings which accuse: that it should be actuated by neither hope nor fear: that it should feel no interest in the event: and should be under the influence of no motive which might seduce it from the correct line of duty and of law.

It is not in prosecutions instituted by the government only, that such a tribunal is necessary. In civil actions, between man and man, it is no less essential. Justice may sometimes be unpopular, and the powerful may sometimes be wrong. What shall then protect the weak? What shall shield persecuted virtue? What but purity in the judgment seat, and exemption from those prejudices and dispositions, which, for a time, obscure right and tempt to error?

The principle, which could alone preserve this purity, was believed to have been discovered. It was, to remove all those irresistible temptations to a deviation from rectitude, which interest will create, by rendering the judges truly independent...by making the tenure of their office during good behaviour. It was supposed that men, who possessed and valued character, who were selected for the performance of most important duties by persons in high and responsible situations...by persons, who were elected into those situations for their real or supposed merit, would at least endeavour to do right, when the causes were not powerful indeed, which should mislead them into wrong.

It was supposed that men thus independent would, in a sense of duty, find motives sufficiently strong to support them in an upright administration of justice, against the influence of those who govern, or the still more powerful influence of popular favour. If this expectation should sometimes be disappointed, it must yet be acknowledged that the principle affords the fairest prospect to be furnished by human means, of obtaining a good, so all important to the felicity of man.

It is believed that in no form of government is an independent judiciary more essential than in the republican. To enumerate all the advantages to be derived from it, and all the mischiefs which must grow out of a contrary system, would very much exceed the limits unavoidably prescribed for this paper. It will be sufficient to state some of them, which are most obvious.

In popular governments men probably feel more than in others, a high sense of their own rights. This proud sentiment, wounded by a conviction of injury from those, who ought, with pure hands, to administer only justice and law, must produce a detestation of the existing state of things, which, when extensive, leads to the most serious consequences.

In popular governments, I will not say there is more of party spirit than in others, but I will say, that in them parties are more completely arranged, and more decidedly marked. In them too, the ascendancy of a particular party is of shorter duration, than in those where power is more permanent. The effect of these causes on a judiciary subject to that spirit, cannot be concealed. It becomes a weapon, with which they alternately pursue each other; and instead of being the shield, is converted into the scourge of innocence.

Nor is a dependence of the judges on the legislature in republican governments, less fatal to the rights of individuals, than a dependence on the executive in those which are monarchical. Let the dependence exist, and its consequence will be an improper and injurious subserviency to the will of the superior. Legislative is as heavy as executive oppression, and is the more to be dreaded as it cannot be checked by public opinion, for public opinion is generally with it. When public opinion changes, the governing party changes also, and the persecuted become the persecutors. The instrument of persecution, an enslaved judiciary, is ready for any hand bold and strong enough to seize it. "It will be no alleviation that these powers," (says Mr. Jefferson, speaking of the legislature of Virginia in his Notes page 195) "will be exercised by a plurality of hands and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one." "As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for."

The government of a party continuing for a great length of time the majority, and consequently in power, may gradually soften and assume the appearance of the nation. But where the division is nearly equal, the struggle incessant, and success alternate, all the angry passions of the human mind are in perpetual exercise. The new majority brings with it into power a keen recollection of injuries, supposed, if not real, and is entirely disposed to retort them. Vile calumny, exclusion from social rights, proscriptions and banishments have in democracies, where the ruling party acts without the check of an independent judiciary, been the bitter fruits of this temper. The best safeguard against evils so serious, and it is to be feared, so certain, is a tribunal beyond the reach of these passions, without the judgment of which punishment cannot be inflicted. How is this tribunal to be obtained, but by rendering independent those who compose it? Is it to be expected that if in this war of angry passions, an irritated majority in congress should pursue with unjust vengeance an obnoxious individual, judges dependent on that majority for their continuance in office, will constitute a barrier which shall check its resentments? If in any instance the virtue of the judge should induce him to prefer his duty to his interest, his exertions would be of no avail. He would immediately become the victim of his integrity: by repealing a law or by some other means he would be removed from office, and a successor appointed, inflamed with all the passions which burn in the bosoms of the majority.

In private actions too the same prejudices would prevail. An influential member of the majority in congress could not be in the wrong, should his cause be referred to a man whose political existence may depend on the breath of that member.

It might be some consolation if the mischief stopped here: but it could not. Those popular individuals whose interests decided elections, would participate in the influence of the member they had contributed to place in his seat. It would be necessary for the judge to bear in mind that they too could decide his fate, and that a determination against them might be cause of a removal.

In controversies between an individual of the majority and minority, the case of the impotent and unpopular suitor would be hopeless. His demonstration of his right would avail him nothing, before a judge whose continuance in office might depend on pronouncing a decision against him.

This is no imaginary statement of an impossible case. It is the regular and constant result of a dependent judiciary. The power on which it depends, will controul and govern its decision, whether this controuling power be in the hands of one or one hundred, its pernicious effects will be the same; for those who feel the power will "forget right." The experience of all ages has established this great and important truth.

Will you then, my fellow-citizens, for the paltry gratification of wreaking vengeance on a party so grossly calumniated and which no longer governs, destroy the constitution of your country, and deprive yourselves of the security resulting from independent judges? Will you establish a principle which must place in the hands of the predominant party for the time being, the persons and the property of those who are divided from them by shades of opinion: which will subject the weak to the powerful, and convert the seat of justice into a tribunal where influence, not law, must rule? Will you render a judiciary, which being constitutionally independent is now a safe and steady check to the encroachments of power and the persecutions of party, a mere instrument of vengeance in the hands of the tyrants of the day?—Will you make the judges what a late ministerial writer, whose calumnies have attracted some attention, has very untruly stated them to be already, a body of men "under the dominance of political and personal prejudice, habitually employed in preparing or executing partial vengeance?"

Patriotism, public virtue, a regard for your own safety and happiness, a just national pride and respect for that constitution on which your national character depends, and which many of you have solemnly sworn to support—all forbid it.

EPITOME OF NEWS.

FOREIGN OCCURRENCES.

—Debate in the imperial parliament, on the preliminaries of peace, has been fervid, eloquent, and argumentative. Lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Pitt have defended the measure, with great ability; and, from the resources of their mighty minds, and from the plausibility of specious rhetoric, have almost

"Made the worse appear the better reason."

In the upper house, lord Grenville numbers with the opposition; and, in the lower, the "voice still for war," is vehemently raised by the undaunted spirit of Mr. WINDHAM. His nervous speech we have published at large, in this day's paper. We wished to give, likewise, the speeches of lord Hawkesbury and Mr. Pitt entire, but our limits would not permit. We cannot resist, however, the temptation of quoting the following observations by Mr. Pitt. "It would be affectation and hypocrisy in him to say, he had or could change his opinion of the character of the person presiding in France, until he saw a train of conduct, which would justify that change. He would not now occupy the attention of the house, by entering into a discussion of the origin of the war; the unjust aggression which was made upon us, was established by recent evidence, but it was unnecessary to enter into it now, because, upon that subject, the opinion of the house and of the country was fixed. The great object of the war, on our part, was defence for ourselves, and for the rest of the world, in a war, waged against most of the nations of Europe, but against us with particular malignity. Security was our great object: there were different means of accomplishing it, with better or worse prospects of success, and, according to the different variations of policy, occasioned by a change of circumstances, we still pursued our great object, security. In order to obtain it, we certainly did look for the subversion of the government, which was founded upon revolutionary principles. We never, at one period, said, that, as a sine qua non, we insisted upon the restoration of the old government of France we only said, there was no government with which we could treat; this was our language up to 1796; but, in no one instance, did we insist upon restoring the monarchy, though, he did not hesitate to acknowledge, that it would have been more consistent with the wishes of ministers, and with the interest and security of this country. He was equally ready to confess, that he had given up his hopes, with the greatest reluctance, and he should, to his dying day, lament that there were not, on the part of the other powers of Europe, efforts corresponding to our own, for the accomplishment of that great work. There were periods, during the continuance of the war, in which they had hopes of being able to put together the scattered fragments of that great and venerable edifice; to have restored the exiled nobility of France; to have restored a government, certainly not free from defects, but built upon sober and regular foundations, instead of that mad system of innovation, which threatened and nearly accomplished, the destruction of Europe."

MR. WINDHAM'S SPEECH.

Mr. WINDHAM, after some preliminary observations, said, that those who opposed the peace had been represented as frantic people who contended that the restoration of the French Monarchy should be the sine qua non of peace. This charge, however, could by no means apply to him; because he had never entertained such an idea. Gentlemen therefore, who advanced the charge, had gone farther than they were warranted to go. As to the right of interference in the affairs of France, we had surely a right to interfere for the purpose of preventing that enormous aggrandizement, which was big with danger to ourselves. This had ever been considered, by our wisest statesmen, as an object of the first importance to this country. Whenever a peace had been concluded between two contending parties, it followed, of course, that one party had the superiority over the other, which it was fair and proper to exert for the purpose of ensuring advantageous terms, such terms at least, as should place the country which accepted them in a state of security. And he hoped that the spirit of the English would ever lead them to resist with energy and decision, terms of a different nature, fraught with dishonour, and big with humiliation.... But while he disclaimed the wild notions which had been falsely imputed to him, he hoped he should never be found amongst those faithless watchmen of the state, who should seek to lull the people into a false security, and a treacherous repose; but ever act with such as should endeavour to rouse them to a just sense of existing danger, of a danger which threatened them with ruin, with annihilation. It had been the practice of some of the public papers to accuse those who condemned the peace, of being hostile to his Majesty and his Majesty's Government. He, however, had no hostility to his Majesty, nor yet to the ministers; but no dread of misrepresentation should ever deter him from giving his sentiments, freely and fully, respecting a measure which appeared to him calculated to increase our danger instead of diminishing it. He felt it his duty to oppose it; and he would contend, that both in the present Treaty, and in the Convention with the Northern powers, ministers had assumed an humble tone which would lead to consequences dangerous to the existence of the country. The gentlemen who had that night supported the peace, had purposely dissembled the real object of the war. He had ever considered it as a war for indemnity and security. The enemy had threatened the existence of our liberties and our constitution.... To preserve these then, to prevent the diffusion of principles subversive of all the bonds of civil society, to obtain indemnity for the expences which we had been compelled to incur, and security for the future, was the real and avowed object of the war. Ministers had thrown our successes aside; they seemed to have forgotten our victories, and to have lost sight of our conquests. But the recollection of those victories and those conquests would remain to heighten and to aggravate the reflections which must arise from the contemplation of our sacrifices. To have been victorious, and yet to have treated as a vanquished nation, was a galling and mortifying reflection to a British mind. It implied indeed, a contradiction of terms, a confusion of ideas, which no acuteness could reconcile, no strength of understanding dispel. The noble Lord (Hawkesbury) had begun by stating, that the present period was very different from that at which the former negotiation took place; that we had originally opposed the principles of France, but latterly we had opposed her power. But in his opinion both led to the same end; and if the power of France threatened the existence of this country, it was as much our interest and our duty to oppose that power, as it was to oppose her principles, when exerted for the same purpose. Mr. Windham then entered into a comparison of the terms of the present Treaty with the terms which were offered to us at Lisle; and clearly shewed that the latter were far preferable to the former.... It had been said, that the general language of the country in respect to the peace was, that it was such a peace as every man was glad of, but as no man was proud of. But he hoped and suspected, that this was an epigrammatic expression, and not a true picture. For, if Englishmen could rejoice at a bad peace, at a peace of which they could not be proud, the national character was totally lost.

Though the supporters of the peace had prudently forborne to insist on its glory they still persevered in representing it as honourable. But in what light was it honourable? The noble lord had contended, and truly contended, that time and circumstances were necessary considerations, in the conclusion of a treaty; but he was at a loss to perceive the wisdom of that policy, which would reject better terms in a moment of dismay, and accede to worse, in the hour of victory and confidence; there might be a shew of magnanimity in such conduct, but was it wise, was it politic, was it compatible with the real interests of the country? Let us see in what respect it is honourable, as it relates to our allies? How far their interests have been consulted? Ministers have assumed great credit to themselves for their conduct towards our allies. What has been done for them? Turkey was the only power which could be truly said to be in alliance with us. It was said that the integrity of the Sublime Porte had been secured. But is that her opinion? Does she feel secure? A week after this stipulation for her security—a week after this extraordinary instance of our magnanimity had been displayed, Turkey preferred the guarantee of her enemy to that of her ally, and chose to negotiate for herself. As we had compelled the French to evacuate Egypt, both the security of Turkey and our own required that we should have retained in our possession some strong fortress, garrisoned by British troops. Without this precaution, what was there to prevent the French from returning to Egypt? At the very moment when we magnanimously stipulated for the evacuation of that country, there was not a French soldier remaining in it, (thanks to General Hutchinson, whose military skill, whose firm perseverance, and whose manly courage could only be exceeded by his modesty), who was not a prisoner to the English. As to the integrity of Naples, that was as insecure as Turkey; for though the French troops had evacuated a part of the Neapolitan territory, what was to prevent them from returning, especially, as they retained possession of the Cisalpine Republic? "I wish to know what is to prevent the French, who evacuated Naples to-day, (Tuesday) from re-entering it on Thursday, the distance from the Cisalpine Republic not being more than sixty miles?" Such is the situation, such the security, such the integrity of Naples.

In casting our eyes over the map of Europe we look in vain for the kingdom of Sardinia....The territories of his Sardinian majesty live only in our memory. In the Mediterranean, he had only the little island of Sardinia left, for the security of which he was solely indebted to the protection of our fleet; a protection, which he would lose the moment the definitive treaty should be signed. The next of our allies, the integrity of whose dominions exhibits an illustrious proof of our magnanimity, is Portugal. On this subject, he had endeavoured to obtain information; but he had not been sufficiently successful to speak with decision on it. He adverted to the treaty of Badajos, and to the cession of a portion of the Portuguese territory in the Brazils; and he asked whether it was to be understood that our treaty with France sanctioned that cession? Portugal, like Naples, had been secured by us, in the integrity of her possessions; and our magnanimity on this occasion had been loudly vaunted by the noble lord, because those two powers had formed separate treaties with the enemy. But were not those treaties the effect of compulsion on the one hand, and the results of conquest on the other? Should we have been justified in declaring war against Portugal and Naples for yielding, against their will, to dire necessity? If no blame, then, attached to Portugal, if she ought really to be considered as our ally, as no human being could suspect her of possessing the ability to resist her enemy, there could not be the smallest reason for any diminution of our attachment to her. How have we provided for her security? The preliminary articles will tell us how. Mr. Windham then took a large bundle of papers out of his pocket, but begged the house not to be alarmed, as he only meant to read about half a dozen lines. He then read the following articles of the preliminary treaty.

V. Egypt shall be restored to the Sublime Porte, whose dominions and possessions shall be secured in their integrity; such as they were before the war.

VI. The territories and possessions of her most faithful majesty shall also be maintained in their integrity.

France, as far as any treaty can bind her, has concluded a peace with Portugal; but on what terms? She has taken from her Olivenza and the adjoining territory, which Spain had long coveted, and for which nothing more was required than to express a wish, in order to obtain it from France. France, at the same time, took for herself a portion of the Brazils, which gave her the command of the river Amazons, and the whole of the adjacent coast. Mr. Windham quoted Monsieur de la Condamine in order to shew the advantage which France would derive from the possession of this tract of country in addition to what she already enjoyed in the proximity of Dutch Guiana. Is this the mode of guaranteeing the possessions, of securing the integrity of a faithful ally? If integrity and dismemberment be synonymous terms, then, indeed, the assertion may be true. In allusion to the term honourable which the noble lord has absurdly applied to the peace, in the speech from the throne, every man must feel that no peace was safe that was not honourable, and that no peace was honourable, which was not safe; but, unfortunately, this peace was neither safe nor honourable; nor could any peace be honourable which gave us territories that did not belong to the power by whom they were given.

The conduct of our government in the negotiation at Lisle was very different: they did what was wise and proper to attain peace for the good of the country. They selected certain points of importance, which it was necessary for the preservation of that honour, to insist upon. He was surprised to hear certain expressions, which had fallen from the noble lord, relative to the acquisitions we had made by the present peace, which he contrasted with Lord Malmesbury's project, the wisdom of which he extolled. We should have been fully justified in the retention of Ceylon, the Cape, and Cochin, for the more effectual defence of our Eastern empire. His mind was not at all satisfied with the situation in which the Cape was left by the Treaty. We had ceded a port which might become a great annoyance to our trade.

The Cape furnished, a military station of vast importance in the event of a sudden war, not preceded by a proclamation. The Marquis of Cornwallis, in his return from India, had strongly pressed the necessity of retaining Cochin, and the Cape; or if only one of them could be retained, the Cape in preference to Cochin.—Though Ceylon was an important settlement, Cochin, on the Western side of the Peninsula, was one of the strongest military frontiers in India. In the event of a war, a fleet might sail from the Cape and arrive at Cochin before any person in India could know of its arrival, and before any person in England could be apprized of its sailing.—He might possibly be told, that our merchantmen were advised to avoid the Cape: but the importance of that settlement was not so great as represented; and that our ships might touch at the Brazils.

The settlement which the French had acquired in the Brazils, would, in that case, give additional importance to France. The Cape and Cochin were insisted on by lord Malmesbury, at Lisle, as points from which we would not depart; and these were now given up, from that want of vigour, spirit, and prudence, which mark our negotiation.

He concluded by remarking, that such a peace as had been concluded, could not last long. If France should declare war in a twelve month, where would we be with our fleets dismantled, and our armies disbanded? Would not such a war shake our country to its centre? Feeling as he did, that the peace was neither honourable to our allies, nor safe to ourselves, he could not but oppose the motion.

DOMESTIC.

—The Public papers with great pomp announce the safe delivery of the great Cheese at Washington. The inhabitants of Cheshire, an obscure town in one of the western counties of the state of Massachusetts, actually accompanied their cheese-monger compliment with the following address.

The greatest Cheese in America, for the greatest Man in America.

SIR,

Notwithstanding we live remote from the seat of national government, and in an extreme part of our state; yet we humbly claim the right of judging for ourselves.

Our attachment to our national constitution is strong and indissoluble. We consider it a description of those powers, which the people have submitted to their magistrates, to be exercised for definite purposes, and not a charter of favors, granted by a sovereign to his subjects. Among its beautiful features, the right of free suffrage, to correct all abuses....the prohibition of religious tests, to prevent all hierarchy....the means of amendment, which it contains within itself, to remove defects as far as they are discovered, appear the most prominent. But for several years past our apprehension has been, that the genius of the government was not attended to in sundry cases; and that the administration bordered upon monarchy: Our joy, of course, must have been great, on your election to the first office in the nation: having had good evidence, from your announced sentiments and uniform conduct, that it would be your strife and glory to turn back the government to its virgin purity. The trust is great! The task is arduous! But we console ourselves, that the Supreme Father of the Universe, who raises up men to achieve great events, has raised up a Jefferson for this critical day, to defend Republicanism, and baffle all the arts of Aristocracy.

Sir, we have attempted to prove our love to our President, not in words alone, but in deed and truth. With this address, we send you a CHEESE, by the hands of Messrs. John Leland, and Darius Brown, as a pepper-corn of the esteem which we bear to our chief magistrate, and as a sacrifice to Republicanism. It is not the last stone in the Bastille, nor is it of any consequence as an article of worth; but as a free will offering, we hope it will be received. The Cheese was not made by his lordship, for his sacred majesty; nor with a view to gain dignified titles or lucrative offices; but by the personal labour of free born farmers (WITHOUT A SINGLE SLAVE TO ASSIST) for an elective President of a free people; with the only view of casting a mite into the scale of democracy.

The late triumphant return of Republicanism has more animated the inhabitants of Cheshire, to bear the burden of government, and treat the characters and persons in authority with all due respect, than the long list of alien—sedition—naval and provisional army laws ever did.

Sir, we had some thoughts of impressing some significant inscription on the Cheese; but we have found such inconveniency in stamps on paper, that we chose to send it in a plain republican form.

May God long preserve your life and health for a blessing to the United States, and the world at large.

Signed by the Committee, in behalf of all Cheshire.

PRESIDENT'S REPLY.

I concur with you in the sentiments expressed in your kind address on behalf of the inhabitants of the town of Cheshire, that the Constitution of the United States is a charter of authorities and duties, not a charter of rights to its officers; and among its most precious provisions are the right of suffrage, the prohibition of religious tests, and its means of peaceable amendment. Nothing ensures the duration of this fair fabric of government so effectually as the due sense entertained by the body of our citizens, of the value of these principles and their care to preserve them.

I received with particular pleasure the testimony of good will with which your citizens have been pleased to charge you for me; it presents an extraordinary proof of the skill, with which those domestic arts, which contribute so much to our daily comfort, are practised by them, and particularly by that portion of them most interesting to the affections, the care, and the happiness of man.

To myself this mark of esteem from freeborn farmers, employed personally in the useful labours of life, is peculiarly grateful, having no wish but to preserve to them the fruits of their labour: their sense of this truth will be my highest reward.

I pray you, gentlemen, to make my thanks for their favour acceptable to them, and to be assured yourselves of my high respect and esteem.

THOMAS JEFFERSON.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

One Lewis Du Pre, a French philosopher, has, it seems, discovered the perpetual motion, and, with all the eagerness of an enthusiast, hastens to impart the blessing of the discovery to congress, who understand perpetual motion, much better than Mr. Du Pre. Mr. Du Pre cannot now be quiet, and be satisfied even with the old phrase, descriptive of this chimera, for he calls it the perfect motion, and insists upon it, that perpetual is "vulgar." He declares, that it has pleased God, for purposes most extensively benevolent, to impart to him this discovery. He addresses "the government of "the United States, in congress assembled," in the soothing vocative of "dear friends," and calls upon their republican patriotism, to obtain from the critical casket, where it remains deposited, the precious bounty. All this, though very "bald, disjointed chat," might possibly pass for very good republican sense and reason, did not this insane projector unfortunately talk, in his "memorial," something about the supereminently favoured land of Columbia.

Throughout the United States, quiet men, and haters of democratic innovation are stunned by the frantic uproar of the republicans in congress, clamouring for an abrogation of the judiciary system. Mr. Brackenridge, a man so new, that few know his "local habitation, or his name," has made, in favour of a repeal of salutary law, a speech, conspicuous for its falsity of assumption, and for its inconclusiveness of logic. Gouverneur Morris, and Uriah Tracy, Esquires, have replied, with great eloquence to the flimsy arguments of the democratic senator, who, in his history of the king's courts in Westminster-Hall, and the course of legal polity in England, betrays a degree of ignorance, at which the meanest Tyro in BLACKSTONE would be ashamed. The speech of Mr. MORRIS, we have read with great delight; and we feel no hesitation in declaring, that it is in no wise inferior to the parliamentary eloquence of St. Stephen's chapel. The speech of Mr. Tracy, of Connecticut, has been pronounced, by a correct judge, "one of the most impressive, argumentative, and solemn speeches, that ever attracted the attention of the house."

An empirical advertisement of some vile medley of nauseous drugs, professing to cure a number of disorders, the most diverse in their nature and situation, begins thus: "The secret sought in all ages, for the good of mankind, is at last found out."

A tallow chandler, lately deceased, in London was said to have left a fortune of one hundred thousand pounds. Surely this man, remarks a wag, did not hide his light under a bushel.

When one reflects upon the mummery of the Cheshire simpletons, over their Mammoth cheese, and the extreme weakness of the whole transaction, it forces one to remember a descriptive line of POPE, and to be confident that this political, or rather Indian gift, is

"A mere white curd of asses' milk."

The vice president of the United States seems to prefer pleasure at New-York, to politics at Washington. Dear liberty is emphatically the motto of this gay officer, who, careless of his little senate, lingers, as long as he can, in the bower of delight,

"And makes his heaven in a lady's lap,
And witches women with his looks and words."

The Walpole editor never omits an opportunity to play upon words. From the following it appears, that he cannot refrain:

A southern paper records the recent marriage of a Mr. Nott. The lady, to whom he has given his hand, in an affair of so great moment as matrimony, probably gave the matter previous and due consideration; she might, with some propriety, ponder the opening of the celebrated soliloquy on the immortality of the soul,

"To be, or NOT to be, that is the question."

The Editor of "The Farmer's Museum," commenting upon the rude and vicious essays of Levi Lincoln, attorney general of the United States, has the following pleasant remark:

"A writer in the Massachusetts Spy, and more lately in the National Aegis, a violent, democratic paper, printed at Worcester, in Massachusetts, is writing a series of essays, over the signature of 'The Farmer,' the intent of which is, to degrade the acts of the former administration, and commend those of the new. The author of them, it is satisfactorily ascertained, is the attorney general of the United States. The clergy of New-England, in some parts of the writer's later lucubrations, appear to be the faultless victims of his resentment.... These writings are re-published in many papers, and, from the high official situation of their author, perhaps, more than from their intrinsic merit, give rise to much newspaper discussion. A writer in the Columbian Centinel, with the signature of 'Sulpicius,' has entered the lists with 'The Farmer,' and, though he does not assume the title of a husbandman, yet he appears to understand a branch of the business of one. From the 'energies' which he has already displayed in these essays, the attorney general will probably find, that he is fully equal to 'The Farmer,' in 'thrashing' and 'dressing'."

A member of congress, in a letter to the Editor, dated Washington, January 15, says:

"We have been constantly acting 'Much Ado about Nothing,' ever since congress convened; and happy would it be for our country, if we should confine ourselves to comedy. There is too much reason to fear, that the present company of actors will not be left to the choice of parts, which will afford but miserable profits to them, and sorry amusement to the spectators. But I will not anticipate evil; sufficient, certainly for this day, are the evils thereof."

Though languishing with a pulmonary complaint, Mr. TRACY, a senator from Connecticut, has displayed all the strength of a manly mind, on the debate, relative to the mad project of abolishing the present judiciary system. He concludes a wise and brilliant speech, in the following pathetic style:

"I am strongly impressed with the magnitude of this subject; perhaps the whims of a sick man's fancy have too much possessed me, to view it correctly; but, sir, I apprehend THE REPEAL OF THIS LAW WILL INVOLVE IN IT THE TOTAL DESTRUCTION OF OUR CONSTITUTION. It is supported by three independent pillars, the legislative, executive, and judiciary; and, if any rude hand should pluck either of them away, the beautiful fabric must tumble into ruins."

"The judiciary is the centre pillar, and a support to each, by checking both; on the one side is the sword, and, on the other, the wealth of the nation, and it has no inherent capacity to defend itself. These very circumstances united, may provoke an attack, and whichever power prevails so far, as to vest in itself, directly or indirectly, the power of the judiciary, by rendering it dependent, is the precise definition of tyranny, and must produce its effects. The Goths and Vandals destroyed not only the government of Rome, but the city itself; they were savages, and felt the loss of neither; but, if it be possible there can be an intention, like the son of Manoa, with his strength, without his godliness, to tumble the fabric into ruins, let it be remembered, it will crush, in one undistinguished ruin, its perpetrators, with those whom they may call their political enemies."

"I most earnestly entreat gentlemen to pause and consider; I apprehend the repeal of this act will be the hand writing on the wall, stamping Memento Tekel upon all we hold dear and valuable in our constitution. Let not the imputation of instability, which is cast upon all popular bodies, be verified by us, in adopting laws to-day, and repealing them to-morrow, for no other reason, but that we have the power, and will exercise it."

A correspondent, who remembers the most popular maxims of Dr. Franklin, who has the pence table by heart, and knows all the squares of multiplication, is exceedingly alarmed, lest congress, in the debate on the quantum of reward due to the gallant STERRET, for his exploits in the Mediterranean, should lose sight of economy. Our saving correspondent, who, to be sure, only echoes the voice of most of our misers, is of opinion, that a small silver medal, of the value of nine pence, will be enough for our national gratitude to bestow on maritime merit, and that we should never think of measuring talents or virtue by any thing, except by a joiner's rule, or that liberal and classical maxim, "a pin a day is a groat a year."

The great Dr. JOHNSON sometimes did not think a pun unworthy of his colloquial powers. The following example of his success in this way, has never before been cited in this country:

The conversation turning one night, at the club in Essex-street, on the injury our language sustained, by the abbreviations made by the poets, Dr. Burney was observing, that he knew a literary lady, who was, in some instances, in the contrary extreme, and often added a letter too much, particularly in all words ending in e, as agreeablee, infalliblee, &c. Why did she take such unnecessary trouble? says one of the company. "Nay, sir," says Johnson, "it could be no trouble to her; on the contrary, she appears to be very much at her e's."

The consequences of the new theory in politics begin to appear, with vengeance, in the vicinity of Petersburg, in Virginia. The negroes, have risen to the number of five hundred, with an intent to cut the throats of their republican masters. Happily for the latter, this African plot was discovered; but it behoves southern visionaries to look well to consistency, and take care, while they are prating about patriotism and liberty, to remember, that their sable vassals once had a country and equal rights.

That is unquestionably honest praise, which drops unwillingly from the tongue or pen of our foes. Of the late speech of GOVERNEUR MORRIS, even the biassed editor of the National Intelligencer remarks, that it was one of the most splendid specimens of eloquence, ever delivered in a deliberative assembly.

We rejoice to read the New-York proposals for re-publishing that scarce and profound work, THE FEDERALIST. It is the best comment on the constitution, which the world has yet witnessed.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

"The taper leg, slim waist, and lovely side,

But full in sight the tempting bosom swell,

No. III.

JUST as I had dipped my pen in the standish and was marshalling my ideas in battalia, against a host of female foibles, a servant brought me the following letter from a lady, who writes against fashionable levities with so much good sense, truth, and vivacity, that, to-day, my office of animadversion will be as much a sinecure, as the clerkship of the pells in Ireland, or the unwarlike place of the American secretary at war, under the present administration:

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

MR. SAUNTER,

I am the daughter of very respectable parents, and, without vanity, may observe, that my education has not been neglected, in any thing, which country schoolmasters teach, or judicious and virtuous preceptors instil, although I am entirely unacquainted with elegant accomplishments, and that courtly polish of manners, which it is impossible to acquire, unless by long conversation with the politer circles of life. Now, sir, if you will excuse this intrusion on your attention, I will soon explain my reasons for addressing you; and, as from your occupation of a lounge, you may have leisure to write something on the subject of which I complain, that may give me redress, I, with the more confidence, proceed to state my grievance.

My father is a plain, honest country gentleman, blest with a good natural understanding, and that degree of prudence and management, which has always kept his family in a state of independence. He married my mother, when she was very young, in an obscure country village; consequently she soon imbibed many of his good principles; and, as they have always lived together in the country, their lives have passed in that happy course of innocence and harmony, which is alike superior to the smiles of prosperity, and the frowns of adversity. It may naturally be presumed, that, in this state of obscurity, they derived all their notions of high life, from books and hearsay: and, alas! the picture which their imagination has formed, I fear, is infinitely beyond what the reality presents.

With most pleasing ideas of city men and manners, maternal fondness would have ushered me into life, as the dear woman terms it, when I had scarcely attained my sixteenth year, had not my father's good sense interfered, and kept me at home for another year; he was too considerate, however, to give his true reasons, and urged, that, as I was his only daughter among seven children, he wished to have one more year's gratification from my society, before the pleasures of a city life disgusted me with my rural enjoyments,

The anticipation of the new and delightful scene, I was this winter to engage in, gave fleet wings to time; and now, after two month's preparations, I have already been twelve hours in the noise and bustle of a city.

I am at the house of my friend Constantia, who was introduced into fashionable life, by her marriage with a worthy young gentleman, of large fortune, and genteel connections. After the first transports of our meeting were over, I was surprised at the peculiarities of my friend's appearance, and no less so, at her pleasant remarks about my dress; and shocked to hear herself and husband exclaim, "it was by far too modest for the mode." She, at once, declared, I must not think of mixing in genteel society, so "muffled up," as she was pleased to call it, when, I assure you, that my dress was only such as decency required. I, in my turn, expostulated with her, on the impossibility of changing my appearance in that respect; but she pursued all my arguments with much warmth, and finally avowed, that she would not patronise such a satire as I presented, on the present fashions. My unwillingness to offend a lady, from whom I was to receive so much kindness, determined me at once to conform to her wishes, in this disgusting particular: and, accordingly, I suffered her immediately, as we were to be this evening alone, to give me the first lesson in nakedness (for I cannot call it dress); upon which I found my wardrobe contained many superfluous articles, such as petticoats, pockets, tuckers, and gown sleeves.After she had undressed me in the fashion, I remained a long time, considering how I was to find resolution to brave the presence of her husband, who I knew was waiting tea with her in the parlour, until I should appear. I at last concluded, that, as he was so well accustomed to this style in his wife's dress, my appearance would not strike him as singular, and boldly ventured down stairs. But do not think, sir, that my natural modesty for a moment left me, for, believe me, its crimson blush was renewed at every step of my approach to the parlour, and scarcely had I reached the door, when, by an involuntary and irresistible impulse, I threw a clean white pocket-handkerchief about my neck, and apologised to my friend for so doing, by assuring her, that I was afraid of exposing my shoulders all at once to the cold, as she had so recently cut away the flannel, &c. which my mother had accustomed me to think necessary to my health, at this season of the year.

Her husband, soon after tea, left us, to inform her friends of my being in town. I could not conceal the displeasure I felt, at the alteration in my dress, and, as soon as he was gone, I made a second attempt to reason with her, as to the disgusting indelicacy of my appearance. But she told me, "nothing could be considered as indelicate, which custom reconciles, and which the most correct of both sexes approved." I did not yield my point, but insisted that her argument was not so much a justification of the delicacy and correctness of the fashion, as a proof of the increasing licentiousness of the times.

Our debate was, for some time, very warm, but was interrupted by the return of her husband, who, after telling me that many friends would visit me, joined in his wife's opinion, and made some severe remarks upon my pretences, as a country lass, to oppose the fashions of a great city. I bade them good night....withdrew to my chamber in anger....packed up my clothes....wrote a letter to my father, begging him to send my brother Charles for me directly, and determined not to see a single visiter, but keep my chamber until he comes; when I accidentally discovered the "American Lounger" on the toilet, which made me at once think of asking Mr. Saunter's advice, before I finally concluded how to act. And I hope, sir, you will not hesitate to inform me what I ought to do.

I am, with respect,

Your humble servant,

MODESTIA.

As I am a bachelor, and, moreover, of a temperament, not unlike that of Henry IV of France, I confess I am at a loss what to reply to Modestia. But it is certain that, whether I reason like a moralist, or like a man of the world, I should be compelled, upon the principles of either, to determine against the modish style of female attire.... For an ingenious and just theory on this delicate subject, every fair trespasser is referred to the works of PRIOR, who was a courtier, a lover, and a minister of state, and who was equally familiar with toilets and treaties.

From Eve's first fig leaf to brocade,
All dress was meant for FANCY'S AID,
When Celia struts in man's attire,
She shews too much to raise desire;
But from her hoop's bewitching round,
Her very shoe has power to wound.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AMONG the many absurdities, prevalent, I know of none that more severely deserves the lash of criticism; than the present impropriety of dress among some of the female part of our city.

Where this evil is to end, what are to be its limits, may be a subject well worthy of speculation. There can be no doubt that there subsists a strong connection, between manners, and morals; and if this servile imitation of Parisian actresses, is to gain ground, it would not be hazardous too much to assert, that if the same temptation were applied, those who so willingly copy them in the one instance, would, without much difficulty, follow them in the other.

If any to whom these observations apply, should chance to peruse them, they will no doubt start with all the horror of injured innocence; but if their tender minds are thus easily wounded, by the bare insinuation of a deviation from virtue, let them first blush at the commission of those indecencies, the repetition of which will tend to lessen their abhorrence of vice, to strip it of its odium, and to render virtue and morality empty names.

As an American, I glory in the knowledge that there are still many whose sense of propriety and decorum, makes them view this violation of modesty with becoming contempt. Long may this odious practice be confined to a distinguished few.

There is another custom which has a strong tendency to debase the mind, I allude to that of swearing; by those who thus take sailors and carters for their model, not a sentence can be expressed, but embellished with the dignifying epithets of "merciful heavens, and great God Almighty."

The ministers of religion must find other words to address their Creator in, if the sacred name of Omnipotence is to be thus prostituted in common conversation.

To weak minds, by whom principally this vice is committed, it has one advantage indeed, that of supplying the place of argument and good sense. Oh, if they only knew with what disgust this language is heard by gentlemen, both by the virtuous and depraved, they would soon relinquish it! Let them reflect, that there will always be in society some, who, from a want of merit in themselves, view with the watchful eye of malignant envy a superiority in any of their sex; and who will take advantage of every opportunity to exaggerate their weakness.

The writer of this will probably be charged by some with uncharitable aspersions on the female character, but he is conscious of having advanced nothing that daily experience does not prove the truth of; he still hopes that notwithstanding the irregularities of a few there will always be sufficient cause to be

AN ADMIRER OF THE SEX.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE BRITISH CLASSICS.

MESSRS. Benjamin Davies and John Morgan, booksellers, of this city, have issued proposals for printing, by subscription, the first American edition of The Select British Classics to be copied page for page, from the last London edition, in 38 volumes; containing the Tatler, Spectator, Guardian, Connoisseur, the World, Rambler, Idler, Adventurer, Mirror, Shenstone's Sketches on Men and Manners, Citizen of the World, and all the other essays of Dr. Goldsmith, together with brief Memoirs of the Lives of the principal Authors. This is a most laudable undertaking, and the booksellers concerned have chosen, with much judgment, a collection, at once elegant and popular, for the perusal of which "the busy may find time, and the idle patience." We extract the following detail of their design:

It would be superfluous to dilate in praise of that constellation of eminent authors, who have been distinguished in these volumes by the peculiar title of British classics. The names of Addison, Steele, Pope, Johnson, Hawkesworth, and Goldsmith, have been too long known, and too highly esteemed, to stand in need of an eulogium, at the present day. The excellent essays, written by them and others, their contemporaries, which are now proposed for publication, have been justly admired, as a faithful picture of the manners of the eighteenth century, and recommended as containing, not only a rich magazine of moral and critical knowledge, as well as chaste amusement, but as the fairest models of English composition....seldom equalled, and never surpassed by the writers of this or any other age. Before these luminous and instructive pages all the tomes of ancient philosophy, and all the gibberish of modern innovators, on the rights and duties of man sink into obscurity. Quid utile, quid non melius Chrysippo, vel Crantore dicit.

The intended publishers add, that they intend, if duly encouraged, to publish their edition of these "Classics" in a style, that will not dishonour the works themselves, or be deemed unworthy public patronage. The conditions of publication are, that the work will be put to press, when 300 subscribers shall have been obtained, a volume to be delivered every fortnight; each volume on a woven paper, with a new type, and two engravings, the best that can be obtained in the United States. The price, to be paid on delivery, 87 cents for each volume, in boards. A list of subscribers will be printed in the last volume. Nothing is more pleasant, to the writer of this article, than literary projects of the above description. To reprint works of established merit, and of fluent style, is laudable, in every country, and at any season, but it is peculiarly praiseworthy in America, at the present period, to multiply the copies of classical books. Contrary to the usual course, we think this American edition of all the periodical essays of merit will have a decided superiority to the English edition by Parsons. This bookseller, although sufficiently curious in the choice of paper and type, has been scandalously negligent of the correctness of his pages, and few books of such extent, and of such elegance of decoration, abound more with gross and enormous errors of typography. But the elder editor of the republication here, will carefully avoid all these blunders of carelessness or misapprehension. Mr. DAVIES, who knows much more of books than their title page, and who has familiarized himself to all the varieties of English style, will, by inspecting the proof sheets himself, abundantly guard against all the errors of his predecessor. By one, desirous of possessing the classics of his mother tongue, more cannot be desired than an edition of all the periodical essays, printed not less beautifully, and much more correctly than that of Parsons.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

In our last week's review, we attempted to pay some part of our arrears to the public; the remaining portion we shall now endeavour to discharge. The managers invited the attention of the town to three other dramas of the immortal Shakespeare, during the temporary recess of our labours. Cymbeline, Macbeth, and the Merry Wives of Windsor were performed, and performed to scanty audiences. Indeed their exertions have, since the commencement of the present season, been, in general, very inadequately compensated. We have witnessed, with pain, night after night, the cheerless appearance of a house scarcely half filled. This desertion of a scene of rational amusement, is, perhaps, in some degree, attributable to the number of festive parties, which too often, upon the nights of performance, attract the presence of the belles, and, of course, compel the attendance of the beaux. We could wish that the young and the gay would endeavour to arrange their parties, so as to interfere as little as possible with the interests of those, whose business it is to cater for the amusement of the public. A hint on this subject will not, we trust, be thrown away.

In our review of the dramas above-mentioned, we must necessarily be brief. Mr. Fullerton's Macbeth was by no means what could be wished; yet it was far from being contemptible. The candid hearer could not but find something to applaud; and it were unjust to mark, with extreme critical severity, the imperfections of a performance, which was most probably undertaken in the routine of his duty, and which presented almost the only means of giving us an opportunity of witnessing the excellence of Mrs. Whitlock in Lady Macbeth; on whose admirable delineation of that character, we cannot omit bestowing our warmest applause.

We need not speak of Warren's Falstaff, in the Merry Wives of Windsor. The parts of the merry wives were well sustained by Mrs. Whitlock and miss Westray; and Wignell was highly respectable in the delineation of the character of the jealous Ford.

A new play, possessed of much excellence, was represented, for the first time, on Wednesday..... Founded upon that art, by which those, whom nature has deprived of the faculties of hearing and of speech, are enabled to communicate their ideas in writing, and to hold converse by signs. The author of Deaf and Dumb has constructed a drama, full of interesting incidents, which conducts a helpless orphan to the recovery of honours and estates, of which he had been criminally deprived, by the artifices of a near, but unnatural relation. This is effected by the active interference of the benevolent abbe L'Epee. It is said that the return of the abbe Sicard, the present instructor of the deaf and dumb was, in a great measure, owing to the interest excited at Paris, on the representation of this play. It was received, by a Philadelphia audience, with repeated and unusual shouts of well-merited applause. It was excellently performed. Mr. Cain supported the character of St. Alme, with unusual energy and effect, and his excellence increased with the increasing energy of the scene. Mr. Wignell was an expressive representative of the criminal but repentant Dupré. Warren and Wood were correct and animated in their respective characters of Darlemont and Franval, and Mr. Fullerton was respectable in the abbe L'Epee. The serious cast of characters, sustained by their efforts, was happily relieved by the interesting naivete of miss Westray, in Marianne, and the laughable absurdities of Bernard, in Dominique.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Four other numbers of Mr. Carr's Musical Journal have appeared since our last review. The vocal department is unusually rich. Two of the songs may be selected as master-pieces in their respective styles. The finished elegance of the "Silken Cord," and the charming simplicity of "I have a little Heart," can scarcely be exceeded. But we meet with other vocal compositions of real excellence. "Sweet Music, Tink a Tank," and "Oh red look'd the Sun," are truly characteristic melodies, and the latter is sweetly pathetic. "From these Roseate Bowers Aurora" is pleasing, although not a very novel modulation, and the taste of the composer of "A rose from her Bosom had strayed," is visible in the delicate accompaniment to "Oh had I the Wings of an Eagle I'd fly."

The instrumental section contains a beautiful Irish melody, with variations, and three specimens of East Indian airs, which, as the editor justly remarks, may be considered as musical curiosities.

Upon the whole, we are much gratified with the increasing excellence of the Musical Miscellany; and would only remind Mr. Carr, that the third volume of the Musical Journal contains, hitherto, only one composition of his own.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE subsequent ironical preference of artificial to genuine blushes, and of white lead to the "candid hue of innocence," is one of the most poignant satires ever uttered against a vain and ruinous system of deception, practised by cheating coquettes, and by which no one is deceived:

The superiority of artificial to natural beauty will appear in all its dignity, if we contrast the permanent bloom of the former, with the unfashionable blushings of the latter. A truly modest woman, whose delicate organization delineates every strong emotion in her expressive face, must appear a singular being in the eyes of those modish females, whose faces wear one unchangeable smile. The aspect of the modest woman is like the Aurora Borealis, while her blushes alternately flash and fade; but the countenance of the accomplished lady, decorated with cosmetics, resembles the sun, and shines with unfading glory!

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHAUCER.

GEOFFREY CHAUCER, the earliest English poet, who is entitled to the honour of a classic in the language, the great improver of its versification, and enricher of its diction, was born, probably at London, in 1328. Notwithstanding the researches of his numerous biographers, his parentage, and the circumstances of his education and early life, remain involved in obscurity.

It is generally agreed, that he studied in both universities, first in Cambridge, then in Oxford; yet his most learned commentator, Mr. Tyrwhit, seems to think these facts very uncertain. That he acquired a very enlarged acquaintance, with the scholastic learning of the age is, however, sufficiently proved by his writings; and he further improved himself, by travels through France and the Low-countries. On his return, he is supposed to have, for a time, pursued the study of law, at the Temple; but his final destination was the court, where he first obtained the post of valetus, or yeoman to the king, Edward III.

He had already distinguished himself as a poet, a quality that was likely to recommend him to that magnificent prince, who was a patron of letters. He seems, however, to have placed the chief hopes of his fortune, on the friendship of John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, with whose family he formed an intimate connection, though not of the most creditable kind.

The duke entertained, as governess to his children, Catharine, a native of Hainault, who came over with his duchess, and afterwards was the widow of sir Hugh Swynford. This lady was the favourite mistress of John of Gaunt, by whom she had several children. She had a sister, Philippa, a favourite also, with both the duke and duchess, who recommended her to Chaucer for a wife. He married her in 1360, and, thenceforth, made a speedy progress at court. We find him, some years after, gratified with an annuity from the exchequer, of twenty marks, which sum was doubled, on his being appointed gentleman of the king's privy-chamber.

In 1372, he was sent, together with some other persons, as a commissioner to treat with the republic of Genoa, on a matter of public concern.... Soon after his return, he was rewarded with the lucrative post of comptroller of the customs, in the port of London, for wool and hides; and various other pecuniary favours were conferred upon him, which enabled him to live in a dignified style. These public employments, however, did not cause him to renounce his literary pursuits, for several of his poems were written during the period of his prosperity and court attendance. Still he seems to have considered the duke of Lancaster as his peculiar patron, in whose political schemes he thought himself bound to enter, as a faithful and zealous dependent. The duke having espoused the cause of the reformer, Wickliffe, Chaucer employed his pen in exposing the vices and ignorance of the clergy.

The last public employment he bore in Edward's reign, was that of a commissioner, to manage a treaty with the king of France. On the succession of young Richard to the crown, in 1377, the duke of Lancaster, for a time, obtained the chief share in the administration, and Chaucer might reasonably expect to reap the benefit of his patron's interest.

We find, at the beginning of this reign, a record of the renewal of some grants made to him in the former reign, yet it seems as if he lost his office of comptroller of the customs. And it is certain, that his affairs fell into disorder at this time, since he was obliged to have recourse to the king's protection against his creditors. The duke of Lancaster himself, in a few years, lost much of his credit with the king and people, from his patronage of the Wickliffites, who were thought the authors of the popular commotions which disturbed the kingdom. The city of London was divided into two parties, one favouring reformation, the other adhering to the clergy. Chaucer, who acted with the former, made himself so obnoxious, that sir Robert Knolles, whom the king sent to suppress disturbances, resolved to apprehend him.

Obtaining timely notice of his danger, he fled to Hainault, and thence to Zealand, where he lived some time in concealment, and in great distress. Returning privately to England, to avoid starving, he was seized and sent to prison, where he was treated with great rigour. Offers of pardon, however, were made him, upon a full disclosure of all he knew, concerning the designs of his party, with which he thought proper to comply, and thus obtained his liberty, but accompanied with a heavy load of obloquy.

The duke of Lancaster withdrew his countenance from him; and so low was he reduced, that he sold his pensions, and retired to Woodstock, which had been a favourite residence with him, during the time of his prosperity. Here he calmly employed himself in revising and correcting his writings, applying to use those stores of philosophy, which study and reflection had enabled him to accumulate. In this retreat, he passed the remainder of his life, except the two last years of it, which he spent at Dunnington Castle.

The return of the duke of Lancaster to court, and his marriage with his old mistress, Catharine Swynford, after seeming to have deserted her, were favourable circumstances to the fortune of Chaucer, who obtained a renewal of his annuity and protection, and the grant of a pipe of wine annually, from the customs of the port of London. By these advantages, his declining years were cheered and comforted.

The succession of Henry IV, the son of his patron, to the crown, was attended with the renewal of his grants, and the addition of forty marks per annum, during life. It is a mistake, however, to suppose that he was poet-laureat to this king, or either of the two preceding, since that office was not then in being. A necessity of soliciting his causes in the metropolis, brought him from his retirement, soon after the commencement of the new reign, which he did not long survive. He died in 1400, at the age of seventy-two, and was interred in Westminster abbey.

From the preceding sketch of Chaucer's life, it appears that he was fully as much the man of the world, as the student; and to the variety of scenes in which he bore a part, is to be attributed the varied character of his writings. As a courtier, a traveller, and a man of pleasure, he acquired an air of gallantry, and a talent for rich and elegant description, which distinguished him from the dry and scholastic writers of this nascent period of English poetry; at the same time, a fund of serious reading, joined with the many occasions he had for the exercise of sober reflection, rendered him fit to sustain the part of the divine or philosopher.

Of his voluminous works, by much the greater number are translations or imitations from the French and Italian writers; and the accuracy of modern inquiry has detected him as a borrower, in several instances, where he had formerly been thought original. It is, therefore, as the enricher of his native tongue, by new forms of diction and versification, that his merit is to be estimated, rather than as a poetical inventor. With respect to his language, indeed, some critics have as much blamed him for corrupting it, with a large admixture of French, as others have praised him for improving its copiousness.

Mr. Tyrwhit, in an admirable essay on Chaucer's language and versification (prefixed to the fourth volume of his edition of the Canterbury Tales), has taken a middle opinion, and has endeavoured to show, that the mixture of French words in the English language, whether a corruption or an improvement, had gradually been taking place, long before the age of Chaucer, though he, as a great translator from the French, might more freely have borrowed words from that language, than his contemporary writers. In his versification, he appears, to the same critic, to have been more decidedly an innovator or improver; and, in particular, the introduction of heroic measure into English verse is ascribed to him. In the use of this, he has many lines, as correct and harmonious as could be written at the present day; the greater part, however, read according to the modern prosody and pronunciation, seem almost totally destitute of measure.

Mr. Tyrwhit has, very ingeniously, attempted to reconcile this apparent contradiction in the metrical system of Chaucer, by showing the great changes in our prosody, that have taken place since his time, especially in the disuse of adding a syllable for the plural number, and in the quiescence of the final e. Notwithstanding these allowances, however, it is impossible to give that regularity to Chaucer's measure, which we find in modern English verse, but which was not attained till some centuries after Chaucer wrote.

But there is nothing in which our author more excels his contemporaries, than in possessing that true poetical character, of which they are almost totally void. In many of his tales are to be found (mixed, doubtless, with much of meaner matter) strong and splendid imagery, displayed in glowing and elegant diction. He both conceives and expresses things like a poet; and, where a mere copyist in the subject, he often attains the force of an original, by his manner. He has also shown himself capable of that universality which denotes superior talents; and has accommodated his style to the pathetic and sublime, as happily as to the humorous and satirical. That he has the defects of his age, coarseness, tediousness, and want of taste, is not to be wondered at; to have escaped them, would have been almost a miracle.

His pieces are so numerous, that a catalogue of them would prove tiresome. The more juvenile ones are mostly upon topics of love and gallantry. He translated the famous "Romaunt of the Rose of John de Meun," "Troilus and Cressida," and "Palamon and Arcite," from Boccace. In maturer age, he gave a prose translation of Boethius "De Consolatione Philosophiæ;" and one of his latest works was a "Treatise on the Astrolabe," compiled for the instruction of his young son, Lewis, then a student at Oxford. But the most considerable and famous work of Chaucer, is his "Canterbury Tales," a set of stories connected by the fiction of their being told by a company, met at an inn in Southwark, for the purpose of a pilgrimage to the shrine of St. Thomas à Becket, at Canterbury.

These tales are very various in their subject; heroic and romantic, satirical, humorous, and moral. The merit of some of them has caused them to be modernised by our best versifiers; and the majestic Dryden has not disdained to transplant a few into the choicest of his poetical parterres. The prologue to these tales is one of the most curious and valuable memorials of the age. It contains a description of all the personages forming the pilgrim train, among whom are individuals of the most remarkable characters, of which society was then composed, both male and female. These are delineated with a strength and precision, that can scarcely be surpassed, and form a group highly interesting to the student of manners,

The works of Chaucer have often been edited, from the time of Caxton to the present age. The last complete edition is that of Mr. Urry; but the Canterbury Tales have been published separately by Mr. Tyrwhit, in five volumes, octavo, 1775, 1778, in a manner much superior to that of any preceding critic, who has employed himself on this ancient author.

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED,
NUMBER VII.

THE next exceptionable feature in the Message, is the proposal to abolish all restriction on naturalization, arising from a previous residence. In this the President is not more at variance with the concurrent maxims of all commentators on popular governments, than he is with himself. The Notes on Virginia are in direct contradiction to the Message, and furnish us with strong reasons against the policy now recommended. The passage alluded to is here presented: Speaking of the population of America, Mr. Jefferson there says, "Here I will beg leave to propose a doubt. The present desire of America, is to produce rapid population, by as great importations of foreigners as possible. But is this founded in good policy?" "Are there no inconveniences to be thrown into the scale, against the advantage expected from a multiplication of numbers, by the importation of foreigners? It is for the happiness of those united in society, to harmonize as much as possible, in matters which they must of necessity transact together. Civil government being the sole object of forming societies, its administration must be conducted by common consent. Every species of government has its specific principles: Ours, perhaps, are more peculiar than those of any other in the universe. It is a composition of the freest principles of the English Constitution, with others, derived from natural right and reason. To these, nothing can be more opposed than the maxims of absolute monarchies. Yet from such, we are to expect the greatest number of emigrants. They will bring with them the principles of the governments they leave, imbibed in their early youth; or if able to throw them off, it will be in exchange for an unbounded licentiousness, passing, as is usual, from one extreme to another. It would be a miracle were they to stop precisely at the point of temperate liberty. Their principles with their language, they will transmit to their children. In proportion to their numbers, they will share with us in the legislation. They will infuse into it their spirit, warp and bias its direction, and render it a heterogeneous, incoherent, distracted mass. I may appeal to experience, during the present contest, for a verification of these conjectures: but if they be not certain in event, are they not possible, are they not probable? Is it not safer to wait with patience for the attainment of any degree of population desired or expected? May not our government be more homogeneous, more peaceable, more durable? Suppose 20 millions of republican Americans, thrown all of a sudden into France, what would be the condition of that kingdom? If it would be more turbulent, less happy, less strong, we may believe that the addition of half a million of foreigners, to our present numbers, would produce a similar effect here." Thus wrote Mr. Jefferson in 1781—Behold the reverse of the medal. The Message of the President contains the following sentiments, "A denial of citizenship under a residence of 14 years, is a denial to a great proportion of those who ask it, and controuls a policy pursued from their first settlement, by many of these states, and still believed of consequence to their prosperity. And shall we refuse to the unhappy fugitives, from distress, that hospitality which the savages of the wilderness extended to our fathers arriving in this land? Shall oppressed humanity find no asylum on this globe? Might not the general character and capabilities of a citizen, be safely communicated to every one manifesting a bona fide purpose of embarking his life and fortune permanently with us?"

But if gratitude can be allowed to form an excuse for inconsistency in a public character, in The Man of the People; a strong plea of this sort may be urged in behalf of our President. It is certain that had the late election been decided entirely by native citizens, had foreign auxiliaries been rejected on both sides, the man who ostentatiously vaunts that the doors of public honor and confidence have been burst open to him, would not now have been at the head of the American nation. Such a proof then of virtuous discernment in the oppressed fugitives, had an imperious claim on him to a grateful return, and without supposing any very uncommon share of self-love, would naturally be a strong reason for a revolution in his opinions.

The pathetic and plaintive exclamations by which the sentiment is enforced, might be liable to much criticism, if we are to consider it in any other light, than as a flourish of rhetoric. It might be asked in return, does the right to asylum or hospitality carry with it the right to suffrage and sovereignty? And what indeed was the courteous reception which was given to our forefathers, by the savages of the wilderness? When did these humane and philanthropic savages exercise the policy of incorporating strangers among themselves, on their first arrival in the country? When did they admit them into their huts, to make part of their families, and when did they distinguish them by making them their sachems? Our histories and traditions have been more than apocryphal, if any thing like this kind and gentle treatment was really lavished by the much-believed savages upon our thankless forefathers. But the remark occurs, had it all been true, prudence inclines to trace the history farther, and ask what has become of the nations of savages who exercised this policy? And who now occupies the territory which they then inhabited? Perhaps a useful lesson might be drawn from this very reflection.

But we may venture to ask what does the President really mean, by insinuating that we treat aliens coming to this country, with inhospitality? Do we not permit them quietly to land on our shores? Do we not protect them equally with our own citizens, in their persons and reputation; in the acquisition and enjoyment of property? Are not our courts of justice open for them to seek redress of injuries? And are they not permitted peaceably to return to their own country whenever they please, and to carry with them all their effects? What then means this worse than idle declamation?

The impolicy of admitting foreigners to an immediate and unreserved participation in the right of suffrage, or in the sovereignty of a Republic, is as much a received axiom as any thing in the science of politics, and is verified by the experience of all ages. Among other instances, it is known, that hardly any thing contributed more to the downfall of Rome, than her precipitate communication of the privileges of citizenship to the inhabitants of Italy at large. And how terribly was Syracuse scourged by perpetual seditions, when, after the overthrow of the tyrants, a great number of foreigners were suddenly admitted to the rights of citizenship? Not only does ancient but modern, and even domestic history furnish evidence of what may be expected from the dispositions of foreigners, when they get too early footing in a country. Who wields the sceptre of France, and has erected a Despotism on the ruins of a Republic? A foreigner.—Who rules the councils of our own ill-fated, unhappy country? And who stimulates persecution on the heads of its citizens, for daring to maintain an opinion, and for exercising the rights of suffrage? A foreigner?—Where is the virtuous pride that once distinguished Americans?—Where the indignant spirit which in defence of principle, hazarded a revolution to attain that independence now insidiously attacked?

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

OBITUARY.

DIED, at Boston, on the second instant, the Honourable GEORGE RICHARDS MINOT, after a short and agoinizing illness. In announcing the death of this most amiable man and upright magistrate, we cannot omit to remark the deep regret and pointed interest, which universally prevail, in contemplating the loss of this invaluable character: a man, in whom wisdom and worth were so happily displayed, that all parties have strove which shall praise him most. This gentleman was born in Boston, in December, 1758, and, after profiting by all the advantages resulting from the best education our country can bestow, was admitted to the bar in 1781. As he possessed a delicacy and temperament ill suited to that tumultuous and jarring profession, he early left the wrangling of the forum, to exercise his talents and integrity as private counsel. In this situation he increased his legal knowledge, indulged his honourable preventive skill, and left others to profit by the soundness of his judgment; and often will his opinions be quoted, when the most eloquent harangues may be forgotten.

In May, 1782, he was appointed clerk to the house of representatives, which office he filled with great reputation for ten years, and then resigned it, and received the unanimous thanks of the house, which were voted to be specially presented to him by the speaker.

In this station he acquired that political knowledge, and temperate system of reasoning on the motives and actions of parties, which secured to him a complete independence of sentiment, during the tempestuous season, which has so long continued to divide and distract our country. He learnt, and deeply felt the importance of the conviction to his beloved fellow citizens, "that to obey the laws was to reign with them."

In 1782 he delivered and published an oration, at the request of the inhabitants of the town, on the subject which first sounded the tocsin, in the eventful night of the 5th of March, 1770, which was an epoch that led to the revolution afterwards so gloriously effected.

In 1788 he published the history of the insurrection in Massachusetts. Of this work, which has been compared with the Cataline conspiracy of Sallust, it may be said, that it was without a rival in any previous provincial publication.

In January, 1789, he was admitted a member of the American Academy of Arts and Sciences, and died an officer of that respectable association.

He was among the first twelve original members of the Massachusetts Historical Society....and it must be unnecessary to add, that a man of his indefatigable research, and patience of detail, was one of its most distinguished associates.

In 1792 he was appointed judge of probate, for the county of Suffolk, and sustained that arduous office until his death. For this station he was admirably qualified....Mildness, patience, knowledge, philanthropy, and feeling, endeared him to all the suitors of that court, as the inflexible guardian of the widow, and the orphan's friend. Exalted spirit! thou hast borne the mens conscia recti to the chancery of the skies, and, followed by the prayers of the virtuous, art now meeting thy reward!

In May, 1795, he delivered a discourse to the members of the Charitable Fire Society. He was one of the principal founders of that institution, and died its president. This literary effort to aid its funds has been annually pursued since, and largely contributed to the humane views of its supporters.

In January, 1799, he was appointed chief justice of the court of common pleas, for the county of Suffolk, and the gentlemen of the bar knew best how to appreciate the learning and benignity, that could change the professional arena of a courthouse into a hall of cheerfulness and dispatch.

Concerning his eulogy on the FIRST MAN of his country, and his volume* of the Massachusetts history, it would be needless to offer a remark....because few, who revered a WASHINGTON, or are interested in the historic memoirs of the state, but are in possession of both.

In all capital seaports, larcenies and petty crimes are numerous. To relieve the heavy expense of the town of Boston, arising from this source, and, if possible, to check the evil, an application was made to the legislature to establish a peculiar municipal court, whose business should be exclusively criminal, and by its frequent meetings, supersede, in this respect, the jurisdiction of the quarter sessions. This plan was carried into effect. The court was erected, and in May, 1800, judge Minot was commissioned sole justice. The great number of cases that have come before that court, since his appointment, demonstrates the utility of the system. In no causes more than in criminal prosecutions, ought trials to be prompt, and without delay. The humanity that tempered the severity of offended justice, whilst it excited his reverence, satisfied the victim, that his judge considered that protection was the aim, and reform, not ruin, the sole end of the law.

Accept, dear, departed spirit, this short tribute of truth and love, from one, who early knew the purity of thy principles....who through life participated thy friendship....derived assistance from thy talents, and whose best ambition would be to benefit by thy example, and, dying, justly to anticipate a posthumous reputation, spotless as thy own.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

[We publish the following Prospectus entire, not only as it is a well written article, but because we wish to give notoriety to a plan well digested for the public good.]

"PROSPECTUS of a newspaper to be published in Baltimore, under the title of THE REPUBLICAN; OR, ANTI-DEMOCRAT. By Prentiss and Cole.

"It is a truth which can never be too strongly inculcated, or too closely kept in view, that in popular governments, which depend on public opinion, the greatest exertions are perpetually necessary to maintain it in a correct state.

"These exertions, indeed, will not always be effectual. Public opinion will sometimes be misled: but this should not discourage the friends of liberty, much less induce them to abandon her cause; for truth, though slow, is permanent in its nature, and constant in its operation, while falsehood and prejudice act with violence, but soon pass away. The still small voice, which speaks to the understanding and the heart, though drowned for a time in the storm of the passions, will be heard again in the calm which succeeds.

"Hence the necessity, at all times, in governments like ours, of publications devoted to the purpose of diffusing correct information on political subjects. By them alone can those errors which ambitious and profligate men perpetually disseminate, be successfully combated, and their misrepresentations and falsehoods detected and exposed. They alone can tear away that cloak of false patriotism, of affected adoration of the people, of pretended love of liberty, under which such men, like wolves in sheep's clothing endeavour to gain entrance into the fold, and to devour the flock.

"This necessity is doubly urgent at the present moment, when a party acting under the garb of republicanism, has succeeded in gaining possession of the government, and has given indications but too frequent and too strong, of a determination to exercise its powers without regard to constitutional restraint or private right.

"The instances wherein this determination has appeared, need not now be particularly enumerated. Unhappily they are too striking as well as too numerous. Some, however, of the most prominent and alarming, it seems indispensable to notice.

"A great number of persons have been deprived of offices which they had long held; not because they were chargeable, or in fact charged, with mal-practice, incapacity or neglect, but merely to make room for the partizans of those in power, and to supply the means of those rewards, which, according to every appearance, had been previously stipulated for party services; a system which strongly tends to destroy the best incentive to assiduity and good conduct in office, by rendering its tenure dependent, not upon them, but on adherence to party; and threatens corruption to the public morals, by holding out the expectation of bribes in our elections.

"The executive power of appointment to office, bestowed by the people for the better selection of able and faithful servants to the public, has been converted into an instrument of party jobs; and, too probably, into a fund for the wages of legislative as well as elective corruption.

"In the dismissal of a judge from office, by the mere authority of the president, and under the flimsy pretext of a verbal error in the commission, the constitution has been expressly violated, in that most important article, which provides for the independence of the judiciary, by declaring, that "the judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall both hold their places during good behaviour;" and the legislature has recently been invited to commit a similar though more glaring violation of the same article. Contrary to another express provision of the constitution, money belonging to the United States, actually received by their officers for their use, has in one instance been paid away, and in another has been attempted to be paid away, without any appropriation by law, but merely by the president's authority.

"A power has been assumed not merely to pardon offences, but to screen them, when committed by the partizans of the president, from investigation and inquiry, by arresting prosecutions against the offenders.

"And finally, the power has been claimed to dispense with the execution of laws, under the pretext of their being considered as unconstitutional by the executive; a power which if it extend to one law must extend to all; which completely subverts the government, by rendering the legislature subordinate to the executive authority; and for the exercise of which, our ancestors, in another country and an age when liberty was far less understood than at present, drove one king from the throne and brought another to the block.

"One case indeed has occurred of a nature still more alarming; the case of a law dispensed with or suspended in one of its provisions, merely because the executive considered it as inexpedient, and intended, at the next meeting of the legislature, to propose its repeal.

"To this it must be added, that in some states where the same party has obtained possession of power, the rights of suffrage have been trampled under foot; the liberty of the press has been openly invaded; and public officers, of long tried fidelity and well approved services, have been driven from their places, to make room for the leaders of the party themselves, or to provide for their children, their relations or their dependants.

"These instances, on which the Editors will take occasion hereafter more fully to dilate, argue an ignorance of the constitution which it is difficult to suppose, or a contempt for its provisions and restraints, which nothing could inspire but a confidence of party support, and a thorough reliance on that popularity, which determination has been manifested to purchase, at the expence of every constitutional power of the government, as well as of its most essential establishments. They also furnish a new proof and illustration of a truth long since discovered, that no tyranny is so shameless and profligate, as that which demagogues exercise in the name of the people; because none is so completely seconded by the passions, so blindly obeyed, or so free from the restraints of personal responsibility.

"These instances are surely sufficient to excite a great and well founded alarm for our liberties and constitution; and to engage all those who hold them dear, and who do not stand within the pale of that sect in favour whereof the laws are violated and the constitution trampled under foot, to unite, accordingly to their respective means and opportunities, for the defence of those invaluable blessings. When a determination is manifested to overleap all the restraints of the constitution, as often as they stand in the way of executive favouritism, party resentment, or the lust of power; by flattering the passions and the vices of one half of the nation, to gain its assistance in tyrannizing over the other half; and to augment the personal power of the chief magistrate, by sacrificing the constitutional authority and dignity of his office, and prostrating the just powers of the government at the feet of state ambition; it is surely time for the friends of rational liberty, of authority supported and restrained by law, of real Republicanism, to rouse from their lethargy, and to exert, with energy and perseverance, the lawful means which are still left to them, for averting evils of such magnitude, from their country, their posterity and themselves.

"Among these means, the press is undoubtedly the most efficacious. That it has hitherto been too little employed, by those who have defended the cause of liberty and law, is a truth which has been long observed and lamented. They seem at length to be convinced of their error. We hope that it is not too late. But although several presses, especially in the northern, and eastern states, have been established for the defence of law, government and order, and are conducted with a spirit and ability worthy of the cause, yet much, even there, remains to be done; and in that important division of the nation which lies to the southward of Pennsylvania, little has been attempted. For that quarter, therefore, a press on the same principles is indispensably necessary; and if properly conducted, it might be of essential use in every quarter. Such a press might become a national establishment, and the organ and rallying point of the friends of regulated liberty, throughout the union.

"The advantages to be derived from such a point of union, from such an organ for the expression of their opinions, from such an instrument for the defence of their principles and rights, must be obvious to those whose situation and sep-timents, call them to united efforts. The Editors are not so presumptuous as to suppose themselves adequate to such a task; but strongly impressed with the truth and importance of the ideas contained in this address, and encouraged by the hope of extensive and able support, they have resolved to attempt the establishment of a paper, which, though it must fall far short of their wishes, may yet, they trust, be productive of some benefit to the cause which they hold most dear.

"Various considerations have concurred to induce them to fix on Baltimore as the seat of their establishment. The vicinity of that city to the seat of government, affords an opportunity of attending minutely to all the movements of our political machine, and of obtaining the earliest and most authentic information, respecting our domestic affairs; while its extensive commerce gives it greater advantages for foreign intelligence, than the city of Washington can, for a long time to come, be expected to obtain. Its position, near the centre of the continent, and on the great post road leading from north and south, renders its communication with every part of the United States, highly prompt and certain. Its wealth and population enable it to supply in abundance, all the materials necessary for the support of a newspaper. And it enjoys a ready and constant communication with every part of the state of Maryland, a state highly important in the union by its local position, as well as by its magnitude and its wealth; of which Baltimore is not only the universal market, but the most central point.

"These circumstances seem to point out Baltimore, as the most proper place for the publication of a national political newspaper.

"The main object of this paper will be to present democracy in its native deformity, by stripping off its assumed mask of republicanism: to rescue that respectable and venerated name, from the disgrace which it must otherwise suffer, by its forced and unnatural association with democracy: to shew that republicanism, the true definition of which is "representative government, restrained and regulated by constitutional limits, law and established rights," differs essentially from democracy, which in practice and theory is nothing more or less than a government nominally elective, and owning no restraint or rule of action, except the will of the majority: to defend the federal constitution against the violations and aggressions of a democratic party, acting substantially on those principles, but concealing its true character under the cloak of republicanism; and in fine to shew that federalism and republicanism, rightly understood, mean the same thing; and that democracy is essentially anti-federal, being wholly incompatible with the existence of the federal constitution, or of any system of government adequate to the affairs of a community, so great and extensive as the United States. Conforming the title of their paper to these its great objects, they have resolved to call it THE REPUBLICAN, OR ANTI-DEMOCRAT. In the selection of this name, they by no means intend to relinquish the ancient and honourable appellation of that party to which the federal constitution is indebted for its institution and establishment; for republicanism being a general principle, federalism is nothing more than its particular application to the situation and government of the United States.

"Of the manner in which their paper is proposed to be conducted, they deem it proper to say a few words.

"That it shall never be prostituted to the purposes of personal slander or private abuse, they confidently engage. That in discussing public questions and especially in examining the conduct of the government, its language shall always be decorous, and suitable to the respect due to those who are clothed with legal authority; and its statements regulated by the strictest regard to truth, they also promise. And as it is to them, and to those on whose support they chiefly rely, a matter of perfect indifference by whom the government is administered, provided it be administered according to the constitution, and on principles conducive to the public good, they shall most readily bestow praise on all those acts of the present administration, which shall be found to square with those standards. Every appearance of an adherence or a return to just principles, which shall be manifested by the friends and supporters of the administration, will also be noticed with due commendation; and it is with the most heartfelt pleasure that they congratulate their country on some manifestations of that kind which have already been made. On these they will ever delight to dwell, as proofs the most consoling, that to whatever excesses men may go, in the conflicts of party, or the pursuit of power, still if they possess understanding and virtue, or even understanding without virtue, they will at length return to correct principles, will wish to exercise in a rational and beneficial manner, the power thus attained; that although men of sense and character will sometimes, for the gratification of their ambition or their revenge, condescend to make use of the little noisy turbulent demagogues of democracy, they will never suffer beings of that description to direct the offices of their country.

"Of candor and impartiality, when rightly understood, they avow themselves the admirers. In their opinion those respectable qualities do not consist in a weak and wavering versatility, or in a state of neutrality between contending systems and parties. He who believes one system to be right, must believe its opposing system to be wrong; and if he possess sense and virtue, he must be as decided and constant in his opposition to one, as in his support to the other. But he may judge his opponents dispassionately; may distinguish between such actions as proceed from wickedness, and such as have their origin in honest error or mistake; and may bestow praise with frankness, when praise is their due: and above all, he may adhere rigidly to truth, whether his friends or his opponents are profited or hurt by it. This species of candour and impartiality the Editors profess, and will endeavour to practice.

"To the strictures and arguments of all parties, provided they be conveyed in correct, decorous and respectful language, their paper shall ever be open; but they reserve to themselves the right of subjoining to every publication, such remarks or reply as its contents may seem to demand.

"To the respectable Editors who are already engaged in the honourable task wherein they themselves are about to participate, they offer their best wishes, and such service and assistance as it may be in their power to render; soliciting in return similar aid where it can be conveniently afforded. It becomes those engaged in so noble a cause, to view each other as brothers, united by more than common ties, and to aid each other mutually, in advancing the great object of their common pursuit.

"For the prompt, regular and extensive supply of foreign intelligence, they have made such arrangements as they hope will be effectual; and although the main object of their paper will be political, yet as they wish to render it useful in a mercantile view, and to merit the patronage and support of that highly respectable class of society, they will spare no pains in the collection and arrangement of commercial and shipping intelligence.

"The debates and proceedings of congress being among the most interesting of those subjects which come within the purview of their plan, will receive a very particular attention. One of the Editors, C. Prentiss, will attend at the seat of government during the session of congress, for the purpose of taking them, and of collecting such political information as can there alone be obtained. On ordinary occasions, he will confine himself to a sketch of the debates; in which, however, it will be his aim to give correctly the substance of every argument or statement advanced by each speaker. Debates of a more solemn and important nature, will be given as much at large as the limits of the paper will admit, or the necessary promptness of publication allow. Above all, the Editors pledge themselves to the strictest truth and impartiality, in performing this part of their duty.

"Subjects of religion, literature, criticism and science, especially the three former, being intimately connected with correctness of political opinion, will claim and receive a particular regard. They profess themselves to be admirers of the old school in these, as well as in politics, and in the execution of this part of their task, they earnestly solicit the aid of those able pens, which abound among the friends and supporters of that school. Their own endeavours shall not be wanting, but speculations on these subjects demand more leisure, and more opportunity for critical research, than their professional avocations can often allow.

"As a daily paper is more useful in a city, and especially to persons engaged in commerce, while one published once a week may be made to contain all that is generally interesting to persons at a distance, and is both cheaper and more convenient for them, the editors have resolved to publish one paper daily for the city of Baltimore and its vicinity, and one weekly, for distant subscribers, which will contain all the political, and a portion of the miscellaneous matter of the other: with such advertisements as are of a general nature."

FOREIGN OCCURRENCES.

—A London paper, violently hostile to the administration, has the candour to make the following frank acknowledgement of the despotism of Buonaparte :—It is curious to watch the rapid progress of the executive government of France, from the sternness and self-denial of the old republican manners, to the luxury and profusion of the Roman emperors. The consulship of Buonaparte has nothing of the ancient consulship about it, but the name; it surrounds itself with all the state and magnificence, that were affected by the proudest or the vainest of the men that either dignified or disgraced the imperial purple! The prefects of the palace have followed the establishment of prefects of the departments. The office of commandant of the consular guard has been suppressed, whether because it was found to concentrate too much power in the hands of one man, we know not; and the palace of the consuls is, in future, to be under the guardianship and government of four prefects and a governor. It would be in vain to attempt to find an establishment similar, either in its functions or its magnificence, in any of the courts of modern Europe. It cannot, indeed, have escaped the notice of our readers, that Buonaparte is deeply attached to the manners and examples of ancient times. His consuls and his tribunes, his prefects of the palace and the provinces, his pro-prefects and his lieutenants, his generals, and his consular commandants, are all borrowed from the constitution and government of Rome; of Rome, however, not perhaps in the proudest page of her history, though certainly in the wildest range of her power.—The London Gazette states that Thomas Jackson, Esq. is appointed envoy extraordinary, and minister plenipotentiary to the court of Paris, and Francis Webbe, Esq. is to be the secretary of legation, and charge des affaires. They are immediately to repair to the congress at Aniens, to assist in negotiating the commercial treaty, at the same time that the definitive treaty shall be proceeded in. We need not say that Mr. Jackson, the son of the rev. Dr. Jackson, was minister at Turin. Mr. Webbe is not equally known to the public. He is a gentleman of high literary attainments, and was confidently consulted by the late duke of Leeds, while secretary of state.

DOMESTIC OCCURRENCES.

—At home, all men are in suspense, relative to the fate of the judiciary system. The dangerous concussion of one of the main pillars of the constitution, is viewed with dismay, even by the intrepid. One writer has declared, that to annul the present system, would be to murder the constitution, and that, on the novel text of the democrats, such comments will be read, as are written in blood. A profound remarker, in the Anti-Democrat, declares, that if, heedless of the general voice, the bill for repealing should pass, that moment the constitution receives a ghastly, incurable wound; and, though she may, with limping gait, drag along a short existence, yet the wound is mortal. Gouverneur Morris has again raised his "voice potential" in the senate; in a very extended speech, has scrutinized every topic of objection to the judiciary; by words of power, and "thoughts that burn," has exhorted the innovators to rein in their rashness; and has solemnly adjured a giddy majority to pause, before they topple headlong over the brink of ruin.—One of the northern politicians, who appears to be well acquainted with the instability of the populace, and the genius of capricious republicanism, has the following pointed paragraph, in a late essay. "But who can compare recent events, without sighing for the inconsistency of the people, and the uncertainty of public fame and honour!.....ALEXANDER HAMILTON, who systematized our debt, who foretold that the existing revenues would be adequate to this object, and who made various reports, founded on this presumption.....to which our readers are referred..... has been held up to the people, as their foe and oppressor, and as the advocate of extensive systems of taxation:.....while ALBERT GALLATIN, who opposed the establishment of the internal revenue; who predicted that our revenues, from existing sources, would fall short of our demands, and who first wrote a book to prove the necessity of direct taxes; vaults into the saddle, that was vacated by HAMILTON, and makes his triumphal entry, as the enemy of direct taxation, and inventor of the wonderful discovery, that our means, independent of that resource, in time of peace, are equal to our debts." —It is asserted in a respectable Northern print that perhaps it is not generally known that not one dollar of the Land Tax has been paid by or even assessed upon our southern brethren, while every industrious farmer, and citizen in New England has paid the uttermost farthing. It is remarked that when Lyon and others are petitioning to have their fines repaid them, and also damages for illegal confinement under the sedition act, would it not be well for the Yeomanry of New-England to petition to have their land tax repaid. The claim is infinitely just and vastly more honourable.—In the debate in the House of Representatives on the reduction of the military establishment, Mr. Bayard very poignantly remarked, that if gentlemen were for reducing the army in whatever degree, or for abandoning it altogether, he should go with them. He would, on such occasion, be governed by the same principles which had hitherto guided him. He had heretofore been disposed to repose a liberal confidence in the executive of the United States; and when an increase of military force had been recommended by the President, he had invariably been for it; much more would he be disposed, when a reduction was recommended from the same quarter, to sanction it by his vote. With the Executive rested the responsibility of the exterior defence of the nation, and if the Executive was of opinion that the nation was secure with a force of 3,000, 2,000, 1,000, or without a single man, he would concur with him in giving effect to such conviction.

Extract of a letter from a member of congress, at Washington, to his friend in Philadelphia.

Your fears, respecting the minds of our opponents being obscured by the clouds and tempests of Party rage are, unfortunately, too well founded. The majority now regulate their proceedings at Caucuses; and, while they permit our side to talk, they remain silent and vote us down. Dana has tendered them the homage of his high respect; and congratulated them on the adoption of that part of the French constitution which excludes debate in the legislature, and that the majority are only here to register the edicts of their master. He has also requested, that if the business of legislation is to be done at nightly conclaves, the minority be permitted to attend, and there learn the principles on which business is to be done.

The bill, brought into the senate, in consequence of Mr. Breckenridge's motion, has this morning passed to a third reading, by the casting vote of the vice president. There can now remain no doubt that it must become a law. We shall, therefore, pass the rubicon, and our constitution is nothing but a name. The majority mean also to repeal the internal revenue.

BLACKSTONE V. BRECKENRIDGE.

AS a specimen of the juridical lore of the mover of the frenzied proposition to abolish the judiciary system, we subjoin the following.

"They (the king's bench and common pleas in England), moreover, revise the proceedings of not only all the petty courts of record in the kingdom, even down to the courts of Piepoudre; but also of the court of king's bench in Ireland.

[Mr. Breckenridge's speech.

6. G. I. c. 5. declared that the peers of Ireland had no jurisdiction to affirm or reverse any judgments or decrees whatsoever. 'This statute was merely declaratory of the former law.

22. G. III. c. 53. repeals the stat. of G. I. and

23. G. III. c. 28. expressly declares, that "no appeal or writ of error from any court in Ireland, shall, for the future, be brought into any of the courts in England." [Blackstone's Commentaries.

We have been highly amused by reading, lately, a modern woman of fashion's instruction to her chambermaid.

Lay my head on the top of the drawers. Put my bottom on the chair, and the hips by it. Take care of my bosom, and do not ruffle it. Lay this eye in my dressing-box; and take my left shoulder, and put it under my head.

We have received the baleful news of the destruction, by a majority in the senate, of our present juridical system. One principal buttress of our constitution being thus wantonly removed, the downfall of the whole edifice may be clearly seen, without the second sight of a Scotchman.

Dr. Samuel Mitchell, the political alchemist, has, we understand, melted his professorship in the crucible of his politics. We understand that the particles of this great man's learning frequently fly off in fumo, and that his visionary schemes, for the welfare of his Utopia, will never amalgamate with common sense.

An acute writer, in the Boston Centinel, declares, that, in Gallatin's late report, we look in vain for the creative genius of HAMILTON, who originated and organized the beautiful system of our public credit, and for the classic purity of a WOLCOTT.

That was a spirited reply of one of our merchants, on being told that a vessel, in which was the principal part of his property, was cast away."My heart, thank God, is still afloat, my spirits shall not sink with my ship."

A baker in this city offers Mammoth bread for sale. We suppose that his gigantic loaves were baked at a Salt Lick, and perhaps may form a great rock bridge, or natural arch, between the mouth and maw of a voracious republican.

Whilst riding at anchor, the CONSTITUTION was lately struck with a flaw, from the southward and westward, which has completely set this valuable ship on her beam ends, and little hopes are entertained of preserving either the vessel or the inestimable cargo on board. [Anti-Democrat.

It is supposed that the ultimate question on the fate of the judiciary, will be decided by the casting vote of the vice president. A morning paper hopes that he will stick to the constitution, with the tenacity of a Burr.

A very delicate procuress, in one of the London prints, thus hints her wishes:

"Averse to quitting a residence to which she is attached, and sensible of the impropriety of continuing at it, with only a servant, a young lady would be happy to enlarge her family by accommodating one or two ladies with board," &c.

In midwinter, it imports us more to anticipate the vernal season, than to dwell gloomily on the deformities of the present. The plan of the poet should be adopted.

When ruffian winter holds his reign,
With many a tempest in his train,
Chasing our summer sports away;
When clouds abridge the scanty day,
And the North wind, plunderer keen,
Hath spoil'd the forests of its green;
Mine be the delightful art,
To make these gloomy scenes impart
Pensive pleasures to the mind,
Or dream of joys I cannot find;
And, flapped by Winter's chilling wing,
To REVEL IN IDEAL SPRING.

In a precious advertisement, recounting the virtues of Dr. Solomon's invigorating Balm of Gilead, we are told that at New-York it may be purchased for the moderate sum of three dollars a bottle; and, among its numerous venders, we find mess. Paff, in Broadway. We imagine that Paff is a misnomer, and that all who are diseased, and look to Dr. Solomon for a cure, should inquire for mess. Puff.

As the celebrated Paoli was one evening walking down the Haymarket, he was accosted by an itinerant daughter of pleasure, who happened to recognize his person. As she was a pretty girl, he suffered her to hold his arm, till he got to Spring Gardens, when he thought to disengage himself, but she still held him, and finding all her rhetoric lost, she at length observed, that, if he would leave her, he ought at least to make her a present, as they were very nearly connected. The veteran started, and demanded how? Why, sir, replied the frail fair, you have been driven from home, and lost your inheritance, in defence of liberty. By being attached too much to the same cause, I am reduced to the like extremity. We are both children of Liberty, and therefore ought to have a fellow-feeling for each other. The wit of the courtesan so much pleased the patriot, that he gave her a guinea.

Letters from Washington, report, that some of the president's mice have nibbled his cheese; that the cheese itself grows stale and mouldy, and turns out little better than a slipcoat. The latter part, however, of this important intelligence seems to want confirmation.

A Mr. Hunter has lately wedded Miss Chace.... The happy husband may carol

We jovial sportsmen of the town,

Then they in turn pursue.

This married Nimrod, this mighty Hunter, has a legal qualification to be as keen a sportsman as he chooses, and to participate freely in the joys of the Chace.

Of the various cross readings, which have appeared in America, the following are the most diverting:

Mr. J. Peck, to Miss Betsey Cross has been lately wedded, by some of the registers of Hymen's court, Of all the matches we ever read of, this appears to us the most ill-omened. For, if any inference can be drawn, either from names or things, the parties must certainly be in a peck of troubles. Though, perhaps, the good natured bridegroom, when he anticipates being overwhelmed with the endless visits of his wife's relations, may gaily exclaim:

"Come then crosses and cares, come cares when they may,
Yet this maxim my song shall impart,
That the comfort of man's fleeting day
Is a smile from the girl of his heart."

It seems now to be pretty well understood, that Sir William Howe was an opposition general, and that, as early as 1777, he was far from wishing to reduce America. Many of his officers, even of his family, have been heard to say, that the battle of Germantown was purposely lost. It is averred, that the first time he went to court, after his return from this country, he had to his carriage a very handsome pair of bay horses. A person, who observed them, exclaimed, where could the general get his bays?...."Not in America," replied a by-stander.

What was gaily said, half a century ago, by a good-humoured satirist, may now be truly said by the most careless remarker:

"Most ladies have two faces; one face to sleep in, and another to shew in company; the first is generally reserved for the husband and family, at home; the other put on to please strangers, abroad; the family face is often indifferent enough, but the out door one looks something better."

De Ruyter, the celebrated Dutch admiral, was killed off Aouste, in Italy. The following epigram was written, shortly after his death:

TERREI in Oceano jam solo nomine classes
TER nunc in Siculo TERRITUS ipse RUI;
Si vera inversum quondam dedit omina nomen,
Nunc RUI-TER nomen verius omen habet.

REFLECTIONS IN SOLITUDE.

THERE is a brook of clearest wave that runs
By the wood side. It is not very deep,
And yet it glides so silent o'er its bed
Of sand, it seems to slumber on its way.
Just where it creeps beneath the hazel hedge,
That shades the old oak fence, I bend my feet,
The guiltless felons of the morning dews!
I love to lean upon that old oak fence
Upon my arms, and watch the little fish
That play upon the surface of the stream,
Or quavering, without swimming forward, seem
To see their shadows on the fine grey sand
Beneath. Here often, while around my brows
The soft south wind is breathing all its fragrance
That it has stolen on its silent way
Up yonder new mown meadow, I have mus'd
Away the morn. The farmers now are ploughing
The field beyond the meadow. They are silent,
Save when they reach the fence beneath the shade,
Dragging the plough right-angled to the horse,
And call, with long, shrill voice, toward the cottage,
That the farm boy, too young for other work,
May carry down a pail of fresh spring water.
No other sound disturbs me in my dreams,
Those idle dreams of joy, that feed my mind
With unsubstantial food, save when, hard by,
Within the wood, the lusty woodman falls
His axe upon the trunk of some fall'n tree,

It hums a hollow sound upon my ear.
Upon the bank, that skirts the stream, an oak
Has lattic'd o'er the earth with twining roots;
Its deep green foliage spreads a circling shade
Around. Here, oft times, at the noon day hour,
When the hot sun rides high, and heats the air
With myriads of dancing, dazzling beams,
Upon some straggling root, I make my hand
My pillow, and recline my wearied limbs.
The robin and the thrush hop round, and oft
They leap upon my hat, that I have thrown Upon the grass. They look at me, as though
They knew that one, who treads in sorrow's path,
Had learn'd humanity. I do not harm them.
Could I do so with Cowper in my hand?
Thy moral precepts, thy pure piety,
Cowper! have form'd my creed no narrow one.
From thee I learn that mercy's stream is then
Most pure, when flowing from a source that dreads
No terror from the object that it warms;
Then most disinterested, most like thee.
I love thee, Cowper! and when, often times,
Towards the brook's green side, I ramble down
The narrow lane, along the orchard fence,
Shaded by walnut trees on either side,
That love to kiss each other o'er my head,
And join to shelter, from the summer sun,
The crutch-borne beggar's grey unshelter'd head,
I love to look upon thy nervous page.
And thou must talk most pleasantly to me,
When I, who fondly gaze on Nature's face,
Prefer to fix my steady, tranquil eye
Upon thy "Task;" but yet no task to me.
And yet it is not strange, for I do love
To look on Nature;....and what part of her
More lovely than thyself? Yet, oftentimes,
I have regretted much, that thou wouldst breathe
Such music in my strains; for they have charm'd
Me so, that, heedless where I trod my foot,
I have disturb'd the sand-mouth'd ants, that toil'd
So patiently to clear their narrow cell;
And I have sorrow'd, with no feign'd distress,
When I reflected I could not repair
The mischief I had done.

There are some men
Who dress fair Virtue, to the mental eye,
In robes most beautiful;....who tell us too
That they do love her and her simple precepts;
And thus, when aided by the press, they gain
A reputation for morality,
While every action serves to tell the world
They do not own the virtues they profess.
Cowper! it was not so with thee:....thy page
Is but a faithful comment on thyself.
Ere thou couldst sing of Virtue, thou hadst known her;

And not a maxim of morality
That thou didst preach, but thou hadst practis'd first.

I could not love thee more, if I had known thee.
And, when thou singest, in such pensive mood,
That "Kate is craz'd," I yield my brimful eye
To my heart's guidance, and persuade myself
"There is another and a better world,"
For Cowper too was craz'd.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. IV.

MY second speculation, in which I introduced the letter from "Omicron," deriding the cant of modern comedy, has drawn not the resentment, nor the sword, but the prompt pen of a good natured writer, whose letter, without farther preface, I now usher into public.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

"Venite, nuzg!"

MY OLD FRIEND,

"I owe you one." Ah! I think you might be a little more tender of an old acquaintance. As soon as I had done reading your note in reply to Omicron, in No. 3. of the Port Folio, I started up, and who could help swearing? He means me by, said I. Erskine was not more sure that the emperor of China meant him, when he talked of "The bar pleader, whom mobs call divine, Known by the symbols of I, me, and mine," than I was, that you meant to rank me among "several worthy young gentlemen," with whom you have the honour to be acquainted, who gather catch words at the theatre, in order that their conversation may have some rhetorical embellishments.

"Why!" cried I, in a rage, "where the devil else should I learn rhetorical embellishments?".... And, moreover, if I could get them from any other source, though they were ten times as embellishing, they would not be half so much attended to, or have half so much effect in enlivening conversation, especially with the ladies.

My friend, Jack Studios, who is one of the greatest bookworms that I know, but who, nevertheless, is as polite and graceful, as if he had been brought up in a ball-room, would sometimes undertake to lecture me on my using cant phrases or catch words, from Moreton or O'Keefe, in company. Sometimes he would make me feel a little ashamed of the habit.....but mark the sequel..... Jack and I visited in the same families. I would run on a whole evening, with "Whiz!....Dam'me! Turn the Corner!....That's your Sort!....Dam'me, Dad!....Dash on, Keep moving," and, within these few weeks past, with "Thank ye, sir, or ma'am, I owe you one....Very well for a Bumpkin....I owe you half a one," &c. &c. What was the consequence? My liveliness and wit were applauded, and kept the whole company in a roar; whilst poor Jack, who might have shone in a political conversation with Morris and Tracy, or in a learned one with Andrews or Magaw, sat, still as a stockfish, totally unheeded.

And then, the dear patrons of wit and pleasing talents, the ladies, to be in whose good favour, has been the constant study of my life, they too would laugh so charmingly. Upon my soul, Sam, I did not think you would show the old bachelor so much, as to give your friends such dry rubs, for exerting their memories in retaining, and their talents in retailing scraps of plays, even allowing them to be nonsensical, when their only object is to please the ladies, and their only reward....the loud laugh of the fair, expressive of their most sincere gratification.

"Well, Jack," said I, one evening as we walked homeward together, "you surely will never again advise me to drop the silly practice, as you call it, of quoting, before the ladies, the most foolish and unmeaning phrases that can be gathered from modern comedies. Did you not observe how delighted all the dear creatures seemed at my wit? I heard Miss S. say in a loud whisper, what a lively young gentleman Mr. Harebrain is! He is very sensible!" whispered Miss I. A prodigious wit! said Miss P. And, my dear Jack, you were no more taken notice of, than if you had been helping the man in the moon to pick up his sticks, after an eclipse."

"'Tis woman that makes dunces of us all!" cried Jack. "I will reason no more with you upon the subject. To render one's presence in society agreeable, and particularly in female society, I find, requires neither wit nor learning.... Let a young fellow learn how to make a bow, with the mind and memory of a parrot, and the grimace and chatter of a monkey, my life on't he will succeed. I will no longer attempt to stem the torrent. I must be unnoticed or laughed at, on the one hand,....noticed and laughed with, on the other. The alternative is before me. Vive la bagatelle! I chuse the latter; and now, Dick, I enter the lists, as a candidate for the palm of folly and impertinence."

"Thank you, Jack," said I, "I owe you one."

Thus you see, Mr. Saunter, I have made a convert before you. When you shall prove that you have made one, I will cheerfully acknowledge it to be well done for a bumpkin, and that "I owe you half a one,"

Your's, till death,

DICK HAREBRAIN.

I have perused Mr. Harebrain's billet, with more than common complacency, because I think him a distant relation of the Loungers, and because, though wild, he is gentle. In his vagaries, there is nothing desperately mad; and he seems capable of going to the play, "soberly, as lady Grace says." Perhaps, such a gay, fantastic fellow would think it little better than downright impertinence, were I to conclude gravely, or obtrude advice. But, as I perceive that the desultory character of my correspondent has a broad foundation of good sense, and that his volatility, like the effervescence of champaign, argues nothing but the brisk and the generous, I will venture to tell him, that he may at once be a small talker and a scholar, and, if he will read with Jack Studios all the morning, he may, as cheerily as he pleases, cry vive la bagatelle at night.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

DRUMMOND*, a name dear to poetry, has published a very elegant translation of the Satires of Aulus Persius Flaccus. In comparing it with the versions of the energetic Dryden, it must suffer, in a degree, the charge of inferiority. But, if it be less melodious here, or less nervous there, still it is more uniformly faithful and correct, than the translation by his mighty predecessor. The author modestly hopes, that

Enlighten'd WARTON may approve the style;
And classic GIFFORD nod the head and smile.

This neat and accurate copy of a great original, is the production of a member of the British parliament; and it is pleasing to find a senator and a poet in one. It exhibits, not only versatility of talent, but is a sufficient proof of mental power. It may be remembered, that Persius was of the school of Zeno, that his morality is austere, and his tones indignant. He is more solicitous to admonish, than to soothe his reader, and gives his admirable advice in the tone of a master, rather than of a companion. As a specimen of a most delightful version of the rugged latinity of this austere ancient, I have amused myself by transcribing, from the third satire, the animated expostulation from a philosophical preceptor, to his indolent pupil.

What, always thus? Now, in full blaze of day,
Sol mounts the skies, and shoots a downward ray;
Breaks on your darken'd chamber's lengthen'd night,
And pours through narrow chinks long streams of lights.
Yet still, subdued by slumber's oppressive power,
You slumber, heedless of the passing hour;
Of strong Falerian dissipate the fumes,
And snore, unconscious, while the day consumes.
See the hot sun through reddening Leo roll,
The raging Dog star fire the glowing pole;
The yellow harvest waving o'er the plain,
The reapers bending o'er the golden grain;
Beneath the spreading elm the cattle laid,
And panting flocks recumbent in the shade.
"Is it indeed so late?" the sluggard cries;
"Who waits? Here, slaves! be quick, I wish to rise."
At length to study see the youth proceed,
Charg'd with his book, his parchment, and his reed.
But now he finds the ink too black to write;
And now, diluted, it escapes the sight;
Now it is made too thick, and now too thin,
And now it sinks too deeply in the skin.
The pen writes double, and the point too wide
O'er the smooth vellum pours the sable tide.
O wretch! whose habits into vices grow,
Whose life accumulates the means of woe!
Dismiss the scholar, be again the boy,
Replace the rattle, re-assume the toy;
Repose in quiet on your nurse's lap,
Pleas'd by her lullaby, and feed on pap.
Who is deceiv'd; for whom are spread those lures?
Is the misfortune mine, or is it yours?

* The celebrated William Drummond, of Hawthornden, was the delight of contemporary wits. He was so beloved by BEN JONSON, that he made a pedestrian excursion to Scotland, to visit the darling bard.

That you refuse to listen to the truth,
And waste in idleness the hours of youth.
And you, what arts what pleasures can entice
To wander in the thorny paths of vice?
You, who so lately from the porch have brought
The godlike precepts, which great Zeno taught?
You, who in schools of rigid virtue bred,
On simple fare with frugal sages fed,
Where watchful youth their silent vigils keep,
And midnight studies still encroach on sleep?
You, who have listen'd to Instruction's voice,
And with the Samian sage have made your choice:
Are you content to lose life's early day,
Or pass existence in a dream away?
Ah! thoughtless youth, ere yet the fell disease
BLANCH YOUR PALE CHEEK, and on its victim seize,
Apply the remedy, nor idly wait
'Till hope be fled, and medicine come too late.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AS it is, unfortunately, the fashion to play at cards, every lady will drop her hand for a moment, or cease the inquiry of what's trumps, or who has pam, to read the following important intelligence:

Mr. Ludlow, of Walworthy, and Ann Wilcox, of London, have recently obtained the king's patent for improved playing cards.

In these cards, the pips are reversed, so as to appear the same both ways; round each pip of spades and hearts, is a line of the colour of the suit, then a white line; and the remainder of the card is black or red, according to the suit. The diamonds and clubs are white, on a black or red ground, respectively. The aces and court cards are also distinguished, by various appropriate ornaments, so as to obviate those mistakes, which sometimes happen in playing. The edges of the packs are gilt or coloured.

By the favour of a friend, we are enabled to narrate the new stile of dress, at the mint of the mode.

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

Silk stuffs are adopted for full dress for the winter, and muslins for undress. The robes de bals à la clotilde, à la Hebe, à la Syrene. The Swiss, Italian, and Spanish dresses, are all made of these materials. Among the most admired, for their novelty and beauty, are the Belles Douillettes à la Russe.

These cloaks are of three cuts, and three different sorts of wadding, according as the wearer is more or less delicate, from rude health, to an invalid state. They are also adapted to the different shapes, some for slender persons, some for en bon point, and some for those, who are much encumbered with flesh. They are extremely convenient, and find a ready admittance into fashionable society.

Robe Ronde, à la Hersilie.

This dress has a long train, fastens on the tip of the shoulders, and forms a heart upon the back, ornamented à l'Etrurie, and about four inches and a half in the length of the waist, at the side. The front appears like a petticoat, which comes round the breast, and is fastened on the shoulder. The cut terminates at the knee with an acorn. It is of a superb style. The sleeves are short and ornamented.

Robe Ronde, à la Calypso.

This dress is in narrow plaits on the neck. It has two bars, one in the shape of a tongue, and the waist behind is of a new cut. It has a long train. The sleeves are short, and with three tufts.

Robe à la Hamadryade.

This dress is very handsome for riding, or a morning walk.

Chemise à la Vestale.

The collar is partly Spanish and partly French, and bound round the waist, with a cecus à la Juno.

Surtout à la Sultane.

This charming dress is open, and worn over white dresses, or some bright colour. It has a train, and is of a very striking appearance, Surtout à la Hegemone.

This is peculiarly adapted for balls. It has but one sleeve, and reaches only to the calf of the leg, close at the side, and rounded.

All these latter dresses are of Florence satin, Pekin satin, muslin, plain and embroidered, painted linen, gauze, crape, &c. &c.

The corsets à la Creole are also much admired as a ball costume. They are trimmed with pearl, tinselled or embellished with silk. Spencers of double Florence, wadded, are also in repute.

POLITICS.

THE GENUINE SPEECH OF MR. MORRIS.

[To-day, we postpone many articles of gay miscellany, to give an honourable place to the reasoning and the eloquence of GOVERNOUR MORRIS, a senator from the state of New-York, who, in this perilous hour, has stood forth the CHAMPION OF THE CONSTITUTION, with a statesman's research, a soldier's courage, and an American's pride. This edition of his speech, we are entitled to affirm, is a correct one, in which the reporter has faithfully followed the orator. As a political argument, this perfect defence of an ancient system ought to convince the incredulous, to cure the prejudiced, and mitigate the factious. As a specimen of eloquence, it affords a new proof, that, however inferior the new may be to the elder world, in poetry, painting, or sculpture, yet, in the art of convincing and persuading men, we have many, whose "tongues drop manna."

MR. PRESIDENT....I had fostered the hope that some gentleman who thinks with me, would have taken upon himself the task of replying to the observations, made yesterday and this morning, in favour of the motion on your table. But, since no gentleman has gone so fully into the subject as it seems to require, I am compelled to request your attention.

We were told yesterday, by the honourable member from Virginia, that our objections were calculated for the by-standers, and made with a view to produce effect upon the people at large. I know not for whom the charge is intended. I certainly recollect no such observations. As I was personally charged with making a play upon words, it may have been intended for me. But surely, sir, it will be recollected, that I declined that paltry game, and declared, that I considered the verbal criticism which had been relied on, as irrelevant. If I can recollect what I said, from recollecting well what I thought, and meant to say, sure I am, that I uttered nothing in the style of an appeal to the people. I hope no member of this house has so poor a sense of its dignity, as to make such an appeal. As to myself, it is now near thirty years since I was called into public office. During that period, I have frequently been the servant of the people, always their friend; but at no one moment of my life their flatterer, and God forbid that I ever should be. When the honourable gentleman considers the course we have taken, he must see that the observation he has thus pointed, can light on no object. I trust that it did not flow from a consciousness of his own intentions. He, I hope, had no view of this sort. If he had, he was much, very much mistaken. Had he looked round upon those, who honour us with their attendance, he would have seen that the splendid flashes of his wit excited no approbatory smile. The countenances of those, by whom we were surrounded, presented a different spectacle. They were impressed with the dignity of this house; they perceived in it the dignity of the American people; and felt, with high and manly sentiment, their own participation.

We have been told, sir, by the honourable gentleman from Virginia, that there is no independent part of this government. That, in popular governments, the force of every department, as well as the government itself, must depend upon popular opinion. And the honourable member from North Carolina has informed us, that there is no check for the overbearing powers of the le-gisature, but public opinion; and he has been pleased to notice a sentiment I had uttered;.....a sentiment which not only fell from my lips, but which flowed from my heart. It has, however, been misunderstood and misapplied. After reminding the house of the dangers to which popular governments are exposed, from the influence of designing demagogues upon popular passion, I took the liberty to say, that we, we, the senate of the United States, are assembled here to save the people from their most dangerous enemy, to save them from themselves; to guard them against the baneful effects of their own precipitation, their passion, their misguided zeal. 'Tis for these purposes that all our constitutional checks are devised. If this be not the language of the constitution, the constitution is all nonsense. For why are the senators chosen by communities, and the representatives directly by the people? Why are the one chosen for a longer term than the other? Why give one branch of the legislature a negative upon the acts of the other? Why give the president a right to arrest the proceedings of both, until two thirds of each should concur? Why all these multiplied precautions, unless to check and controul that impetuous spirit, that headlong torrent of opinion, which has swept away every popular government that ever existed?

With most respectful attention, I heard the declaration of the gentleman from Virginia, of his own sentiment. "Whatever," said he, "may be my opinion of the constitution, I hold myself bound to respect it." He disdained, sir, to profess an affection he did not feel, and I accept his candour, as a pledge for the performance of his duty. But he will admit this necessary inference from that frank confession, that, although he will struggle (against his inclination) to support the constitution, even to the last moment, yet when, in spite of all his efforts, it shall fall, he will rejoice in its destruction. Far different are my feelings. It is possible that we are both prejudiced; and that, in taking the ground on which we respectively stand, our judgments are influenced by the sentiments which glow in our hearts. I, sir, wish to support this constitution, because I love it. And I love it, because I consider it as the bond of our union; because, in my soul, I believe that on it depends our harmony and our peace; that, without it, we should soon be plunged in all the horrors of civil war; that this country would be deluged with the blood of its inhabitants; and a brother's hand be raised against the bosom of a brother.

After these preliminary remarks, I hope I shall be indulged, while I consider the subject, in reference to the two points which have been taken, the expediency and the constitutionality of the repeal.

In considering the expediency, I hope I shall be pardoned for asking your attention to some parts of the constitution, which have not yet been dwelt upon, and which tend to elucidate this part of our inquiry. I agree fully with the gentleman, that every section, every sentence, and every word of the constitution ought to be deliberately weighed and examined; nay, I am content to go along with him, and give its due value and importance to every stop and comma. In the beginning, we find a declaration of the motives which induced the American people to bind themselves by this compact. And, in the foreground of that declaration, we find these objects specified; to form a more perfect union, to establish justice, and to insure domestic tranquillity. But how are these objects effected? The people intended to establish justice. What provision have they made to fulfil that intention? After pointing out the courts which should be established, the 2d section of the 3d article informs us, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases, in law and equity, arising under this constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies, to which the United States shall be a party; to controversies between two or more states, between a state and citizens of another state, between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under grants of different states, and between a state, or the citizens thereof, and foreign states, citizens, or subjects.

"In all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls, and those in which a state shall be a party, the supreme court shall have original jurisdiction. In all the other cases before-mentioned, the supreme court shall have appellate jurisdiction, both as to law and fact, with such exceptions, and under such regulations as the congress shall make."

Thus then we find, that the judicial power shall extend to a great variety of cases, but that the supreme court shall have only appellate jurisdiction in all admiralty and maritime causes, in all controversies between the United States and private citizens, between citizens of different states, between citizens of the same state, claiming lands under different states, and between a citizen of the United States and foreign states, citizens or subjects. The honourable gentleman from Kentucky, who made the motion on your table, has told us, that the constitution, in its judiciary provisions, contemplated only those cases, which could not be tried in the state courts. But he will, I hope, pardon me, when I contend, that the constitution did not merely contemplate, but did, by express words, reserve to the national tribunals a right to decide, and did secure to the citizens of America a right to demand their decision in many cases, evidently cognizable in the state courts. And what are these cases? They are those, in respect to which it is by the constitution presumed, that the state courts would not always make a cool and calm investigation, a fair and just decision. To form, therefore, a more perfect union, and to insure domestic tranquillity, the constitution has said, there shall be courts of the union to try causes, by the wrongful decision of which, the union might be endangered, or domestic tranquillity be disturbed. And what courts? Look again at the cases designated. The supreme court has no original jurisdiction. The constitution has said, that the judicial powers shall be vested in the supreme and inferior courts. It has declared, that the judicial power, so vested, shall extend to the cases mentioned, and that the supreme court shall not have original jurisdiction in those cases. Evidently, therefore, it has declared, that they shall (in the first instance) be tried by inferior courts, with appeal to the supreme court. This, therefore, amounts to a declaration, that the inferior courts shall exist. Since, without them, the citizen is deprived of those rights for which he stipulated, or rather those rights verbally granted, would be actually withheld; and that great security of our union, that necessary guard of our tranquillity, be completely paralyzed, if not destroyed. In declaring then, that these tribunals shall exist, it equally declares, that the congress shall ordain and establish them. I say they shall; this is the evident intention, if not the express words of the constitution. The convention in framing, and the American people in adopting that compact, did not, could not presume, that the congress would omit to do, what they were thus bound to do. They could not presume, that the legislature would hesitate one moment, in establishing the organs necessary to carry into effect those wholesome, those important provisions.

The honourable member from Virginia has given us a history of the judicial system, and, in the course of it, has told us, that the judges of the supreme court knew, when they accepted their offices, the duties they were to perform, and the salaries they were to receive. He thence infers, that, if again called on to do the same duties, they have no right to complain. Agreed. But that is not the question between us. Admitting that they have made a hard bargain, and that we may hold them to a strict performance, is it wise to exact their compliance, to the injury of our constituents? We are urged to go back to the old system; but let us first examine the effects of that system. The judges of the supreme court rode the circuits, and two of them, with the assistance of a district judge, held circuit courts, and tried causes. As a supreme court, they have, in most cases, only an appellate jurisdiction. In the first instance, therefore, they tried a cause, sitting as an inferior court, and then, on appeal, tried it over again, as a supreme court. Thus then, the appeal was from the sentence of the judges, to the judges themselves. But say, that, to avoid this incoherence, you will incapacitate the two judges who sat in the circuit, from sitting in the supreme court, to review their own decrees. Strike them off: and suppose, either the same or a contrary decision to have been made on another circuit, by two of their brethren in a similar case. For the same reason, you strike them off, and then you have no court left. Is this wise? Is it safe? You place yourselves in a situation, where your citizens must be deprived of the advantage given to them of a court of appeals, or else run the greatest risk, that the decision of the first court will carry with it that of the other.

The same honourable member has given us a history of the law passed the last session, which he wishes now to repeal. That history is accurate, at least in one important part of it. I believe that all amendments were rejected, pertinaciously rejected; and I acknowledge that I joined heartily in that rejection. It was for the clearest reason on earth. We all perfectly understood, that to amend the bill was to destroy it. That, if ever it got back to the other house, it would perish..... Those, therefore, who approved of the general provisions of that bill, were determined to adopt it. We sought the practicable good, and would not, in pursuit of unattainable perfection, sacrifice that good to the pride of opinion. We took the bill, therefore, with its imperfections, convinced that, when it was once passed into a law, it might be easily amended.

We are now told, that this procedure was improper; nay, that it was indecent. That public opinion had declared itself against us. That a majority (holding different opinions) was already chosen to the other House; and that a similar majority was expected for that in which we sit.—Mr. President, are we then to understand, that opposition to the majority in the two Houses of congress is improper, is indecent? If so—what are we to think of those gentlemen, who not only with proper and decent, but with laudable motives, (for such is their claim) so long, so perseveringly, so pertinaciously, opposed that voice of the people, which had so repeatedly, and for so many years, declared itself against them, through the organ of their representatives? Was this indecent in them? If not, how could it be improper for us to seize the only moment which was left for the then majority to do what they deemed a necessary act? Let me again refer to those imperious demands of the constitution, which called on us to establish inferior courts. Let me remind gentlemen of their assertion on this floor, that centuries might elapse before any judicial system could be established with general consent. And then let me ask, being thus impressed with a sense of the duty and the difficulty of performing that arduous task, was it not wise to seize the auspicious moment?

Among the many stigmas affixed to this law, we have been told that the President, in selecting men to fill the offices which it created, made vacancies and filled them from the floor of this House. And that but for the influence of this circumstance, a majority in favour of it could not have been found. Let us examine this suggestion. It is grounded on the supposition of corrupt influence derived from a hope, founded on two remote and successive contingencies. First, the vacancy might or might not exist; for it depended as well on the acceptance of another as on the President's grant; and Secondly, the President might or might not fill it with a member of this House. Yet on this vague conjecture, on this unstable ground, it is inferred, that men in high confidence violated their duty. It is hard to determine the influence of self interest on the heart of man. I shall not, therefore make the attempt. In the present case it is possible, that the imputation may be just, but I hope not, I believe not. At any rate gentlemen will agree with me, that the calculation is uncertain and the conjecture vague.

But let it now, for argument sake, be admitted. Saving always the reputation of honourable men who are not here to defend themselves. Let it I say, for argument sake be admitted, that the gentlemen alluded to acted under the influence of improper motives. What then? Is a law, that has received the varied assent required by the constitution, and is clothed with all the needful formalities, thereby invalidated? Can you impair its force by impeaching the motives of any member who voted for it? Does it follow, that a law is bad because all those who concurred in it cannot give good reasons for their votes? Is it not before us? Must we not judge of it by its intrinsic merit. Is it a fair argument, addressed to our understanding, to say we must repeal a law, even a good one, if the enacting of it may have been effected in any degree by improper motives? Or is the judgment of this House so feeble, that it may not be trusted?

Gentlemen tell us, however, that the law is materially defective, nay that it is unconstitutional. What follows? Gentlemen bid us repeal it. But is this just reasoning? If the law be only defective, why not amend? And if unconstitutional, why repeal? In this case no repeal can be necessary; the law is in itself void; it is a mere dead letter.

To shew that it is unconstitutional a particular clause is pointed out, and an inference is made, as in the case of goods, where because there is one contraband article on board, the whole cargo is forfeited. Admit for a moment, that the part alluded to were unconstitutional, this would in no wise affect the remainder. That part would be void, or if you think proper, you can repeal that part.

Let us, however, examine the clause objected to on the ground of the constitution. It is said, that by this law the district judges in Tennessee and Kentucky, are removed from office by making them circuit judges. And again that you have by law appointed two new offices, those of circuit judges, and filled them by law, instead of pursuing the modes of appointment prescribed by the constitution. To prove all this, the gentleman from Virginia did us the favour to read those parts of the law which he condemns, and if I can trust to my memory, it is clear from what he read, that the law does not remove these district judges, neither does it appoint them to the office of circuit judges. It does indeed put down the district court; but is so far from destroying the offices of district judge, that it declares the persons filling those offices, shall perform the duty of holding the circuit courts. And so far is it from appointing circuit judges, that it declares the circuit courts shall be held by the district judges. But gentlemen contend, that to discontinue the district courts, was in effect to remove the district judges. This sir, is so far from being a just inference from the law, that the direct contrary follows as a necessary result; for it is on the principle that these judges continue in office after their courts are discontinued, that the new duty of holding other courts is assigned to them. But gentlemen say, this doctrine militates with the principles we contend for. Surely not. It must be recollected, Sir, that we have repeatedly admitted the right of the legislature, to change, alter, modify and amend, the judiciary system, so as best to promote the interest of the people. We only contend, that you shall not exceed or contravene the authority by which you act. But, say gentlemen, you forced this new office on the district judges, and this is in effect a new appointment. I answer, that the question can only arise on the refusal of those judges to act. But is it constitutional to assign new duties to officers already existing? I fear that if this construction be adopted, our labours will speedily end; for we shall be so shackled, that we cannot move. What is the practice? Do we not every day call upon particular officers to perform duties not previously assigned to, or required of them? And must the executive in every such case make a new appointment?

But as a further reason to restore, by repealing this law, the old system, an honorable member from North-Carolina has told us, the judges of the supreme court should attend in the states to acquire a competent knowledge of local institutions, and for this purpose should continue to ride the circuits. I believe there is great use in sending young men to travel; it tends to enlarge their views, and give them more liberal ideas than they might otherwise possess. Nay, if they reside long enough in foreign countries they may become acquainted with the manners of the people, and acquire some knowledge of their civil institutions. But I am not quite convinced that riding rapidly from one end of this country to the other is the best way to study law. I am inclined to believe that knowledge may be more conveniently acquired in the closet than upon the high road. It is, moreover, to be presumed that the first magistrate would, in selecting persons to fill these offices, take the best characters from the different parts of the country, who already possess the needful acquirements. But admitting that the president should not duly exercise in this respect his discretionary powers, and admitting that the ideas of the gentlemen are correct, how wretched must be our condition! These, our judges, when called on to exercise their functions, would but begin to learn their trade, and that too at a period of life when the intellectual powers with no great facility can acquire new ideas. We must, therefore, have a double set of judges. One set of apprentice judges to ride circuits and learn, the other set of master judges to hold courts and decide controversies.

We are told, sir, that the repeal asked for is important, in that it may establish a precedent, for that it is not merely a question on the propriety of disbanding a corps of sixteen rank and file; but that provisions may hereafter be made not for sixteen, but for sixteen hundred or sixteen thousand judges, and that it may become necessary to turn them to the right about. Mr. President, I will not, I cannot presume, that any such provision will ever be made, and therefore I cannot conceive any such necessity; I will not suppose, for I cannot suppose, than any party or faction will ever do any thing so wild, so extravagant. But I will ask, how does this strange supposition consist with the doctrine of gentlemen, that public opinion is a sufficient check on the legislature, and a sufficient safe-guard to the people. Put the case to its consequences, and what becomes of the check? Will gentlemen say it is to be found in the force of this wise precedent? Is this to controul succeeding rulers in their wild, their mad career? But how? Is the creation of judicial officers the only thing committed to their discretion? Have they not, according to the doctrine contended for, our all at their disposition, with no other check than public opinion, which according to the supposition will not prevent them from committing the greatest follies and absurdities? Take then all the gentleman's ideas, and compare them together, it will result that here is an inestimable treasure put into the hands of drunkards, madmen, and fools.

But away with all these derogatory suppositions. The legislature may be trusted. Our government is a system of salutary checks. One legislative branch is a check on the other. And should the violence of party spirit bear both of them away, the president, an officer high in honour, high in the public confidence, charged with weighty concerns, responsible to his own reputation, and to the world, stands ready to arrest their too impetuous course. This is our system. It makes no mad appeal to every mob in the country. It appeals to the sober sense of men selected from their fellow-citizens for their talents, for their virtue...of men in advanced life, and of maturer judgment. It appeals to their understanding, to their integrity, to their honour, to their love of fame, to their sense of shame. If all these checks should prove insufficient, and alas! such is the condition of human nature, that I fear they will not always be sufficient...the constitution has given us one more. It has given us an independent judiciary. We have been told, that the executive authority carries your laws into execution. But let us not be the dupes of sound. The executive magistrate commands indeed your fleets and armies; and duties, imposts, excises, and all other taxes, are collected, and all expenditures are made by officers whom he has appointed. So far indeed he executes your laws. But these his acts apply not often to individual concerns. In those cases so important to the peace and happiness of society, the execution of your laws is confided to your judges. And therefore are they rendered independent. Before then that you violate that independence—Pause—there are state sovereignties, as well as the sovereignty of the general government.—There are cases—too many cases—in which the interest of one is not considered as the interest of the other. Should these conflict—if the judiciary be gone, the question is no longer of law but of force. This is a state of things which no honest and wise man can view without horror.

Suppose, in the omnipotence of your legislative authority, you trench upon the rights of your fellow-citizens, by passing an unconstitutional law: If the Judiciary Department preserve its vigor it will stop you short. Instead of a resort to arms there will be a happier appeal to argument. Suppose a case still more impressive. The President is at the head of your armies. Let one of his generals, flushed with victory, and proud in command, presume to trample on the rights of your most insignificant citizen. Indignant of the wrong, he will demand the protection of your tribunals, and safe in the shadow of their wings will laugh his oppressor to scorn.

Having now, I believe, examined all the arguments adduced to shew the expediency of this motion, and which fairly sifted reduce themselves at last to these two things. Restore the ancient system, and save the additional expense: Before, I close, what I have to say on this ground, I hope I shall be pardoned for saying one or two words about the expense. I hope also that notwithstanding the epithets which may be applied to my arithmetic, I shall be pardoned for using that which I learnt at school. It may have deceived me when it taught that two and two make four. But though it should now be branded with opprobrious terms, I must still believe that two and two do still make four.—Gentlemen of newer theories, and of higher attainments, while they smile at my inferiority must bear with my infirmities, and take me as I am.

In all this great system of saving; in all this ostentatious economy, this rage of reform, how happens it that the eagle eye has not yet been turned to the Mint? That no one piercing glance has been able to behold the expenditures of that department? I am far from wishing to overturn it. Though it be not of great necessity, nor even of substantial importance, though it be but a splendid trapping of your government; yet as it may by impressing on your current coin the emblems of your sovereignty, have some tendency to encourage a national spirit and to foster the national pride; I am willing to contribute my share to its support. Yes, Sir, I would foster the national pride. I cannot indeed approve of national vanity, nor feed it with vile adulation. But I would gladly cherish the lofty sentiment of national pride. I would wish my countrymen to feel like Romans, to be as proud as Englishmen, and going still farther, I would wish them to veil their pride in the well bred modesty of French politeness. But can this establishment, the mere decoration of your political edifice, can it be compared with the massy columns on which rest your peace and safety? Shall the striking of a few half-pence be put into a parallel with the distribution of justice? I find, sir, from the estimates on your table, that the salaries of the officers of your mint amount to 10,600 dollars, and that the expenses are estimated at 10,900; making 21,500 dollars.

I find that the actual expenditure of the last year, exclusive of salaries amounted to

	Dolls. 25,154 44
Add the salaries,	10,600
We have a total of,	35,754 44

A sum which exceeds the salary of these sixteen judges.

I find further, that during the last year they have coined cents and half cents to the amount of 10,473 dollars and 29 cents. Thus their copper coinage falls a little short of what it costs us for their salaries. We have however from this establishment about a million cents, one to each family in America. A little emblematic medal, to be hung over their chimney pieces; and this is all their compensation for all that expense. Yet not a word has been said about the mint, while the judges whose services are much greater, and of so much more importance to the community, are to be struck off at a blow, in order to save an expense which, compared with the object, is pitiful. What conclusion then are we to draw from this predilection?

I will not pretend to assign to gentlemen, the motives by which they may be influenced; but if I should permit myself to make the inquiry, the style of many observations, and more especially the manner, the warmth, the irritability, which have been exhibited on this occasion, would lead to a solution of the problem. I had the honour, sir, when I addressed you the other day to observe, that I believed the universe could not afford a spectacle more sublime than the view of a powerful state kneeling at the altar of justice, and sacrificing there her passion and her pride. That I once fostered the hope of beholding that spectacle of magnanimity in America. And now what a world of figures has the gentleman from Virginia formed on his misapprehension of that remark. I never expressed any thing like exultation at the idea of a State ignominiously dragged in triumph at the heels of your judges. But permit me to say, the gentleman's exquisite sensibility on that subject, his alarm and apprehension, all shew his strong attachment to state authority. Far be it from me, however, to charge the gentleman with improper motives. I know that his emotions arise from one of those imperfections in our nature, which we cannot remedy. They are excited by causes which have naturally made him hostile to this constitution, though his duty compels him reluctantly to support it. I hope, however, that those gentlemen, who entertain different sentiments, and who are less irritable on the score of state dignity, will think it essential to preserve a constitution, without which the independent existence of the States themselves will be but of short duration.

This, sir, leads me to the second object I had proposed. I shall therefore pray your indulgence, while I consider how far this measure is constitutional. I have not been able to discover the expediency, but will now for argument sake admit it; and here, I cannot but express my deep regret for the situation of an honourable member from North-Carolina. Tied fast as he is, by his instructions, arguments, however forcible, can never be effectual. I ought therefore, to wish for his sake, that his mind may not be convinced by any thing I shall say; for hard indeed would be his condition, to be bound by the contrariant obligations of an order and an oath. I cannot, however, but express my profound respect for the talents of those who gave him his instructions, and who sitting at a distance, without hearing the arguments, could better understand the subject than the senator on this floor after full discussion.

The honourable member from Virginia has repeated the distinction, before taken, between the supreme and the inferior tribunals; he has insisted on the distinction between the words shall and may; has inferred from that distinction, that the judges of the inferior courts are subjects of legislative discretion, and has contended that the word may includes all power respecting the subject to which it is applied, consequently to raise up and to put down, to create and to destroy. I must entreat your patience, sir, while I go more into this subject than I ever supposed would be necessary. By the article, so often quoted, it is declared "that the judicial power of the United States, shall be vested in one supreme court and in such inferior courts, as the congress may from time to time establish." I beg leave to recal your attention to what I have already said of the inferior courts. That the original jurisdiction of various subjects being given exclusively to them, it became the bounden duty of congress, to establish such courts. I will not repeat the argument already used on that subject. But will ask those, who urge the distinction between the supreme court and the inferior tribunals, whether a law was not previously necessary before the supreme court could be organized. They reply that the constitution says, there shall be a supreme court, and therefore the congress are commanded to organize it, while the rest is left to their discretion. This, sir, is not the fact. The constitution says, the judicial power shall be vested in one supreme court, and in inferior courts. The legislature can therefore only organize one supreme court, but they may establish as many inferior courts as they shall think proper. The designation made of them by the constitution is, such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish. But why, say gentlemen, fix precisely one supreme court, and leave the rest to legislative discretion? The answer is simple. It results from the nature of things, from the existent and probable state of our country. There was no difficulty in deciding, that one and only one supreme court should be proper or necessary, to which should lie appeals from inferior tribunals. Not so as to these. The United States were advancing in rapid progression. Their population of three millions was soon to become five, then ten, afterwards twenty millions. This was well known as far as the future can become an object of human comprehension. In this increase of numbers, with a still greater increase of wealth, with the extension of our commerce and the progress of the arts, it was evident that although a great many tribunals would become necessary, it was impossible to determine either on the precise number or the most convenient form. The convention did not pretend to this prescience; but, had they possessed it, would it have been proper to have established then all the tribunals necessary for all future times? Would it have been wise to have planted courts among the Chickasaws, the Choctaws, the Cherokees, the Tuscaroras, and God knows how many more, because at some future day the regions over which they roam might be cultivated by civilized men? Was it not proper, wise, necessary to leave in the discretion of congress, the number and the kind of courts which they might find it proper to establish for the purpose designated by the constitution. This simple statement of facts; facts of public notoriety, is alone a sufficient comment on an explication of the word on which gentlemen have so much relied. The convention in framing, the people in adopting this compact, say the judicial power shall extend to many cases, the original cognizance whereof shall be by the inferior courts; but it is neither necessary, nor even possible, now to determine their number or their form; that essential power therefore, shall vest in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time, in the progression of time and according to the indication of circumstances, establish. Not provide, or determine, but establish. Not a mere temporary provision, but an establishment. If after this it had said in general terms, that judges should hold their offices during good behaviour, could a doubt have existed on the interpretation of this act, under all its attending circumstances, that the judges of the inferior courts were intended, as well as those of the supreme court? But did the framers of the constitution stop there? Is there then nothing more? Did they risque on these grammatical niceties the fate of America? Did they rest here the most important branch of our government? Little important, indeed, as to foreign danger; but infinitely valuable to our domestic peace and to personal protection against the oppression of our rulers. No. Lest a doubt should be raised, they have carefully connected the judges of both courts in the same sentence; they have said "the judges both of the supreme and inferior courts," thus coupling them inseparably together. You may cut the bands, but you can never unite them. With salutary caution they devised this clause, to arrest the overbearing temper which they knew belonged to legislative bodies. They do not say the judges simply, but the judges of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour. They say therefore to the legislature, you may judge of the propriety, the utility, the necessity of organizing these courts; but when established, you have done your duty. Anticipating the course of passion in future times, they say to the legislature, you shall not disgrace yourselves by exhibiting the indecent spectacle of judges established by one legislature removed by another. We will save you also from yourselves. We say these judges shall hold their offices: and surely, sir, to pretend that they can hold their office after the office is destroyed, is contemptible.

The framers of this constitution had seen much, read much, and deeply reflected. They knew by experience the violence of popular bodies, and let it be remembered that since that day many of the states, taught by experience, have found it necessary to change their forms of government to avoid the effects of that violence. The convention contemplated the very act you now attempt. They knew also the jealousy and the power of the states; and they established for your and for their protection, this most important department. I beg gentlemen to hear and to remember what I say. It is this department alone, and it is the independence alone of this department, which can save you from civil war. Yes, sir, adopt the language of gentlemen, say with them, by the act to which you are urged, "if we cannot remove the judges we can destroy them." Establish thus the dependence of the judiciary department. Who will resort to them for protection against you? Who will confide in, who will be bound by their decrees? Are we then to resort to the ultimate reason of kings? Are our arguments to fly from the mouths of our cannon?

We are told that we may violate our constitution, because similar constitutions have been violated elsewhere. Two states have been cited to that effect, Maryland and Virginia. The honourable gentleman from Virginia tells us that when this happened in the state he belongs to, no complaint was made by the judges. I will not inquire into that fact, although I have the protest of the judges now lying before me. Judges eminent for their talents, renowned for their learning, respectable for their virtue. I will not inquire what constitutions have been violated. I will not ask either when or where this dangerous practice began, or has been followed. I will admit the fact. What does it prove? Does it prove that because they have violated, we also may violate? Does it not prove directly the contrary? Is it not the strongest reason on earth for preserving the independence of our tribunals? If it be true that they with strong hand seized their courts, and bent them to their will, ought we not to give suitors a fair chance for justice in our courts, or must the suffering citizen be deprived of all protection?

The gentleman from Virginia has called our attention to certain cases which he considers as forming necessary exceptions to the principles for which we contend. Permit me to say that necessity is a hard law; and frequently proves too much; and let the gentleman recollect that arguments which prove too much prove nothing.

He has instanced a case where it may be proper to appoint commissioners for a limited time to settle some particular description of controversies. Undoubtedly it is always in the power of Congress to form a board of commissioners for particular purposes. He asks, are these inferior courts, and must they also exist forever? I answer that the nature of their offices must depend on the law by which they are created; if called to exercise the judicial functions, designated by the constitution, they must have an existence conformable to its injunctions.

Again he has instanced the Mississippi Territory, claimed by, and which may be surrendered to the state of Georgia, and a part of the union which may be conquered by a foreign enemy. And he asks triumphantly are our inferior courts to remain after our jurisdiction is gone? This case rests upon a principle so simple that I am surprised the honourable member did not perceive the answer in the very moment when he made the objection. Is it by our act that a country is taken from us by a foreign enemy? Is it by our consent that our jurisdiction is lost? I had the honour, in speaking the other day, expressly and for the most obvious reasons, to except the case of conquest. As well might we contend for the government of a town swallowed up by an earthquake.

General Mason explained.—He had supposed the case of territory conquered and afterwards ceded to the conqueror, or some other territory ceded in lieu of it.

Mr. Morris.—The case is precisely the same. Until after the peace the conquest is not complete. Every body knows that until the cession by treaty, the original owner has the postliminary right to a territory taken from him.—Beyond all question where Congress are compelled to cede the territory, the judges can no longer exist unless the new sovereign confer the office. Over such a territory the authority of the constitution ceases, and of course the rights which it confers.

It is said, the judicial institution is intended for the benefit of the people, and not of the judge; and it is complained of, that in speaking of the office, we say it is his office. Undoubtedly the institution is for the benefit of the people. But the question remains, how will it be rendered most beneficial? Is it by making the judge independent, by making it his office, or is it by placing him in a state of abject dependence, so that the office shall be his to-day and belong to another to-morrow? Let the gentleman hear the words of the constitution; it speaks of their offices, consequently as applied to a single judge of his office, to be exercised by him for the benefit of the people of America, to which exercise his independence is as necessary as his office.

The gentleman from Virginia has on this occasion likened the judge to a bridge, and to various other objects; but I hope for his pardon, if while I admire the lofty flights of his eloquence, I abstain from noticing observations which I conceive to be utterly irrelevant.

The same honourable member has not only given us his history of the supreme court, but has told us of the manner in which they do business, and expressed his fears that having little else to do, they will do mischief.—We are not competent, sir, to examine, nor ought we to prejudge, their conduct. I am persuaded that they will do their duty, and presume they will have the decency to believe that we do our duty. In so far as they may be busied with the great mischief of checking the legislative or executive departments in any wanton invasion of our rights, I shall rejoice in that mischief.—I hope indeed they will not be so busied, because I hope we shall give them no cause. But I also hope they will keep an eagle eye upon us lest we should. It was partly for this purpose they were established, and I trust, that when properly called on they will dare to act. I know this doctrine is unpleasant. I know it is more popular to appeal to public opinion, that equivocal, transient being, which exists no where and every where. But if ever the occasion calls for it, I trust that the supreme court will not neglect doing the great mischief of saving this constitution, which can be done much better by their deliberations, than by resorting to what are called revolutionary measures.

The honourable member from North-Carolina, sore prest by the delicate situation in which he is placed, thinks he has discovered a new argument in favour of the vote which he is instructed to give. As far as I can enter into his ideas, and trace their progress, he seems to have assumed the position which was to be proved, and then searched through the constitution, not to discover whether the legislature have the right contended for, but whether, admitting them to possess it, there may not be something which might comport with that idea. I shall state the honourable member's argument, as I understand it, and if mistaken pray to be corrected. He read to us that clause which relates to impeachment, and comparing it with that which fixes the tenure of judicial office, has observed that this clause must relate solely to a removal by the executive power, whose right to remove, though not indeed anywhere mentioned in the constitution, has been admitted in a practice founded on legislative construction.

That as the tenure of the office is during good behaviour, and as the clause respecting impeachment, does not specify misbehaviour, there is evidently a clause of removal, which cannot be reached by impeachment, and of course (the executive not being permitted to remove) the right must necessarily devolve on the legislature. Is this the honourable member's argument? If it be, the reply is very simple. Misbehaviour is not a term known in our law.—The idea is expressed by the word misdemeanor; which word is in the clause quoted respecting impeachments. Taking therefore the two together, and speaking plain old English, the constitution says: "The judges shall hold their offices so long as they shall demean themselves well, but if they shall misdemean, if they shall on impeachment be convicted of misdemeanor, they shall be removed." Thus, sir, the honourable member will find that the one clause is just as broad as the other. He will see, therefore, that the legislature can assume no right from the deficiency of either, and will find that this clause, which he relied on, goes, if rightly understood, to the confirmation of our doctrine.

Is there a member of this house, who can lay his hand on his heart and say, that consistently with the plain words of our constitution, we have a right to repeal this law? I believe not. And if we undertake to construe this constitution to our purposes, and say that public opinion is to be our judge, there is an end to all constitutions. To what will not this dangerous doctrine lead? Should it to day be the popular wish to destroy the first magistrate, you can destroy him. And should he to-morrow be able to conciliate to him the popular will, and lead them to wish for your destruction, it is easily effected. Adopt this principle, and the whim of the moment will not only be the law, but the constitution of our country.

The gentleman from Virginia has mentioned a great nation brought to the feet of one of her servants. But why is she in that situation? Is it not because popular opinion was called on to decide every thing, until those, who wore bayonets, decided for all the rest. Our situation is peculiar. At present our national compact can prevent a state from acting hostilely towards the general interest. But let this compact be destroyed and each state becomes instantaneously vested with absolute sovereignty....Is there no instance of a similar situation to be found in history? Look at the states of Greece. They were once in a condition not unlike to that in which we should then stand. They treated the recommendations of their Amphictionic council (which was more a meeting of ambassadors than a legislative assembly) as we did the resolutions of the old Congress. Are we wise? So were they.—Are we valiant? They also were brave. Have we one common language, and are we united under one head? In this also there is a strong resemblance. But by their divisions, they became at first victims of the ambition of Philip, and were at length swallowed up in the Roman empire. Are we to form an exception to the general principles of human nature, and to all the examples of history? And are the maxims of experience to become false, when applied to our fate?

Some indeed flatter themselves, that our destiny will be like that of Rome. Such indeed it might be if we had the same wise, but vile, aristocracy, under whose guidance they became the masters of the world. But we have not that strong aristocratic arm, which can seize a wretched citizen, scourged almost to death by a remorseless creditor, turn him into the ranks, and bid him as a soldier bear our Eagle in triumph round the globe. I hope to God we shall never have such an abominable institution. But what, I ask, will be the situation of these states (organized as they now are) if by the dissolution of our national compact they be left to themselves? What is the probable result? We shall either be the victims of foreign intrigue, and split into factions, fall under the domination of a foreign power, or else after the misery and torment of civil war, become the subjects of an usurping military despot. What but this compact? What but this specific part of it, can save us from ruin? The judicial power; that fortress of the constitution, is now to be overturned. Yes, with honest Ajax I would not only throw a shield before it, I would build around it a wall of brass. But I am too weak to defend the rampart against the host of assailants. I must call to my assistance their good sense, their patriotism, and their virtue. Do not, gentlemen, suffer the rage of passion to drive reason from her seat. If this law be indeed bad, let us join to remedy the defects. Has it been passed in a manner which wounded your pride, or roused your resentment? Have, I conjure you, the magnanimity to pardon that offence. I entreat, I implore you, to sacrifice those angry passions to the interests of our country. Pour out this pride of opinion on the altar of patriotism. Let it be an expiatory libation for the woe of America. Do not, for God's sake, do not suffer that pride to plunge us all into the abyss of ruin. Indeed, indeed, it will be but of little, very little avail, whether one opinion or the other be right or wrong—it will heal no wounds, it will pay no debts, it will rebuild no ravaged towns—Do not rely on that popular will, which has brought us frail beings into political existence? That opinion is but a changeable thing. It will soon change. This very measure will change it. You will be deceived. Do not I beseech you, in reliance on a foundation so frail, commit the dignity, the harmony, the existence of our nation to the wild winds. Trust not your treasure to the waves. Throw not your compass and your charts into the ocean. Do not believe that its billows will waft you into port. Indeed, indeed, you will be deceived. Oh, cast not away this only anchor of our safety. I have seen its progress. I know the difficulties through which it was obtained. I stand in the presence of Almighty God, and of the world. I declare to you, that if you lose this charter, never! no never! will you get another. We are now perhaps arrived at the parting point. Here, even here, we stand on the brink of fate. Pause—Pause—For heaven's sake pause!

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ON the morning preceding the illuminations for the ratifications of the preliminaries, M. Otto received the following lines, in a female manuscript:

A thousand blessings wait on peaceful OTTO,
Whose talents so much powder sav'd and shot-o;
Who spar'd those tears, as salt as wife of LOT-O,
For carcases that otherwise would rot-o
In Egypt....or some other distant spot-o.

One of the emblems hung out on the event of the peace, was a hieroglyphic of the chief consul's name, which, in less happy times, has been used by a different class of men. This was a scragg of mutton, with the explanation under it, The original Boney part.

A French journalist, after relating that a young man, who had been deaf for many years, was cured by the explosion of a cannon fired near him, adds, "these same cannon sometimes do wonders in the cure of deafness!"

The long pending wager of 5000l. a-side, between R. Barclay, Esq. and Captain Fletcher, is expected to be decided in Scotland, in the beginning of next month. Mr. Barclay undertakes to go ninety miles, in twenty-one hours and a half. The last time he attempted to execute the same distance, in the same time, he was taken ill, after having gone over much of the ground, and the odds being in his favour. Mr. B. is in training by one Smith, of Black Hamilton, and is in good health and excellent wind. [London paper.]

Among the numerous sarcasms upon the ludicrous subject of the "big bone" cheese, boyishly made by the great children of Cheshire, and not less boyishly received by a childish philosopher, we think the following will produce the greatest merriment:

FROM THE REPUBLICAN, OR ANTI-DEMOCRAT.

The imagination of the inhabitants of Cheshire was so much expanded by the contemplation of their performance of so Herculean a task, as the manufacture of the Mammoth Cheese, that, in penning their address to the great object of their bounty, they were scarce able to make use of that sublimity of language, which the occasion demanded. The following is the substance of their address:—

A GREAT New-Year's Gift.

The greatest Cheese in America,

FOR

The greatest Man in America.

TO WIT,

The Author of the History of the greatest Beast in America.

GREAT SIR,

It is true we live at a great distance from the seat of the great national government, yet we claim the great right of judging for ourselves. We have a great attachment to the constitution, and we have, for several years past, had great apprehensions, that the great features of it were not properly attended to: Our joy, of course, must have been great, on your election to the first great office in the nation, having had great evidence, from your great sentiments, that it would be your greatest strife and glory to turn back the government to its virgin purity. The trust is great. The task is great. But we feel a great consolation, that the great ruler of the great universe, who raises up great men to achieve great events, has raised up a great Jefferson, to defend the great principles of republicanism.

Sir, we have attempted to prove our great love to our great president, not in great words, but in mighty deeds. With this address, we send you a great Cheese, by the hands of the greatest men amongst us, as a huge pepper-corn of the great esteem we bear our chief magistrate. It is not the last stone in the Bastile (we presume they mean it is not so great as the greatest stone in the Bastile), nor is it of any great consequence as an article of worth, but we hope it will be received as a great free-will offering. This great Cheese, great sir, was not made by a great lord, for his great majesty, nor with a view to gain great offices, or great titles, but by the great personal labour of the greatest farmers in our great state, without the assistance of a single slave, for an elective president of a great people, with the only view of casting a huge mite into the great scale of democracy. The late return of republicanism has greatly induced the inhabitants of Cheshire, to treat the great characters, who now fill the great offices, with great respect. We had, sir, formed the vast project of putting some grand inscription on this great cheese, but we were greatly dissuaded from this attempt, from the great inconvenience we find in paying the great expense on stamped paper. May the Almighty God greatly preserve your life for a long time, as a great blessing to the United States, and to the world at large.

DUANE V. DANA.

"The republicans heard him with regret, and while he forbid all consideration for himself, every one who felt for the dignity of legislative proceedings, lamented." This is not the first chapter of lamentations, that Mr. Dana has furnished for the democrats. We would only ask, where was all this delicacy of feeling, this exquisite sensibility, for the dignity of legislative proceedings, when Matthew Lyon was guilty of so vile an outrage against it? Mr. Dana only scattered keen-edged words, to wound republican pride....but the Lyon did a dirty trick, for which he was justly chastized, by a gentleman, and had he met entire justice, would have been thrust out of congress.

It is a doubtful matter, whether our president Jefferson, can write one sentence of correct and classical English. Shall we attribute this egregious deficiency in scholarship to the same unworthy affectation, which is said to have possessed Frederic II of Prussia, who would seldom speak, and never wrote correctly his mother tongue? Or is it a portion of that deep-rooted malignity against every thing English, which Mr. Jefferson is known to entertain, that makes him disdain even to write their language with accuracy?

Take the following specimen:—"If revealed religion has not been able to guard itself against misrepresentations, I could not expect it." Make what you can of it, reader!

We shall certainly run the risk of being charged with quibbling, by the Aurora, if we continue to expose all the murders committed by the writers in that paper, upon sense, grammar, and language. From the president of the United States down to Tench Coxe (a wide distance we own), there is scarcely one man of the party, that is not in the habit of employing the true-American words, illy and lengthly, whenever they can. In the paper of Thursday, we find the following. "Curious facts, relative to a country, illy understood." We beg leave to substitute the word language for country.

The Aurora-man calls upon his Hog correspondent to come and get his swill again. For himself, he don't like, and will none of it.

As many have expressed a curiosity to obtain some memoirs of the celebrated Mr. WINDHAM, the Editor has been at considerable pains to obtain from English journals a correct biography. Hitherto his search has been fruitless. Meanwhile, let our readers accept the following paragraph.

This gentleman is member of parliament for Norwich, and is noted for the decision, boldness, and correctness of his parliamentary conduct. He was a brilliant member of that literary club, in which Dr. Johnson, Edmund Burke, &c. so long mingled, and was most lavishly commended by the former in various instances. As a high proof of his political talents, the following extorted praise has been bestowed even by a reluctant jacobin.

The talents of Mr. Windham, as a politician, are highly respectable. With his education, his experience, his powers of reasoning, and his indefatigable efforts in favour of the cause, which he espouses, he is certainly a valuable acquisition to the ministry. In abstract questions, where the abstruse aid of logic may be serviceable, Mr. Windham will ever have the pre-eminence of any member at present in parliament. His arguments are scholastic, ingenious, and marked with a precision, characteristic of himself. In his language, he is chaste, copious and forcible. His mode of reasoning attracts the most severe attention, while it frequently conveys irresistible conviction to the most sceptical. He seldom enters into narrative or description. His mind is wholly employed in evincing the fallacy. His voice is articulate, and possesses an uniform tenour of power. He never attempts the false glare of rhetorical figure, or splendid diction. Anxious to pursue the more solid sources of his reasoning faculty, he trusts to the mere aid of his logical powers to display his arguments. Few possess more acuteness in discerning the weak parts of his adversary's sentiments, or have the power of confuting them with more effect. He is a character of respectable habits, high talents, and useful acquisitions; and impartiality must acknowledge that his loss is as much felt by his former friends, as his support is cherished by those, with whom he now adheres.

Among the many pleasantries, the federal sneerers have invented to raise the laugh at the expence of our French treaty bearer, the following song, the production as we understand of a lady, in the Gazette of the U. S. is at once good humoured, easy, and poetical.

NANCY DAWSON'S RETURN.

Since Nancy Dawson's come to town,
No LONDON DOLL will now go down,
For every ribbon, hat and gown,
Consult with Nancy Dawson.

For she can tell you to a hair,
The size, and hue of wig to wear,
When to dress, and when go bare:—
Most knowing Nancy Dawson!

'Tis said, and I believe it true,
Such skill in lace did Nancy shew,
She gained a prize, obtain'd by few:—
Oh! lucky Nancy Dawson!

The prize, the Paris belles agreed,
For Nancy's taste, should be decreed—
A Dog of Madame Talien's breed:—
Sweet pet for Nancy Dawson!

This is not all that Nancy brings,
But many other pretty things,
For which, the Muse in rapture sings
The praise of Nancy Dawson.

The Parisian elegantes do not wear their ribbons in a bow or a knot on the head, but with the ends cut into horns, as more appropriate emblems.

"Your face belies you," said a gentleman to a rubicund beggar. "Ah! Master," replied the mendicant, "it is not my face, but my landlord's, he is not paid for it yet."

A new discovery has been lately made, which if it should prove useful, will not be entitled, at all events, to the praise of humanity. It is a receipt for the destruction of the field mice. By catching a dozen, and confining them in a cage without food, they will be reduced to the necessity of eating one another. The survivor being set at liberty, will fly to the holes of his former companions, and having been thus a cannibal, will fall upon and destroy the whole brood.

The Ladies have just now adopted a repulsive kind of hat, which may be called the Poking Hat; it has a long projection, like the beak of a snipe, and is a good guard against all familiar approach of those who have any regard for their eyes. It is an invention inspired by the Goddess of Ugliness, and is quite worthy of its origin.

Trotting match.—On the morning of the 7th inst. a black, poney 11 1-2 hands high, the property of Mr. Samuel Shephard, of Brotherton, was matched, for 20gs. to trot one mile upon the Doncaster road in 6 minutes, carrying its owner, who rode 14 1-2st. and performed it with great ease in 4 minutes and 45 seconds, to the astonishment of a number of spectators.

[York Courier.]

At the last Multon Races, a match was run betwixt two Hunters, which could arrive at a given point in the shortest time. They went the distance (four miles) in less than fifteen minutes, and took one hundred leaps in their way as they crossed the country. Mr. TEASDALE was the winner; Mr. DARLER the loser, on whom the odds were at starting.

NOTHING.

(FROM A PARIS PAPER.)

In spite of the wit with which the eyes of our fair readers generally inspire us, we cannot deny that we are on some occasions afflicted with such a degree of mental sterility as to be utterly incapable of producing any thing at all smart or entertaining.—What must we say under such circumstances? Nothing, reply our fair readers. That is precisely what we have now resolved to do. But you will say, that Nothing is a very insignificant subject. Is this really your opinion? For our part, on the contrary, we believe that Nothing is at present every thing. May not the greater number of the voluminous romances, which consume so much paper, and stuff the shelves of so many libraries, be very fairly reduced to Nothing? Are they not made of Nothing? Are they not sold, or at least are they not read for Nothing? What is obtained from reading them? Literally Nothing. How many people are there now a days, who, though originally Nothing, have, after being for a moment something, again relapsed into Nothing? What is there in most cases in those pretty heads which not unfrequently turn ours? Nothing. The young Olympe pleads for a divorce from the old Geronte, to whom she was married last year. What is it he has been doing during the year of their marriage? Why truly he has been doing Nothing. What does the prude Orphise, who exclaims so loudly against naked bosoms, conceal under the triple fur? Why she conceals Nothing. Can you conceive any thing more witty and spirited than Mr. Sheridan's Comedies, or more dull and insipid than the monstrous farces of Kotzebue? Nothing. Is there any thing more unhappy than the lot of an unfortunate stock-jobber, more unfeeling than the heart of a rich miser, more light than the vows of a lover, more dull than the verses of Small Pybus? Still the answer is Nothing. You see then that Nothing is every thing, and even above every thing, for what is wanting to what has every thing. But Nothing has no where so great influence as over the fair sex. They know how to please with Nothing. With Nothing they play off all their attractions. A Nothing vexes and consoles them; a Nothing puts them out of humour, and the same Nothing restores them to cheerfulness. A Nothing gives them the vapours, and in its turn affords them pleasure and amusement. But we will no longer trespass on your patience with Nothing; and therefore we shall here close our remarks on Nothing!

Two Suitors in Chancery, being reconciled to each other after a very tedious and expensive suit, lately applied to an artist to paint a device in commemoration of their returning amity and peace. The Artist accordingly painted one of them in his shirt and the other stark naked.

ANECDOTE OF THE LATE ISAAC SPARKS.

Sparks was a well known bon vivant, and devoted his evenings to the purple deity. It was remarked, that, when he got his quantum of the juice of the grape, he entirely lost his power of speech, though he retained the use of his limbs. Mr. Foote was his constant companion in his nocturnal revels, who was as diminutive in stature, as the other was tall and robust. One night, from having been remarkable festive, our chief joker could not speak, and Foote was not able to stand. Sparks took him up, and placed him on a straddle on his neck and shoulders. In this manner they quitted the tavern. During their walk home, they were accosted by a watchman, who demanded who they were. Sparks pointed up to Foote, as much as to hint he would inform him; who, on being asked, replied, "that he was only seeing the gentleman home."

"The New-England Palladium" contains the following testimony, in favour of the ex-secretary of state; and the Editor of the Port Folio is proud to repeat, in every mode, and from every vehicle, the praise of pure integrity, which nothing can tarnish, and valiant decisiveness, which never wavered or veered:

"The democratic party are very eager to call for accounts. The honesty of such a man as Col. Pickering, though unspotted through life, is not voucher enough for these dragons, who pretend to watch the treasury. They seem to hold it a merit to examine, when they confess it would be a folly to suspect."

"Now is this democratic jealousy a sort of stuff for shew, or is it for use? If it be their holiday suit, their inauguration dress, we, the people, may find out, in case they persist to make every day's wear of it, that it is as flimsy as it is tawdry. The democrats will be soon out at the elbows. If it be for use, pray is not Mr. Gallatin as much to be suspected as Colonel Pickering? The American, often tried, and in trying times, and never found wanting, is surely as well entitled to confidence, as the foreigner, who, on the only trial he has been put to, was found wanting. If they must be jealous, and they must, for fear is the instinct of weakness, there let them fix their eyes. The man, whose country lies on the other side of the Atlantic, and whose principles, if he has any, are to be found on the other side of the Alleghany, is a proper subject of their watchfulness. Yet their democratic eyes, like the owl's, are struck blind when there is light, and are opened to nothing but darkness. They see nothing that is obvious....they believe nothing that is proved....their faith is ever the most stubborn, where the grounds of suspicion are the lightest. From examining the secretaries Pickering and Wolcott's accounts, we are told nothing, not even suspicion will result, for they do not pretend to suspect them. Nevertheless, they will examine. The account of French piracies is thirty millions, that, they say, must not be examined. No questions asked, as advertisements for the return of stolen goods say; let us ratify a treaty that sponges out the claim. Neither French nor Swiss accounts, it seems, need vouching or examining. With respect to them, jacobin faith has its perfect work."

The vice president of the United States combines, in happy union, his duty and his delight. Now at New-York, frolic and free; and now at Washington, laborious and crafty. Wise as a serpent, though not quite as harmless as a dove, he can employ his versatile energies in the most diverse direction, and, like the younger LITTLETON, after convincing or alluring his hearers, by his morning eloquence, can, at eve, retire

"To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Naxos's hair."

The Aurora advertises for two smart devils, of good morals, as apprentices to the printing business.

In the "New-York Evening Post," we read, with full assent, the following compliment to the talents of Mr. G. MORRIS:

"The speech of Mr. Gouverneur Morris is a very elegant specimen of that gentleman's talents. It well deserves the high encomiums which have been bestowed upon it. Were we to study to characterise it in a sentence, we should say, it was argumentative, yet graceful; bold, yet respectful; witty, yet dignified; resembling, in happy quotation, and illustrative metaphor, the manner of Burke, without his exuberance. The friends of Mr. Morris, who have the cause of federalism at heart, and whose alarms for our constitution have, of late, been too much excited, view, with sensations of extreme pleasure, this splendid exertion of that gentleman's abilities. High expectations have long been entertained, that he would produce something worthy of his luminous mind, and we rejoice that the hopes of the most sanguine are at length gratified. He has now given us a pledge, that he will not stand aloof in this period of common danger."

SMOKING A SEGAR,

IN THE MANNER OF MILTON.

PROP'D in an elbow chair, Fumoso sat,
With legs divaricating, and with heels
Recumbent on the stove's projecting plate.
Around his head, in sombrous volumes roll'd
The clouds of pungent smoke, from volute leaf
Of plant perfum'd, delicious with the scent
Of od'rous bean, dear bought, and brought from far!

His head sublime, thrown back in lofty state,
The ceiling's height contemplates; nor disturb'd
Its musing trance, except betimes to squirt
The sputtering streams of bland saliva off.
Nor minds the plaints of Betty or of Jack,
For brass resplendent sullied; or the spots
That mar the nicely blacken'd, shining face
Of Franklin's economic fount of heat.
While on the mantle stands the cheering glass
Of Gallic cordial, temper'd with the stream
Of limpid Schuylkill, which erewhile he sips,
And feels his soul expand, and dreams of bliss
Supreme, in Fancy's airy visions lost.
In his mind's eye he sees the blooming fair
Simper, or smile upon him;....she, for whom
He almost would resign the fragrant fumes
Of lov'd segar, and purify his breath.
But now Ambition fires his swelling thoughts,
With schemes of public good. He dares to court
And win the people's voice. The senate hears
His voice, resounding in her spacious hall,
And patriots listen, while Fumoso rails.
His hand aloft extending, wav'd sublime
In circle bold.....alas! the blazing top
Of taper sunk it strikes.....the light's extinct!
His knuckles too are sing'd!....the charm dissolves!
His last segar begins to scorch his lip;
The drowsy watchman bellows "dwell a glock!"
Fumoso starts! relumes the extinguish'd wick,
*And sadly silent seeks the sweets of sleep.

Sic transit gloria mundi.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. V.

AMONG those, who are advanced into the vale of years, there is no complaint more common, than the increasing degeneracy of the times.... They look round the world, and seeing nothing that awakens those feelings, which novelty excited in the bosom of youth, they exclaim, in bitterness, that all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

An old lady, who has the honour of calling me her grandson, and whose goodness of heart calls forth my love, as much as her grey hairs command my reverence, although she can participate in the pleasures of the young, and although her easy presence checks no decent joy, always insists upon this topic, with peculiar warmth and energy. I have controverted the point with her, for the last five years, but conviction has not, as yet, been produced on either side, for the old lady soon grows warm, and I am then silent. I wish to combat this mistaken idea, both for her sake, and for that of many of her contemporaries; and shall therefore enter into a cursory examination of its justice. My readers will not expect that I should enter into any philosophical disquisition upon the subject. I shall take such a desultory view of it, as suits the "laborious idleness" of a Lounger.

It has been remarked, that the extent of civilization attained by a country, may be calculated to a considerable degree of accuracy, from the nature of its amusements. If this principle be admitted, we must set down that nation as scarcely more than half civilized, where the tormenting a generous animal, and finally destroying him, constitutes the favourite amusement, not of the vulgar only, but of those also of more exalted rank. We should also scarcely allow, that another was advanced more than two thirds in the scale of refinement, where, in the boxes of a theatre, the steams of hot punch, the odour of half decayed apples, the crunching of ground nuts, and the smoke of segars should unite to impress a stranger with the belief that he was in a common ale-house, rather than in a scene of elegant amusement. But, not only may comparative degrees of civilization between one nation and another be estimated by this scale; it affords also a criterion of the comparative degree of civilization, in the same country, at different periods of its history. In Russia, for instance, the remarkable regulation, that no lady shall appear drunk in the court assemblies, before nine o'clock, was a proof of the rapid advances in refinement that had been made in that country; for, it is very doubtful, whether, in the preceding reign, the power of a despotic sovereign would have been competent to impose such a cruel restriction. Probably, the inhabitants of that vast empire are now so far improved, that a regulation that no lady should appear drunk, before the hour of eleven, might be enforced, without any great hazard of a political convulsion,

But to return from this digression. I leave to others the task of examining and appreciating the advances of the present age, in the several branches of philosophy. I shall only attempt to vindicate its superiority, by the superior taste and elegance of its amusements; and, by comparing them with those of preceding generations, endeavour to demonstrate on which side the advantage lies.

I have already incidentally mentioned the theatre: let us begin our estimate, by comparing the dramatic writings of the present day, with those of preceding times. The dramas, which were admired and applauded by those, who complain of our degeneracy, although the pruning knife may have been sedulously employed, are now barely tolerated. Even the sparkling wit of Congreve and Farquhar is no longer admitted, as atonement for their indelicacy. In this respect, the gradual improvement of successive generations is particularly observable. The Spectator (if I mistake not), records the licentiousness of the drama as having attained to such a pitch, that the female part of society often attended the theatre at the first representation of a new play, lest the licentiousness of the author might prevent their appearance there on the second. It is also, I believe, recorded in the same work, that a play was not unfrequently performed, in the reign of Charles the second, in which a young gallant deliberately undressed himself to his shirt and drawers; and, what is yet more remarkable, the play, in which this interesting incident was introduced, was written by a woman*. Let the dramas of Mrs. Inchbald, Mrs. Cowley, and Miss Lee be placed in honourable opposition to this degradation of the dignity and delicacy of the female character.

It will scarcely be questioned, that a taste for reading is now much more universally diffused, than formerly, particularly among the softer sex. I will venture to affirm, that the present age not only offers a greater variety of works for their perusal, but that they are also much better adapted for the recreation of a pure mind. Amidst the inundation of novels, annually poured forth from the circulating library, there are few, however trifling they may be in construction, or deficient in incident, that are immoral in their tendency; there are few that will corrupt the heart, although they may mislead it, by false views of human life. I well remember, that, a short time since, I was passing the day with the good old lady, whom I have commemorated in the former part of this paper. The weather was tempestuous. Two young ladies, who were paying a visit at her house, were obviating the gloom of the day, by amusing themselves with their needles; but she, whose age and infirmities deprive her, to a considerable extent, of that resource, appeared to sit uncomfortably in her arm-chair; and her feelings were farther irritated, by occasional twinges of rheumatism. Silence and stupor appeared to be gradually invading the company, when the old lady desired me to go to a small closet, which was the repository of her little library, and bring out something to read, in order to dissipate the gloom which surrounded us.

The collection was small; and I could find nothing so likely to suit the purposes of amusement, as some very early volumes of a celebrated English miscellany, the Lady's Magazine. I took up one at random, and began to read aloud the first tale that I met with. I had not read above two pages, before I began to be a little alarmed for the progress of the story, as I have an unfortunate irritability of system, that is very apt to call up the blood in my face, upon any sudden surprise of this nature. Before I had finished the third, I was seized with a short cough; the ladies raised their eyes from their work at intervals, and cast a look of apprehension at each other; and my poor grandmother, before I had come to the bottom of the fourth, requested me to close the book.

I do not wish to specify the tale; it will be sufficient to observe, that nothing could easily be more impure, either in its construction, or its catastrophe. Yet this was one of the earliest volumes of a work, which still exists, and bore on its title-page the same assurance with the present volume....that it was a work compiled for the entertainment of the fair sex, and adapted solely to their use and amusement. If the present proprietor of this female miscellany were to season his work occasionally, with a tale of this nature, I apprehend, that he would soon find a lamentable deficiency in the list of his subscribers.

I am afraid of extending this essay to too great a length; and I feel symptoms of weariness, which admonish me to draw to a close. With two or three remarks upon dancing and dress, two important topics in a Lounger's estimation, I shall conclude the present paper.

I have lately re-perused a ludicrous letter upon ancient dancing, which appeared in the 40th number of the Port Folio, under the signature of Gregory Grisby. If this letter give a just account of the figures of the dances of former days, which there is no reason to doubt, I think that we may congratulate ourselves upon our superior elegance and refinement. Some of our beaux may, perhaps, occasionally break a lady's shins, by a too ostentatious display of their agility in a new step; but this is a rare occurrence. I own, that I am utterly at a loss to conceive, what would be the consequence, if we were to introduce into the assembly-room, some of the whimsical figures mentioned by Gregory Grisby; such as hitting each other's elbows, and trotting and galloping, not to mention the kisses, which seem to have been bestowed in those days, with such liberality. Now, although I am disposed to consider kissing as a most delightful invention, yet I cannot help thinking, that places may be found, more convenient for the performance of that animating ceremony, than a public assembly-room.

With respect to dress, I apprehend, that every person, who has a taste for simplicity, and who really admires the fairest workmanship of heaven, will unite in preferring the simple elegance of its present style, to the stiff stays which distorted, and the expanding hoop which disfigured the forms of beauty, in the days of our ancestors. The satirist

* The Rover, or Banished Cavaliers, by Mrs. Behn, indeed, may be facetious upon the liberality with which, in some instances, the person is displayed: but this is neither a general, nor is it a necessary consequence of the present fashion. Whenever my grandmother adverts to this topic, I point, with an air of triumph, to a picture of my great aunt, which hangs in one of her apartments, and which affords, to the full, as generous a display of the upper part of her person, as we are blest with in the present day. I cannot help thinking, that much less danger is to be apprehended from the prevalence of this fashion, than has been supposed by some rigid moralists. The display has already lost the fascination of novelty, and further discoveries must take place, in order to excite the ardent gaze. I remember, that, upon the first introduction of the present style of dress, the crowding of the beaux afforded an infallible sign where any lady was seated, who was unusually bountiful in the display of her charms. But this is the case no longer; and, from the change that I have observed in this particular, I am in great hopes, that, by the close of this winter, those beauties which, by their concealment, fired the imagination, will be regarded with nearly the same indifference, as a naked nose, or a naked elbow.

POLITE LITERATURE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

KOTZEBUE VINDICATED.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

A WRITER in the theatrical department of your miscellany, has, in one or two recent instances, involved, in one general anathema, the writings of Kotzebue. This is so contrary to the usual urbanity of the criticisms, which appear in the Port Folio, and, in my apprehension, so hostile to the interests of literature and taste, that I have determined to request your insertion of a brief vindication of the dramatic writings of that much abused author.

In the censure that has been passed upon him by some of the foreign literary journals, I cannot help thinking that hostility to his supposed political opinions, has had no small share. The intolerance, which is shewn on both sides of the question, would be scarcely believed by any, who were not conversant with those miscellanies. Amidst the storm of conflicting passions, taste and genius prefer their claims in vain. They are too often sacrificed, without remorse, at the shrine of political bigotry. The writings of Kotzebue have been treated by critics of one class, with marked severity; and the derisions of prejudice on one side of the Atlantic, have, I think, been too hastily echoed and adopted on the other. I am particularly concerned at witnessing their appearance in the Port Folio; for the Editor is too well versed in that "lofty and columnar work," the Pursuits of Literature, not to remember that "Politics are transitory," but that "wit is eternal."

The objections to the writings of Kotzebue may, I believe, be referred to two heads. He has been accused, in the first place, of drawing his vicious characters from high life, and confining virtue to those in a more humble state; and in the second, of inculcating principles subversive of the foundations of morality. I shall consider these objections, in order.

I cannot think that the first is entitled to any great weight, even if it were founded in fact; but it has not even the merit of being true. Upon the same principles, upon which Kotzebue is condemned, it would be very easy to accuse every English dramatist, from Shakspeare downwards, of rank jacobinism, and the proof, I think, would be found equally easy. If Kotzebue means to draw the character of an oppressor he must assign it to that class of men, to whom the institutions of society have given the power of oppressing; if he wish to sketch a seducer, he must seek for him among that class, which is most amply endowed with the means of gratifying the passions, and which would be disposed to regard as a degradation, a matrimonial alliance with an inferior. The poet and the dramatist have, almost universally, represented the humble, or at least the middling classes of life, as most favourable to the growth of virtue. Philosophy might, perhaps, teach us, that this opinion has been too hastily and too generally adopted; but, if it be erroneous, Kotzebue is not its founder.

But let us examine, how far this opinion, even if it were just in the abstract, is founded in fact. With the exception of "The Happy Family," and the "Force of Calumny," my acquaintance with the writings of Kotzebue is confined to those dramas, which have been exhibited on the Philadelphia stage. And where shall we find proofs of the justice of this accusation, in The Corsicans, the Count of Burgundy, Lovers Vows, False Shame, The Stranger, The Virgin of the Sun, and Pizarro? Some have indeed gone so far as to censure Kotzebue, for delineating Pizarro in such odious colours, and for representing the Peruvians in so amiable, and the Spaniards in so detestable a light. But the author has not, in this instance, assumed any poetical license. The pen of the eloquent Robertson, and of their own countryman, Las Casas, has consigned the atrocities of the invaders, to the execration of all posterity; and the brutal severity of their leader, justly entitles him to the application of the keen effusion of the Roman satirist, and designates him as a monster.

Nulla virtute redemptum
A vitiiis.....

I might fill up every column in the Port Folio, were I to enter into a minute examination of the story of these dramas, in order to prove my assertion. But the task would be a tedious one, and I would rather leave it to the investigation of your readers, and proceed, at once, to examine the justice of those censures, which have been cast upon our author's writings, as subversive of the principles of morality. I must confess, that this charge appears to me, equally unfounded with the other. I should be rather inclined to maintain, that the dramatic writings of Kotzebue are remarkable for their moral tendency. The greater part of them, either directly or indirectly, recommend or enforce some moral principle. But is this absolutely necessary in the construction of a drama? If no play were to be represented, of which the moral was not apparent, what would become of many of those writings, which are the delight and ornament of the English stage? Where shall we find the moral of many of the dramas of the great master of the passions? Where shall we find it in two-thirds of the brilliant and witty comedies of the eighteenth century? Many of them seem merely designed to exhibit a natural picture of human life and human character, and the moral appears to be entirely a secondary consideration.

The Stranger is, perhaps, more exceptionable than any other of Kotzebue's dramas; and the clamour against it has been particularly vehement and indignant. I am in doubt, however, whether the censure cast upon it be altogether just. Two female writers have attacked this play, with all the indignation which generally animates the bosom of the fair, against a fallen sister. Far be it from me to attempt to weaken, in the smallest degree, those obligations, which maintain female dignity, and enforce female virtue; yet I am strongly inclined to doubt the purity and justice of that morality, which would refuse our pity and forgiveness to one, whose fall was momentary, and who had attempted to repair her error, by three years of solitary grief and repentance*.

With the exception of this one play, I think, that I may defy the enemies of Kotzebue to point out any incidents, which have an immoral tendency, in the dramas that I have enumerated. On the other hand, it will be easy to produce from them specimens of the purest morality. I know not that there exists, upon the English stage, a finer and more instructive scene, than that in Lover's Vows, in which the pastor awakens the conscience of the seducer, and stimulates him to repentance. False Shame abounds with the most excellent sentiments; and where shall we find more tender and soothing pictures of domestic life, that sacred scene which is so favourable to the growth of our purest and most virtuous feelings, than in the Corsicans, and the Happy Family?

Having attempted the defence of our author against these two accusations, I might proceed to vindicate his claim to the meed of genius. But this is a needless task. The multitudes, who have been agitated and interested by the productions of his muse, in Europe, and in this country, and the vehement hostility with which he has been attacked, afford the most unequivocal testimony of its justice. I can only pity his insensibility, who does not trace the pencil of a master, in the delineation of the romantic Rolla (perhaps the most interesting dramatic character that was ever conceived); of the elder Pompiliana and the countess Natalia, in the Corsicans; of the young Henry and Elizabeth, in the Count of Burgundy; of the Injured Husband, in the Force of Calumny; and the artless Cora, in the Virgin of the Sun. Where shall we find, except in our own Shakspeare, incidents and situations more strongly productive of dramatic effect, than the interview between the father and daughter, in the Corsicans, the father and son, in Lover's Vows, the husband and wife in the Stranger, the generous heroism of Rolla, in the Virgin of the Sun, and his rescue of the child, in Pizarro? I could multiply instances still further, but I would avoid the tediousness of a catalogue. Kotzebue is a voluminous writer; he has, perhaps, written too hastily; perhaps too much; but, when the number and variety of his dramatic efforts are recollected, it is, I think, no small praise to him, that he has written so well.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE play of Deaf and Dumb, was repeated on Friday, with increased excellence in the performance. We omitted, in our last review, to observe that the 28th number of the Port Folio, contains a minute analysis of this drama, taken from a respectable foreign print. The performances fixed for Monday evening, were postponed in consequence of the sudden indisposition of Mr. Fullerton; whose melancholy fate we sincerely deplore. This circumstance disappointed a number of persons, who were attracted to the Theatre, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather, by the expectation of witnessing Mrs. Merry's first appearance, after her long and severe indisposition. We cordially congratulate her on her recovery; both for her own sake, and for that of the town. Her Cora in the Virgin of the Sun, on Wednesday, was performed in her usual style of finished excellence. We have spoken of this play

* The only questionable part of this drama, is obviated by an alteration in it, as performed at the New Theatre, in this city. Mrs. Haller is represented as having suddenly stopped, before she had completed the measure of her guilt, and the feelings of the spectators sympathise the more readily in her restoration.

In a former review and shall therefore, only stop to applaud Mr. Wood's excellence in Rolla. Notwithstanding the difficulty of the task imposed upon him, in following Cooper in one of his most interesting characters, his manner of performing it reflected the highest credit on himself, and fully merited those plaudits which were frequently and liberally bestowed by the audience. The little after piece of What would the Man be at, is a spirited and satirical sketch; and displayed to advantage the versatility of Bernard's talents in the personification of the three brothers. And the parts of the niece and uncle were sustained with much spirit by Mr. Warren and Miss Westray.

On Friday a new romantic drama was brought forward, called Joanna of Montfaucon. This is a translation, or rather, an adaptation of a drama of Kotzebue's by the celebrated Cumberland. It may naturally be supposed that his pen would never be prostituted in the cause of immorality. His undertaking this task therefore, is an evidence that this play is worthy the attention of a liberal audience. It may be necessary to inform some readers, that it was produced at Covent-Garden with a view to attract some portion of the crowds, which the splendid spectacle of Pizarro invited to Drury Lane. It abounds therefore in beautiful scenery, and stage effects. This drama was well acted; it was cast with the whole strength of the house; the talents of our two great actresses were suited in it, and their parts were sustained with their wonted perfection. The decorations bestowed upon it evinced the liberality of the Managers; and we therefore witnessed with unfeigned concern, the melancholy spectacle of a house nearly deserted, notwithstanding the multiplied sources of attraction. The frequent repetition of this circumstance, we fear, will paralyze their future efforts. If the practice of collecting numerous and splendid parties upon the nights appropriated to theatrical performances, should continue; it is impossible but that the managers must sustain a heavy loss at the close of the season, instead of that remuneration of their labours which they have a right to expect from the justice and liberality of the public.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

A FRENCH writer, declaiming against the late Catharine of Russia, has the following animated apostrophe:

O, Catharine! dazzled by thy greatness, of which I have had a near view; charmed with thy beneficence, which rendered so many individuals happy; seduced by the thousand amiable qualities that have been admired in thee, I would fain have erected a monument to thy glory: but torrents of blood flow in upon me, and inundate my design: the chains of thirty millions of slaves ring in my ears; and deafen me; the crimes which have reigned in thy name call forth my indignation; I throw away my pen, and exclaim, "Let there be henceforth no glory, without virtue! Let injustice and depravity be transmitted with no other laurel to posterity, than the snakes of Nemesis!"

While ROBERT BURNS, the Ayrshire ploughman, was young and obscure, among the peasants of his bleak mountains he instituted at Tarbolton a sort of literary symposium, or bachelor's club. The following was one of the rules, by which this band of brothers was bound.

"Every man, proper for a member of this club, must have a frank, honest, open heart; above any thing dirty or mean. And must be a professed over of one or more of the female sex. No mean spirited, worldly mortal, whose only will is to heap up money shall upon any pretence whatever be admitted."

Dr. JOHNSON, in the following terms, once consoled BOSWELL, sorrowing for his indolence, and despairing of a cure.

Resolution will sometimes relax, and diligence will sometimes be interrupted; but let no accidental surprize or deviation, whether short or long, dispose you to despondency. Consider these failings as incident to all mankind. Begin again, where you left off, and endeavour to avoid the seducements, that prevailed over you before.

Among the wiser precepts of learning nothing can be more useful, than to recall vagrant genius to the course of industry, by examples of intense application, bestowed by the most accomplished scholars. Nothing can be more false or fatal to learning, than the common opinion, that whatever is easy or excellent in composition may be struck out at a heat. Some of the most vivacious passages in PRIOR and LA FONTAINE were slowly and painfully elaborated. JUNIUS applies the word labour to his letters. Dr. BLAIR gave a week to the composition of a short sermon, and when HUME was complimented by a noble Marquis, now living, on the correctness of his style, particularly in his History of England—he observed "If he had shewn any peculiar correctness; it was owing to the uncommon care he took in the execution of his work, as he wrote it over three times before he sent it to the press."

OWEN CAMBRIDGE a most brilliant literary character and as distinguished as Topham Beauclerc for a delicate taste and an ardent love of elegant letters, wrote many papers in The World, a well known periodical work. During the progress of the above publication, being one Sunday at church, he was remarkably grave and thoughtful. This was remarked by Mrs. Cambridge, who being apprehensive that he had heard bad news to make him so uncommonly gloomy, asked him what he was thinking of? "upon a very important subject indeed, my dear," said he, "I am thinking—of the next world."

Abbe Brotier, the Editor of the best Tacitus extant, was wont to declare that to study is Paradise, to compose is Purgatory, and to print is Hell.

In the European Magazine for Jan. 1800, a writer in the Critical Department, analyzing a new book, entitled Irish Pursuits of Literature, declares that the reputation of the original Pursuits of Literature has not been confined to this country. It has extended to our sister kingdom, and has received equal consideration there. The present author speaks of it with a degree of rapture, which it has hardly experienced in England, and declares the author to be nobleminded, profoundly learned, and whom posterity will hail as the Seventh Satirist; with all the playfulness of wit, the severity of virtue, and the honesty of religion, unsparingly applying the rod to infidelity, superstition, anarchy, vice and folly; and bestowing the wreath on piety, learning, knowledge and taste,

"In thoughts, that breathe and words that burn."

I am unalterably of opinion, that the ladies, after the perusal of the following article, will hardly choose, for their yoke mate in the "matrimonial waggon," such dull brutes as Budaeus and Turnebus:

It is related of those deep scholars, Budaeus and Turnebus, that they spent their wedding day in a severe prosecution of their usual studies in recondite literature. Their poor ladies, I am afraid, had but little reason to expect much happiness from lovers, who could prefer the dreary researches of grammatical and critical learning, to the high and innocent delights of nuptial festivity. The bosom, which, at such seasons, could have room for any other sentiment than love and joy, must have been too cold for the social duties, and fit only for the damp walls of a monastic cell.

PETER PINDAR, whose genius now resembles an "idle taper, flaring as it wastes," has just addressed an abusive epistle to the celebrated Count RUMFORD. In this unequal production there is much to excite the disgust and contempt of the reader; but there may be seen among thick darkness an occasional corruscation of wit. In his exordium, this worn out bard tells us that his muse "Now to a YANKEE tunes the willing lyre:

Spite of the ingratitude of Cooks and Kings,
Strikes to Count Rumford's tuneful name the strings;
Who from his favourite little Rumford came,
To build on Smoke his fortune and his fame.

In another passage our saucy bard thus exclaims:

"What gratitude, what thanks to thee are due,
Instructing a great empire—how to chew!
Great man, whose fertile genius should contrive
To soften rocks, and flay the flints alive;
And make, though envy unbelieving grins,
Pouches and handsome purses of their skins;
Nay more, but yet methinks a dangerous hint,
To perfect jelly turn the honest flint;
For hence an inconvenience may arise,
To this discovery rogues will turn their eyes....
The felons dread, for robbery, murder, rape,
Will eat their various dwellings and escape.

From these specimens it will appear that Peter's flame, once vivid enough, is now dying in the socket, and that either the caustic poetry, or the cudgel of Gifford has frightened the muse of Pindar away. This splenetic effusion against the American emigrant boasts but little inspiration, except that of want, and although a sparkle glittering or precious may be sometimes seen

"Yet, who for one poor pearl of cloudy ray,
Through Alpine dunghills delves his desperate way?"

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

ONE might as well think to describe the various convolutions and grotesque developements of a cloud, driven by the wind, as to give an accurate description of the various forms, assumed by Fashion. Every gradation of hue has been successively exhibited to allure the beaux. When we behold the most beautiful female forms, gliding in our public streets, robed in white, and with their lovely necks decorated with chains of gold, we can scarcely forbear exclaiming, "Really, ladies, this is too much, to attack us, at once, with the united attractions of gold and beauty!"

DOMESTIC MANUFACTURES.

THE more any country manufactures for itself, the more it becomes truly independent of all others, and of course, free from the influence of foreign events, either of war or peace. This is an axiom too self-evident to need a syllogism to prove it. But to accomplish this great national object, requires public patronage, as well as individual exertion and enterprise. A nation in which both these qualities are united, will soon be able not only to supply its own wants, but will have a superfluity to spare for others.

Of all the articles of domestic manufacture, and general consumption, none perhaps offers more facility for its triumphant establishment than Book-Printing, and the other collateral arts, as the Engravers, Type-Founders, Paper-Makers and Book Binders, which all depend on it for their existence. These several trades, if completely established, would employ many thousand hands, and retain some millions of money in our country, which we have been accustomed to send abroad for annual supplies; and if the American presses were more occupied with works of acknowledged excellence and utility, instead of immoral and frivolous novels, which constitute too great a part of young ladies' libraries, they would contribute to polish, and moralize the rising generation, and to stem the torrent of idleness, dissipation, and extravagance, which have so dreadfully affected every class of society.

The experience of several years has evinced, that we can print books, as cheap as we can import them, of all the common editions. And, although some that have been published, have been deficient in correctness and elegance of execution, there is nothing wanting but adequate encouragement, to remove this complaint, and to enable American artists to rival foreigners, in both these respects. As soon as the public, banishing prejudice, is willing to pay as much for a Philadelphia, as for a London edition of the same book, the execution will be equal; those works only excepted, that are embellished with the most expensive engravings, and which are calculated only for curious men, of princely fortunes.

Pennsylvania has many advantages over all her sister states, for perfecting this establishment.... Her central situation, which enables her to supply the north and south with facility; her numerous paper mills, of which she contains more than all the other states taken together; her type foundry, an art which she possesses exclusively; her numerous printing-offices; her many ingenious artists, in all the branches concerned; and the character she has justly obtained, of executing some of the best printed work, which has been done in the United States:....all these circumstances taken together, form an important aggregate, and may enable her, before any other state, not only to establish the fame of Philadelphia editions of books, but to render them an object of national interest and benefit. And, when we advert to the great inconveniences the metropolis labours under, from the interruption of navigation during the winter months, and the growing competition of New-York and Baltimore, in her foreign and domestic commerce, it will be thought necessary to improve the advantages we possess to the utmost.

It is with real pleasure, therefore, that we embrace every opportunity of giving publicity to proposals for printing American editions of foreign literature; but more especially when the article proposed is of considerable magnitude, as well as genuine merit; and when we have reason to expect, from the character of the editor, considerable neatness and correctness in the execution. Such, among others which we have had occasion recently to announce in the columns of this paper, is the proposed Edition of the Select British Classics. The works of Addison, Johnson, Goldsmith, and other celebrated essayists, will last as long as the purity of the English language, and are far above our praise, both as to matter and style. The papers of the Rambler, Spectator, &c. are equally adapted to entertain by a display of genuine attic wit, as to instruct and reform, by their religious and moral doctrines, conveyed in the most agreeable and persuasive manner. Parts of these works are in most public and private libraries, but an uniform collection of the whole is but in few hands. The price of a complete set of the London edition, has been greater than many people could spare, and more than others have chosen to expend, at one time, on books. Such persons will now have an opportunity to supply themselves with the whole of those invaluable essays, at a reduced price, to be paid in small sums, which they hardly miss, and at the same time enjoy the gratification of reflecting, that they are promoting the manufactures and real independence of their country.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF MIGUEL CERVANTES DE SAAVEDRA.

MIGUEL CERVANTES DE SAAVEDRA, the most celebrated literary character of modern Spain, was born about the year 1549. Neither he himself, nor any authentic biographer, has mentioned the place of his nativity; so that different parts of Spain have laid claim to that honour, with as much zeal of contention as the different places which of old were claimants for the cradle of Homer. The province of Andalusia seems on the whole to possess the best title. His descent is by himself said to have been honourable; and his writings prove that his education must have been liberal; but his own total silence as to the manner in which he passed his youth, and the circumstance of his serving as a common volunteer in the army of Mark Antony Colonna, seem to prove that he had no other patrimony than his sword and learning. When his military service commenced is doubtful; it is certain, however, that embarking with the troops under Colonna, on board the fleet commanded by Don John of Austria, he was present at the famous battle of Lepanto in 1571, where he had the misfortune to lose his left hand by a shot. Either in this expedition, or in his service as chamberlain to cardinal Aquaviva at Rome, he obtained a certain share of wealth; for in his captivity at Algiers during five years and a half, which commenced in 1574, when he was taken by a Barbary corsair, he appears to have been well furnished with money, which he liberally bestowed among his fellow-captives. Several romantic circumstances, but of dubious authority, are recorded of him whilst a slave at Algiers. A large price was paid for his ransom, which together with his subsequent expense of living, probably in the free style of a soldier, entirely exhausted his store. He had already established a reputation for poetical talents in his country, which was much augmented by the publication in 1584 of his "Galatea," a poem in six books, dedicated to Ascanio Colonna. He likewise, either before or after his captivity, or in both periods, composed various pieces for the Spanish theatre, which was then nearly in a state of barbarism, and of which, in its more regular form, he is reckoned one of the fathers. A course of years little accounted for, now elapsed in the life of Cervantes, of the incidents of which scarcely any thing is known; but that he married, was reduced to great distress, and finally was lodged in a jail for debt. In this forlorn situation he composed the work which has conferred immortal honour on his name—his "Don Quixote." As to the serious purpose of it, various opinions have been given, probably with more fancy and subtlety than truth. Perhaps he had nothing further in view than to write a diverting and instructive satire of the extravagant tales, which, under the title of romances, over-ran the age, and prejudiced the taste, at least, if not the manners, of his country. That any thing like practical knight-errantry was the foible of his countrymen at that time, is a supposition not warranted by the state of society; and a soldier and patriot could not wish to quell the gallant spirit of martial enterprise. But books of chivalry, with their monstrous fictions and affected sentiments, were fair game for a man of wit and sense; nor could they be more agreeably ridiculed, than by displaying their effects on the imagination of a madman, resolved to put their lessons into practice. The first part of this work was printed at Madrid in 1605, and its success was prodigious. It was read by all ages and ranks; its fame spread into foreign countries, and editions and translations of it were multiplied. It seems to have had its full effect in correcting the public taste, and putting a stop to the fabrication of romances. That it also lowered the adventurous spirit of the Spanish nation, and laid the foundation of the timid indolence under which it has since languished, is probably an overstrained conclusion. With respect to the author, it appears to have been the means of liberating him from prison, and obtaining him a degree of patronage from the great; but the court and kingdom of Spain have by no act of solid bounty freed themselves from the disgrace of suffering their greatest genius to sink under the depression of habitual indigence. In 1613 Cervantes published his "Novels," which are agreeable specimens of that kind of writing, and became popular. They are of a similar character with some introduced into the adventures of Don Quixote, and display his inventive and descriptive talents in serious story, as the other had done in burlesque. Indeed, Cervantes, though he chose to make the fictions of chivalry the object of his ridicule, had much of the romantic in his own composition; and in the points of love and heroism was a true Spaniard, though he discarded the follies of enchantment and supernatural agency. While preparing for the press a second part of his Don Quixote, he underwent the mortification of being anticipated by an Arragonian writer of mean genius, under the name of Alonzo Fernandez de Avellaneda; who not only debased the original by a very insipid and absurd application of its plan and characters, but loaded the author with much personal abuse. Cervantes, however, reclaimed his right, by publishing, in 1615, a true second part, which sufficiently proved that the author of the first was alone capable of an adequate continuation, and which was received with avidity by all who had been interested in the genuine Don Quixote. About this time he also published a poem entitled "A Voyage to Parnassus," which was an ironical satire upon the Spanish poetry of his time, and upon the bad taste of patrons. This was more likely to increase the number of his enemies, than to acquire him any substantial favours from the great. Accordingly, such was his poverty at this period, that he was obliged to sell eight plays and as many interludes to a bookseller, for want of means to print them on his own account. The indifferent terms he was upon with the actors prevented his bringing them on the stage; and indeed the rising reputation of Lope de la Vega had eclipsed that of Cervantes as a dramatic writer. His last work was a novel, entitled, "The Troubles of Persiles and Sigismunda," which he did not live to print. In his preface, that humour, which had illuminated the pages of his Don Quixote, still flashes out, and dispels the gloom of poverty and sickness. He relates an adventure which befel him on a journey on horseback to Toledo, when a scholar, who had joined the company, being informed who he was, leaps from his ass in a rapture, pays him high compliments, and in the course of conversation recommends to him a regimen for the dropsy under which he laboured. Cervantes, however, excuses himself from complying with his advice. "My life," says he, "is drawing to a period, and by the daily journal of my pulse, which I find will have finished its course by next Sunday at farthest, I shall also have finished my career: so that you are come in the very nick of time to be acquainted with me." An affectionate dedication of this work to his best patron, the count de Lemos, is dated April 19, 1617; and as he mentions in it that he had already received extreme unction, it is probable that a day or two more finished the scene. A licence was granted in the September following to the widow of Cervantes to print this novel for her own benefit; and it was probably the only property this literary glory of his country had to leave.

To enter into a discussion of the character and merits of such an original and unrivalled performance as "Don Quixote," would carry us beyond the limits assigned to the present biographical sketch. Perhaps a critic of the present day would not discover in it all those marks of a transcendent genius which it has been supposed to possess; but a work which has not only become a classic throughout all Europe, but which has in a manner obliterated the name of all the other literature of its country, and which has enriched every modern language with words and phrases to express new ideas, cannot but rank with the capital productions of the human invention. It would be an endless task to enumerate all the editions of the original, or versions of it, in different countries. They still occasionally appear, decorated with all the art of the engraver and typographer. The other works of the author meet with few readers out of Spain. His "Novels" have indeed been considerable favourites, but are superseded by more modern productions. His poems and plays are exclusively accommodated to the taste of his country; nor do they seem there to have ranked among master-pieces.

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

NO. VIII.

RESUMING the subject of our last paper we proceed to trace still farther, the consequences that must result from a too unqualified admission of foreigners, to an equal participation in our civil and political rights.

The safety of a republic depends essentially on the energy of a common national sentiment; on a uniformity of principles and habits; on the exemption of the citizens from foreign bias, and prejudice; and on that love of country which will almost invariably be found to be closely connected with birth, education and family.

The opinion advanced in the Notes on Virginia is undoubtedly correct, that foreigners will generally be apt to bring with them attachments to the persons they have left behind; to the country of their nativity, and to its particular customs and manners. They will also entertain opinions on government congenial with those under which they have lived, or if they should be led hither from a preference to ours, how extremely unlikely is it that they will bring with them that temperate love of liberty, so essential to real republicanism? There may as to particular individuals, and at particular times, be occasional exceptions to these remarks, yet such is the general rule. The influx of foreigners must, therefore, tend to produce a heterogeneous compound; to change and corrupt the national spirit; to complicate and confound public opinion; to introduce foreign propensities. In the composition of society, the harmony of the ingredients is all-important, and whatever tends to a discordant intermixture must have an injurious tendency.

The United States have already felt the evils of incorporating a large number of foreigners, into their national mass; it has served very much to divide the community and to distract our councils, by promoting in different classes, different predilections in favour of particular foreign nations, and antipathies against others. It has been often likely to compromise the interests of our own country in favour of another. In times of great public danger there is always a numerous body of men, of whom there may be just grounds of distrust; the suspicion alone weakens the strength of the nation, but their force may be actually employed in assisting an invader.

In the infancy of the country, with a boundless waste to people, it was politic to give a facility to naturalization; but our situation is now changed. It appears from the last census, that we have increased about one third in ten years; after allowing for what we have gained from abroad, it will be quite apparent that the natural progress of our own population is sufficiently rapid for strength, security and settlement. By what has been said, it is not meant to contend for a total prohibition of the right of citizenship to strangers, nor even for the very long residence which is now a prerequisite to naturalization, and which of itself, goes far towards a denial of that privilege. The present law was merely a temporary measure adopted under peculiar circumstances and perhaps demands revision. But there is a wide difference between closing the door altogether and throwing it entirely open; between a postponement of fourteen years, and an immediate admission to all the rights of citizenship. Some reasonable term ought to be allowed to enable aliens to get rid of foreign and acquire American attachments; to learn the principles and imbibe the spirit of our government; and to admit of at least a probability of their feeling a real interest in our affairs. A residence of at least five years ought to be required.

If the rights of Naturalization may be communicated by parts, and it is not perceived why they may not, those peculiar to the conducting of business and the acquisition of property, might with propriety be at once conferred, upon receiving proof, by certain prescribed solemnities, of their intention to become citizens; postponing all political privileges to the ultimate term. To admit foreigners indiscriminately to the rights of citizens, the moment they put foot in our country, as recommended in the Message, would be nothing less, than to admit the Grecian Horse into the Citadel of our Liberty and Sovereignty.

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

[It has already been stated, in the Port Folio, that the majority in our national legislature are in the habit of sullen silence, whenever they are pressed by the arguments of their opponents. In a recent debate, a gentleman from Connecticut, noted for the brilliancy of his wit, the severity of his satire, and the force of his reason, ridiculed his num cbance adversaries, in the following happy manner.]

MR. DANA'S SPEECH.

I BEG liberty to tender the homage of my profound respects, for the dignified situation in which gentlemen have now placed themselves, and congratulate them on their silence. There is something peculiarly impressive in this mode of opposing every thing that is urged. It is seldom that gentlemen have exhibited such a remarkable appearance of a philosophical assembly.

That dumb legislature will immortalize your name, is said to have been the language of a certain distinguished general, to a certain nominal abbe, who has been represented as having pigeon-holes full of constitutions, of his own making.

During the memorable night, at St. Cloud, when the French council of ancients and council of five hundred were adjourned....to meet no more....it may be recollected, the powers of executive government were provisionally committed to three persons, stiled consuls, and two of them were the general and the abbe. From each of the councils, twenty-five members were selected, to compose a commission, and assist the provisional consuls in preparing a constitution for France. Of the numerous projets of constitutions, which were presented by the abbe, it is said no part was finally adopted, except the plan of a dumb legislature.... This the general instantly seized, with apparent enthusiasm, exclaiming to the abbe, that dumb legislature will immortalize your name. And it was determined to have a corps legislatif that should vote, but not debate.

It was scarcely to be expected, that any thing like this would soon take place in our own country. But it is the prerogative of great geniuses, when in similar circumstances, to arrive at the same great results, although with some difference in the process. Nor can I forbear offering my tribute of admiration for the genius who has projected a mode of proceeding among us, that so nearly rivals the plan adopted in France. I know not to whom is due the honour of this luminous discovery. After ascribing to him, however, all merited glory, permit me to examine the force of the argument relied on by gentlemen, in opposition to the proposed resolution.

Their argument is silence. I hope to be excused, if I should not discuss the subject in the most satisfactory manner. As silence is a new species of logic, about which no directions have been found, in any treatise on logic, that I have ever seen, it will be my endeavour to reply to gentlemen, by examining some points, which may be considered as involved in their dumb argument.

One of these points is—that certain members of this House have pledged themselves, to their constituents, for repealing all the internal taxes. They may have declared their opinions to this effect, before their election; and, being chosen under such circumstances, may now deem themselves bound in honour not to vary. The terms assented to between their constituents and themselves may therefore be viewed, by them as the particular rule for their own conduct. But is this House to be regarded in the same light with the English House of Commons, during the early period of their history, when the knights of shires and the representatives from cities and boroughs were instructed on what terms they should bargain, with the crown, for special privileges, and were limited to the price agreed on by their constituents? The situation of gentlemen, who have thus pledged themselves to vote for repealing the internal taxes, must be irksome indeed, if on mature consideration they should believe it more proper and more beneficial for the country to have other taxes reduced. Those who have entered into a stipulation of this sort, so as to feel it as a point of honour, are so peculiarly circumstanced, that they might think it too assuming in me, were I so much as to express a desire that they would vote for reducing some of the duties on imposts, instead of repealing all the internal taxes. It is to be hoped, the number of members, who have pledged themselves in this manner, does not exceed twenty-five or thirty.

Another point involved in this argument of silence is—that other gentlemen may have pledged themselves to these and given them a promise of support on this subject. It must be acknowledged that this is more than was required on account of their seats in this house. If any gentlemen have absolutely so pledged themselves to others who had before pledged themselves to their constituents it must be indeed difficult to convince them. On this point, their minds must be constituted so differently from mine, that there does not seem to be any common principle between us, that can be assumed as the basis of argumentation.

Another point is—The executive has recommended a repeal of all the internal taxes, and not any reduction of the impost. And will gentlemen act upon this as a sufficient reason for their conduct? Is it now to become a principle that the executive is to deliberate, and the legislature to act, and that no measure be adopted, unless proposed by the executive? Would it not be better for the country, to abolish this house, and so avoid useless expense, if it is to be nothing more than one of the ancient parliaments of France, employed to register the edicts of a master?

The silence of gentlemen may also be considered as having relation to their great desire for the harmony of social intercourse. To prevent its being disturbed in the house by debating they may have come to a determination, that all the great questions shall be settled by gentlemen of a certain description, when met in nocturnal conclave, and be only voted upon in this place. If such be the fact, it seems but reasonable, that any of the members of this house should be admitted, in meetings of the conclave, as delegates from the territorial districts are admitted in Congress, with a right to debate, although not to vote. If, however, this is thought too much, gentlemen should at least have galleries provided, so that other members of the legislature might be admitted as spectators, and have some opportunity of knowing the reasons for public measures.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THERE seems to be no end to the dashing confusion of local politics. Almost every day brings forth some fresh instance of the necessity for checks and balances, in order to keep the several departments of government within constitutional limits. Since the meeting of our state legislature, we have seen our governor returning a bill to the house of representatives (against the principles of which he was avowedly hostile, and which it was therefore his duty to have negatived), accompanied by "the homage of his high respect," and the humble assurance, that, out of pure deference for the opinion of the legislature, he suffered the bill to become a law. This was a voluntary surrender, on the part of the executive, of a constitutional right, the exercise of which, in some instances, may be salutary, and, without which, the legislature would very soon become omnipotent. To whom, then, shall blame attach, if fresh encroachments, by the legislative branch, should grow out of this pusillanimous condescension, on the part of the executive?

We have seen transactions of a more recent date, which indicate distrust and jealousy, between more than two branches of our government. The judges of the supreme court, after solemn argument, upon the constitutionality of Mr. Dallas's appointment to the office of recorder, decided, upon due deliberation, that the holding of the office was not incompatible with the appointment he already held, under the national government; and that gentleman accordingly takes his seat on the bench at the mayor's court. Either this was an unconstitutional decision, or the bill just past in the legislature, "declaring the holding of offices or appointments under this state, incompatible with the holding or exercising offices or appointments under the United States," is unconstitutional. The governor is of the same opinion with "his former brethren of the supreme court," and, therefore, returns the bill to the legislature, with his veto, and his reasons for exercising this constitutional prerogative. It is worthy of remark, that the only support which the governor's opinion receives, on this occasion, is drawn from the same source, on which the federal party in congress have relied, to save the judiciary system from destruction. "The legislature," says the governor, "cannot vacate or impair a contract, solemnly made, between the commonwealth and an individual. Having even the power will not sanction it."

Upon the question, which was argued, at the instance of the city council, before the judges of the supreme court, viz. Whether the office of recorder was a judicial office, and therefore incompatible with any other office of trust or profit, under the national government; there were very few dissenting opinions among the gentlemen of the bar. By many other than professional men, this decision of our supreme court bench has been deemed an act of condescension, on the part of the governor's "former brethren," bordering on servility. If there be any spirit of independence left on the bench, the bill, which the governor has refused to sanction, would be pronounced unconstitutional, even should it receive the approbation of two thirds of the legislature, and pass into a law. This for consistency's sake, should be the course of things; but, in such an event, what have not the judges to apprehend, from the wrath of an infuriated legislature, should they dare to exercise their right?..... The ark of safety has been assailed by desperate hands, for this very reason, at the capitol, and, from the same "providential and most fortunate representation in the legislative" branches of our state government, we may anticipate the same happy consequences.

The governor is very much surprised, that there should be a want of confidence in him, or in the chief magistrate of the Union, forgetting that he, like other men, is liable to error. Indeed, it is sufficiently evident, that a favourite measure would have been thwarted by the law, which was sent to his excellency for signature; and though, in my opinion, the legislature had no right to pass a law, which, in its operation, must have been retrospective and ex post facto, yet, as to all future cases of double appointments, the law would have been highly proper and useful.

The governor of this commonwealth was bred to the bar; he is acknowledged to be a good lawyer; and, except those cases where his private feeling and passions may warp his judgment, he is entitled to consideration and respect. Perhaps, by ardent and intemperate minds, such an avowal may be looked on with disgust; but it is a singular phenomenon in politics, when a democratic governor of a powerful, populous and thriving state is seen, during the first period of his administration, arresting the headlong vandalism of a popular assembly, in their march towards arbitrary power.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following, from the New-York Evening Post, is one of the drollest descriptions of the absurdity of the trial by wager of battle, we have ever perused:

A TRIO OF DUELS.

Yesterday morning, an affair of honour was settled at Hoebuck, between Mr. Chandler, of Philadelphia, and Mr. Carlisle, of Albany. Three shots were exchanged, and the latter was wounded in the thigh.

A second was terminated at the same place, between two gentlemen. The particulars of this are variously related: we give the following as the most current, and we believe the most correct.... A challenge was given, about a fortnight since, and time and place appointed, but no weapons agreed. When the challenger came to the ground, he perceived his antagonist (who, it is said, was a Yankee) there before him, with two muskets..... This, the Yankee informed him, was his mode of fighting, offering him his choice of the guns; the other declined the musket, as not a gentleman's weapon. The Yankee remonstrated, that it was placing him on disadvantageous terms to use pistols, as he had never fired one in his life; but, if the meeting could be postponed for a fortnight, so that he might practice in the mean time, he was content to use pistols; or his adversary might take the same time to practice with the gun, and he would then meet him with that weapon: the first offer was acceded to, and the parties met yesterday accordingly. Three shots on each side were exchanged; the Yankee's second fire carried away the other's pocket-flap, but his third shot him through the fleshy part of the seat of honour itself; and here the affair ended.

The third duel took place in New-Jersey, about ten days since. The only particulars which have come to hand worth mentioning are, that there were several spectators, who accompanied the parties to the field, and all of whom, together with the two seconds, climbed the trees, to be out of harm's way, while they saw fair play. But, as one of the gentlemen chose to terminate the affair, by firing his pistol in the air, a thing unforeseen, the ball passed through the upper limbs of the very tree, where the second of his antagonist had taken his post, and who was so much alarmed at the whistling of the bullet, that he fell, and broke his collar bone, which was the only accident attending the exhibition. Happily no lives were lost.

An editor, of sound judgment, good taste, and "long views," has pronounced the following well deserved compliment, on the second speech of Governor Morris:....

If any subject can be interesting to the real patriot, it is that which has given this second occasion to so splendid a display of this gentleman's talents. What American can read it, without a glow of proud sensibility, and without being impressed with a just conviction of its impregnable soundness?

A New-York merchant advertises the following heterogeneous articles: "Sugar, Whale Oil, and Muslins!"

Whether the writer of this article listens to the boasts of the jacobins, or the bodings of the federalists, he hears but one tone, respecting the designs of the present majority. It is determined, by the democrats, to annul every trace of former measures, and, in the true spirit of reformers and revolutionists, to make clear work, and institute a government de novo. Men, of late, have been so often exhorted, in vain, to rouse, that all political exhortation appears to be "utterly contemned." Yet, when we reflect on the strength, the unanimity, and the audacity of jacobinism, it will be of some service to meditate on the following sentiments of a great orator and statesman, who well understood the baleful character of democracy, and who never thought of opposing it with "a dagger of lath:—"

If we meet this portentous energy, that is always vigilant, always on the attack, that allows itself no repose, and suffers none to rest an hour, with impunity; if we meet this energy, with poor, common place proceeding, with trivial maxims, paltry old laws, with doubts, fears, and suspicions; with a languid, uncertain hesitation, with a formal, official spirit, which is turned aside by every obstacle from its purpose, and which never sees a difficulty, but to yield to it, or at best to evade it; down we go to the bottom of the abyss, and nothing short of Omnipotence can save us. We must meet a vicious and distempered energy, with a manly and rational vigour. Adventure, and not caution is our policy. Other times, perhaps, other measures; but, in this hour, our politics ought to be made up of nothing, but courage, decision, manliness, and rectitude.

A correspondent, who adverts to the dumb Policy, lately adopted by the democrats in Congress, thinks that this silent game ought to be denominated political whist.

When Hopkins, the Drury-lane Prompter, once recommended a man to be engaged as a mechanist in preparing the scenery of a new pantomime, Garrick made the following objections to employing him; "This man will never answer the purposes of the theatre. In the first place, he cannot make a moon. I would not give him three pence a dozen for all the moons he shewed me to day. His suns are, if possible, worse; besides I gave him directions about the clouds, and such heavy clouds were never seen since the flood. Desire the carpenter to knock the rainbow to pieces, and roll up the blue sky for we cannot hang it up in our firmament."

A Spanish Poet, celebrating the black eyes of his mistress, declares in the quaint style of his age, that they were "in mourning, for the murders they had committed."

Caleb Whitford of punning notoriety once observing a young lady earnestly at work, knotting fringe for a petticoat, asked her what she was doing? "Knotting fringe, sir," replied she, "pray Mr. Whitford can you knot?" "I can-not, Madam," answered he.

When lady Wallace was once in company with a large party, and the conversation turned upon the time at which the canon law of Paphos forbids a female to tell her own age, she applied to a country gentleman, who had sat, without speaking for some time, with a "pray, Mr. Justice Silence, when I am asked what is my age, what answer shall I give?" "Say, Madam," replied he, "what I believe will be the truth, that you are not yet come to the years of discretion."

A great concourse of gentlemen and some ladies assembled lately at the Riding School in Calcutta, to enjoy the baiting a Leopard—wild bears, horses, a buffalo, &c. having been provided for the purpose. The spectators were separated from the performers on this occasion by a bamboo railing of considerable height; and the gallery and every place from which the proposed exhibition could be seen was crowded. The first thing to which the Leopard was introduced was an artificial human figure, which the animal attacked and tore with great ferocity, thereby giving his spectators a very tolerable idea of what they were to expect, were but the barriers that protected them either removed or overcome. A wild hog was next ushered in; but the Leopard rather avoided this animal, which also, upon its part, shewed no disposition to hostilities. Every possible expedient was then used by the gentlemen in the exterior of the gallery to provoke the Leopard to battle. He was teased with squibs and crackers, and fretted with every kind of annoyance; until at length irritated to the highest pitch of exasperation against his tormentors, he made a spring, by which to the terror and astonishment of all present, he reached the top of the lofty railing, which divided the house, and would in another second have been down among the thickest of the crowd, had not Mr. De Letang (the master of the Riding School) fortunately had a loaded gun by him, and at the critical instant fired at the animal, who received the ball between the breast and shoulder, and immediately fell over into his inclosure. The consternation which prevailed among the ladies and gentlemen present on this alarming occasion, cannot be described: etiquette respecting the exact order in which the company were to retire, was wholly disregarded, and the whole withdrew in the utmost terror and confusion.

The some time Editor of the Aurora, writes from Washington under date of January 25—"The debate about nothing, which occupied the "time of the house, the whole of Friday last, was renewed this day." This may be very correct Irish, and so far as we have any knowledge of that dialect, we believe it is; but it is difficult for an American, who does not speak the Irish tongue, to comprehend the force of the phrase.

A correspondent of Mr. Colman, the respectable Editor of the New-York Evening Post, one of the ablest supports of the Federal system; thus characterizes those invaluable essays, which of late have had so just a claim to a liberal place in the Port Folio—"A writer in the New-York Evening Post, under the signature of LUCIUS CRASSUS, has written a number of essays, entitled, THE EXAMINATION. These essays, are evidently the production of a master in the science of politics; for strength of reasoning, for extensive information and profound research, they are equal to any thing which the interesting state of our public affairs has called forth; they are written in a spirit of candour, and with a felicity of language that must render them peculiarly valuable to your respectable subscribers, who duly estimate every attempt to engage their understandings in the support of sound and just principles. The views of the administration are stripped of their disguise and portrayed in their native features of deformity. Under the mask of uncommon ardour for the rights of the people, the present system is proved to cover the most dangerous attempt to interest their passions, to prostrate the dignity and independence of the General Government, and to fritter away all those salutary provisions contained in the Constitution of the United States, against the ambition, increasing strength and influence of Virginia, Pennsylvania, and New-York."

It is usual for the venders of portable articles, to praise their goods, by giving them the appellation of fine—as fine oysters—fine clams, &c. We were diverted the other day, by hearing a man in the street, cry out, fine, coarse salt.

The civil and ecclesiastical constitution of Great-Britain, so long the envy and admiration of the world, is about to be published by authority, with all its variations, as settled at the union with Ireland.

The ground work of the little poem, entitled the Hermit, by Dr. Parnell, like the subject of many others, did not originate in the fancy of that poet. If the reader will take the trouble to consult the letters of James Howell, Esq. an Englishman, who wrote nearly two centuries since, he will find the story which this moral poem illustrates, together with the addition of some less interesting scenes attributed to Sir P. Hubert, in his "Conceptions to his son."

[Farmer's Museum.]

A marriage of a singular nature happened at North-chapel Church in Sussex, on Sunday se'n-night. The young man who was to be married to the happy young woman, was placed by the direction of the parish clerk, in a pew at the left hand of the woman, who, as the Minister thought, was to be the person to present her to the bridegroom; the other man who stood at her right hand, answering the questions regularly, even to, I will, and the damsel also repeated I will.—The ceremony went on so far as producing the ring, when, time enough to discover the mistake, a by-stander said to the Minister, who was a stranger to the parties, "Sir, you are wrong; the other man who is the giver away, is the very person whom you published in the church the three last Sundays, and he is the person that is to be married to this woman;" upon which the Clergyman put the question to the new placed parties, and the Lady as willingly answering as she before had done, she was united to her intended—Quere—if the marriage had been consummated with the Father (an unmarried man) before the mistake was discovered, would it have stood good in the eye of the law? [London Paper.]

The Editors of the New-York Gazette, in offering their Compliments this morning to their Patrons and Friends, exhibit truly "Thoughts that breathe and words that burn." As an example of the fervid style in which their Address is couched, and for the encouragement of those Federal Editors who are embarked in the same cause, we select the following specimens.

"They have, through another year, amidst the rage of opponents, conducted the labours of their press. In the same principles which they formerly avowed and maintained, they are determined still to persevere, unawed by the frown, unseduced by the allurements of Jacobinical success.—They shall shrink from no storm which it is their duty to brave—they shall court no sunshine in which it is criminal to bask. They who have thought with Washington, will not now disgrace themselves and country, by acting with a dwarfish and calumniating administration, who are like an insect crawling in the shadow of a giant, and pointing against him its envenomed but impotent sting."

As a proof that the sun of Federalism is not so completely set as to leave us without hope of its emerging from the sombre cloud which has so long overshadowed it, they add, "We rejoice, that correctness in opinions is still held by a large portion of our fellow-citizens, and, that the time cannot be far distant, when artifice, falsehood, and disguise shall be detected by the light of Truth; when Cataline shall be dragged from his midnight haunt, and all his machinations exposed; when Ciceronian eloquence shall triumph over sophistical babblings; and when Camillus shall be called from his exile, to guide the Councils of his country. We may give to imagination that period when the great body of the people shall lend their ears to knowledge, and not to the insinuations of subtle demagogues—When they shall arouse themselves as a strong Lion, and put to flight those giddy Huntsmen, who have been playing with the tangles of his mane."

At length we witness the following philanthropic burst: "Inhabitants of Europe—Mussulmen of Egypt—Children of Mahomet—We congratulate you on the return of peace :—And while, on this day, devoted to the Salutations of Friendship and Civility, we offer to our patrons the gratitude which we feel, we, at the same time, extend to you our warmest wishes for your happiness."

In ruminating on what may be the consequence of the death of Buonaparte, the following animated description presents itself:—"France has long been the scaffold of the world, and the birth-place of conspiracy—she has nursed on her lap daring spirits, who delight in blood—ambitious soldiers, whose only aim is power.—Should, therefore, some new Conspiracy be formed, and the Man of the Age, the adventurous Corsican, fall, the hell-hounds of faction, which were bound to his Consular Chair, would be again let loose to howl, to destroy, and to lap the blood of their victims."

A parcel of mechanicks ; together with a plentiful crop of publicans, have had a meeting at the house of James Kerr in Dock-street, for the purpose of taking into consideration, the judiciary system of the United States. If this meeting had taken it into their heads to suggest the propriety of memorializing Congress, on the subject of repealing the law, laying duties on stills and distilled spirits, we should have thought them occupied with something within the reach of their capacities, and certainly more adapted to their taste ; one good effect has nevertheless resulted from this assemblage ; it has discovered to the gentlemen of the bar ; who and which of their fraternity, may be trusted, and who may not. Fortunately, and it ought to be honourably mentioned, there were but two practicing attorneys, found to associate themselves with the vulgar herd ; the worthier of the profession, amounting to between 70 and 80 persons, adhered to their brethren and generally signed the memorial of the Bar of Philadelphia on the subject of the projected repeal of the judiciary system.

The Editor of the Gazette of the United States gives us, in the following article, a humorous specimen of his skill in democratic heraldry.

The Aurora publishes the apportionment law by authority. It is headed with the new arms of the United States, viz. two tobacco plants, with their roots crosswise, form a semi-circle : in the centre of them is placed a heart, hung round with onions ; in the heart is the representation of an eagle soaring, grasping in the dexter claw a bundle of Irish shillelaghs, and in her sinister, a potatoe blossom, emblematical, it is presumed, of the mouth of labour ; and in her beak, a label, whereon is written, e pluribus unum, i. e. — we'll eat up the Union !

The following is a fact. In the lower part of this city, an Irishman rented a house, that had immediately before been occupied by a company of the frail sisterhood ; and wisely thinking that his house would lose its reputation, by being mistaken for a brothel, he placed up at his door, the following curious sign.—

" New rules, and new regulations,
" The case is now altered.
" Beef stake and oyster house."

ORIGINAL POETRY. FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A BALLAD.

1

ASSIST me to sing, lovely muse,
Let the fountains of Helicon flow ;
Bright Phœbus ! thy spirit infuse,
And Venus ! thy favour bestow.
And thou, to whose beauties I bend
Thy influence deign to impart,
Nor blame, if you cannot commend
A carol, that flows from the heart.

2

I sing not the juice of the vine,
Its charms are all transient and vain ;
By the pitiless frenzy of wine
Eurydice's lover was slain.
I sing not the pleasures of wealth,
The mines of Peru I despise,
Of the Gods I ask nothing but health,
And a smile from my Phyllida's eyes.

3

Much less can the terrors of war,
A tribute from poetry claim ;

The tropics of Mars I abhor,
And regard not the bubble of fame.
What pleasures the grape can afford,
Let the children of Bacchus enjoy ;
Let the miser brood over his hoard,
And the warrior delight to destroy.

But love, gentle love is my theme,
As pure as the heart of my fair ;
Mid the darkness of life, 'tis a gleam,
To illumine the bosom of care.
—Yet, even the pleasures of love,
Untemper'd are never possess'd,—
And who, but the angels above,
With perfect enjoyments are bless'd ?

5

Else, why at my Phyllida's sight,
Does my heart with solicitude beat ?
Can the voice of extatic delight
The accents of terror repeat ?
And why, when she smiles on my friend
Does my bosom unwillingly heave ?
Can gentleness ever offend ?
Or my Phyllida learn to deceive ?

6

Yet, even sensations like these,
The breast of a lover can charm,
Though painful, they cannot but please ;
They wound, but they furnish the balm.
And if love can allay our distress,
And sweeten the cup of our woes ;
Oh ! why should we strive to suppress,
The sigh from which happiness flows.

7

When my Phyllida joins in the dance,
Her beauty, her grace they commend ;
With delight I behold her advance,
Yet to beauty I little attend.
Should the goddess of Paphos appear,
She might spread her attractions in vain,
And the graces themselves, were they here,
I could view, without pleasure or pain.

8

When she touches the strings of the lyre,
Another may call it divine ;
But the heart that can only admire,
Knows nought of the feelings of mine.
Her voice is as sweet to my ear
As the accents of merited praise—
I have heard other voices as clear,
But she adds a new charm to the lays.

9

How lately the rose was display'd !
How lately the lily was fair !
In verdure the groves were array'd,
And the zephyrs embalsam'd the air.
The voice of the songsters of spring,
Has tun'd to the accents of love,
And the muse, who inspir'd me to sing,
But echoed the notes of the grove.

10

From the rose all her colours are fled,
In crimson the forests are dress'd,
And the lily, how drooping her head,
By the zephyrs no longer caress'd.
The vallies no longer resound
With the notes of the warblers of May ;
Yet no change in my breast can be found,
And still gentle love is my lay.

ODE TO WINTER.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ. AUTHOR OF THE PLEASURES OF HOPE.

WHEN first the fiery mantled SUN
His heav'nly race began to run,

Round the Earth and Ocean blue
His Children four (the Seasons) flew :
First, in green apparel dancing,
Smil'd the SPRING with angel face ;
Rosy SUMMER next advancing
Rush'd into her Sire's embrace—
Her bright-hair'd Sire, who bade her keep
For ever nearest to his smiles—
On CALPE's olive-shaded steep,
Or India's citron-cover'd Isles,
More remote and buxom brown
The QUEEN of VINTAGE bow'd before his throne :
A rich Pomegranate gemm'd her crown,
A ripe Sheaf bound her zone.

But howling WINTER fled afar
To hills that prop the Polar Star,
And loves on Deer-born Car to ride
With barren DARKNESS by his side,
Round the shore where loud Losoden
Whirls to death the roaring Whale,
Round the hall where Runic Oden
Howls his war song to the Gale ;
Save when down the ravag'd globe
He travels on his native Storm,
Deflow'ring Nature's grassy robe,
And trampling on her faded form ;
'Till Light's returning Lord assume
The shaft that drives him to his Northern field,
Of power to pierce his raven plume
And chrystal-cover'd shield !

O Sire of Storms, whose savage ear
The Lapland Drum delights to hear,
When FÆRNY with her blood-shot eye
Implores thy dreadful Deity—
Archangel Power of Dessolation,
Fast descending as thou art,
Say, hath Mortal Invocation
Spells to touch thy stony heart ?
Then, sullen WINTER, hear my pray'r,
And gently rule the ruin'd Year ;
Nor chill the Wand'rers' bosom bare,
Nor freeze the Wretch's falling tear ;
To shivering Want's unmantled bed
Thy horror-breathing agues cease to lend,
And mildly on the Orphan head
Of INNOCENCE descend !

But chiefly spare, O KING of CLOUDS,
The Sailor on his airy shrouds—
When Wrecks and Beacons strew the Steep,
And Spectres walk along the Deep ;
Milder yet the snowy breezes
Breathe on yonder tented shores,
Where the Rhine's bright billow freezes,
Where the dark-brown Danube roars !
Oh, Winds of Winter, list ye there
To many a deep and dying groan ?
Or start ye, Demons of the Midnight Air,
At shrieks and thunders louder than your own ?
Alas, e'en your unhallow'd breath
May spare the Victim fallen low :
But Man will ask no truce to Death—
No honour to Human Woe !

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. VI.

THE attention of my brother Loungers is particularly requested to the following letter. I am inclined to think that my correspondent means to quiz us all in a grand style. Allowance must be made for the severity, with which the aged are frequently disposed to contemplate "things as they are;" and this paper will then be acknowledged to contain some truths conveyed in a manner, which, whatever may be thought of its politeness, will at least be confest to be plain and direct.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

I am a constant reader of the Port-Folio, and there is no part of it that I peruse with more pleasure, or more attention, than the essays of the American Lounger. After this assurance will you be pleased to admit a few remarks, which are opposed to the general deduction in your last number? Will you excuse one, who acknowledges himself advanced into the vale of years, for questioning the justice of the conclusion that the present generation is universally improved?

In your paper, sir, you omit noticing the more solid improvement of the present age in Literature and Philosophy; and confine your attention to our progress in the decencies of life; in the elegance and refinement of our amusements. Though an old man, I am as little disposed as yourself to question the real advances that have been made in the departments first mentioned. I can admit also, that we are improved in some of the minor morals: but, in others, I must contend that we have undergone a great and striking degeneracy.

The subject, sir, to which I particularly allude, is that sordid and stoical apathy, which seems to me the characteristic of too many of the present generation of young men. Insensibility is, apparently, the fashion of the day; and, unless I am greatly mistaken, the general prevalence of such a spirit, far over balances any little advances that may have been made in some other particulars of grace and decorum.

Whence this spirit has originated, it is difficult to say. I well remember, that many years ago, when I was at a public seminary in Europe, whether I had been sent for education, a tolerably numerous class of us, who were engaged in reading Horace, had given to us as a thesis that frequently quoted precept of the festive bard, "Nil admirari." I will neither terrify the young ladies, nor, I might perhaps add, the young gentlemen who peruse your lucubrations, by the unseemly appearance of two lines in a barbarous and unknown language. I shall content myself with presenting them with the translation of Mr. Creech, which exhibits, about as faithful a picture of the spirit and elegance of the Satires of Horace, as the version of Messrs. Sternhold and Hopkins does, of the grandeur and sublimity of the psalms of David. He has thus, to adopt the phrase upon his own title-page, done these lines into English,

"Not to admire is all the art I know,
"To make men happy and to keep them so."

In treating this subject, the greater part of us contented ourselves, with a grave paraphrase upon the precept of the bard, and descanted largely upon the evil of excessive admiration. Some few assumed a greater latitude, and made false and malicious applications of the doctrine contained in it; while others openly attacked the position as unfounded. Did the young gentlemen of our days read Horace, I would be apprehensive that the absurdity of which I complain, was caused by too literal an adherence to the maxim that I have quoted. But as few, I may almost say none, of them, have ever troubled their heads about the writings of an old fellow who lived, Heaven knows how many centuries ago, their conduct must be referred to other causes. It is, perhaps with more probability, attributed to an absurd imitation of the leading characters in some modern novels. The supposition derives strength when it is recollected that these are the only volumes with which they are much conversant. One, in particular has been pointed out, (which, as it was written by the authoress of Evelina and Cecilia, I have myself perused,) as containing the archetype of these frigid characters. I mean Sir Sedley Clarendel, in Camilla. But I would implore his copyists to recollect, that Sir Sedley Clarendel is a man of real sense, spirit and information, although obscured by his insufferable affectation; and that the latter qualification without the former, will only entitle them to contempt. Were the assumption of the character confined to those who are equal to Sir Sedley Clarendel in mental endowments, our public places would not much be annoyed by his imitators.

But to whatever cause, this fashionable apathy be referable, its effects are equally to be deprecated. They are not visionary, they meet us in the intercourses of society at every turn. By your own account, Mr. Lounger, you are yourself, a little tainted with this foppery. Pardon the word, for I can scarcely imagine that the indifference so generally assumed by your brethren and contemporaries is really felt. I have frequently observed both at public and private parties, groupes of beauties so exquisite that even age could not behold them without emotion, either sitting down unengaged, or dancing with each other; while the young men, who, I should have thought, would have crowded assiduously round, to obtain a transient glance or an occasional smile, were engaged in another apartment, in the mysteries of Loo, or Vingt-un; or, if the evening were farther advanced, were muddling the small share of brain allotted to them by the vapours of wine, and the smoke of segars. If they have occasionally entered the dancing-room, to participate in two or three dances appears to overcome them entirely, and they sit down, as if fairly exhausted by the exertion. But Mr. Lounger can this be a real excuse? Are the young men of the present day so degenerate a race? In my time it was otherwise. Often have the smiles of an agreeable partner kept me upon my feet for many successive hours, and rendered me alike insensible to fatigue or to want of rest. Even now, although five weeks ago, I celebrated my fifty-ninth birth-day, I think that I could undertake to tire down some of these enervated old gentlemen of twenty.

But the display of this fashionable insensibility is not confined to the ball-room. It appears in the groups of saunterers at the Theatre, who disturb the attention of the audience by walking the lobby in creaking boots, and by talking aloud, during the performance of the finest productions of Genius. It appears in that languid eye, which looks at the stage with the same indifference as if bent on vacancy, which is never animated with pleasure, or moistened with sympathy. It appears in those hands which, unless occupied by a tooth-pick, are crossed on the bosom, or hang lifelessly by the side; and are never raised to encourage or to distinguish by applause, talents, however, brilliant. It appears in that proud contempt of those emotions which dignify our nature, evinced by a laugh, or a sudden whirl out of the box, in scenes where the attention of the feeling spectator is irresistibly arrested, and his judgment suspended between admiration of the poet and the performer.

Connected with this frigid insensibility, is the contempt which is, of late, so generally expressed for every thing, that appears united with sentiment and a consequent neglect of, or inattention to the lovely female. There may have existed, it is true, a cant of sentiment which was disgusting by its excess, but, in avoiding this, we have fallen into an opposite extreme. Our young men bid fair to become a cold hearted race, prematurely wise. We no longer behold the hectic flush of timid and apprehensive love; we no longer witness that tender respect for the fair, which was the "nurse of manly sentiment." The influence of the female character in softening and refining our manners is now but feebly felt. We seek, in vain for that courtesy which, without being effeminate or obtrusive, dictated those attentions to the fair which gave a charm to the intercourse of social life. Well might the feeling eloquent Burke exclaim that "the age of chivalry, was gone."

This apathy is repugnant to the constitution of nature. It is her ordinance that youth should be ardent, easily impress and enthusiastic. In them, enthusiasm, even though wrongly dictated, is pardonable, I had almost said, respectable. Advancing years temper its vehemence and give it its right direction; and it then imparts energy to the character. But what energy can be hoped for from the present generation of stoics? And how will that feeble flame, which scarcely warms their bosoms in the spring of youth, resist the frosty winter of age?

Let me then implore the race of young men who are now rising around me, to renounce their absurd and contemptible plans of conduct. Let it not be deemed disgraceful or unmanly to prefer the dance to cards or to the bottle; to seek in female society the most agreeable relaxation from severer pursuits, and to evince a "generous loyalty to the sex." There may be some individuals, to whom the parsimony of nature has denied any other means of rendering themselves conspicuous. I would allow such persons to counteract, as far as possible, by a perseverance in this mode of behaviour, the deficiency of natural or acquired talents. But I would earnestly admonish those, whose endowments are of a superior kind, to renounce a system, in which, every blockhead may be their successful competitor, and to propose to themselves such models only, as unite the charm of real politeness and real feeling with true dignity of character.

I am sir, your humble servant,
SENEC.

THEOLOGY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

SIR,

MY opponent has attacked me in your forty-sixth number, relative to an interpolation into the scripture, with the same asperity which he exhibited in his first letter. With the same asperity he has again shewn the same uncandid method of reasoning. Because I spoke of one interpolation, he intimates that I am going to argue for others. I confined myself to one, and shall go no further. He seems to think that my letter in your fortieth number, insinuated there was but one manuscript of the epistles of St. John. I wrote, that bishop Burnet, "examined the valuable manuscripts of the New Testament, in Switzerland, and the old and precious manuscript in the Vatican of Rome." By an omission of the press, the letter S was not printed in the word manuscripts, in the former part of the paragraph. I will now fairly transcribe what bishop Burnet has written upon the subject, for the candid judgment of your readers.

He says, "I have taken some pains in my travels to examine all the ancient manuscripts of the New Testament concerning that doubted passage of St. John's epistles, 'There are three that bear witness in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit; and these three are one.'" Bullinger doubted much of it, because he found it not in a Latin manuscript at Zurich, which seems to be about eight hundred years old; for it is written in that hand that began to be used in Charles the Great's time. I turned to the manuscript, and found the passage was not there; but this was certainly the error or omission of the copier: for before the general epistles in that manuscript, the preface of St. Jerome is to be found, in which he says he was the more exact in that translation that so he might discover the fraud of the Arians, who had struck out that passage concerning the trinity. This preface is printed in Lira's bible, but how it came to be left out by Erasmus, in his edition of that Father's Works, is that of which I can give no account. For as, on the one hand, Erasmus's sincerity ought not to be too rashly censured; so, on the other hand, that preface, being in all the manuscripts ancient or modern, of those bibles that have the other prefaces in them, that I ever yet saw, it is not easy to imagine what made Erasmus not publish it: and it is in the manuscript bibles at Basil, where he printed his edition of Jerome's Works. In the old manuscript bible of Geneva, that seems to be above seven hundred years old, both the preface and the passage are extant, but with this difference from the common editions, which set the verse concerning the Father, the Word, and the Spirit, before that of the Water, the Blood, and the Spirit; which comes after it in this copy. And that I may in this place end all the readings I found of this passage in my travels, there is a manuscript in St. Mark's library in Venice, in three languages, Greek, Latin, and Arabic, that seems not above four hundred years old, in which this passage is not in the Greek, but it is in the Latin set after the other three, with a Sicut to join it to what goes before. And in a manuscript Latin bible in the library of St. Laurence, at Florence, both St. Jerome's preface and this passage are extant: but this passage comes after the other, and is pinned to it with a Sicut, as is that of Venice; yet Sicut is not in the Geneva manuscript. There are two Greek manuscripts of the epistles at Basil that seem to be about five hundred years old, in which though St. Jerome's prologue is inserted, yet this passage is wanting. At Strasburg I saw four very ancient manuscripts of the New Testament in Latin. Three of these seemed to be about the time of Charles the Great, but the fourth seemed to be much ancients, and may belong to the seventh century: in it neither the prologue nor the place is extant, but it is added at the foot of the page with another hand. In two of the others the prologue is extant, but the place is not; only in one of them it is added on the margin. In the fourth, as the prologue is extant, so is the place likewise; but it comes after the verse of the other three, and is joined to it thus, sicut tres sunt in celo.

"It seemed strange to me, and it is almost incredible, that in the Vatican library there are no ancient Latin bibles, where, above all other places, they ought to be looked for; but I saw none above four hundred years old. There is, indeed, the famous Greek manuscript of great value, which the Chanoine Shelstrat, who was library keeper, asserted to be one thousand four hundred years old, and proved it by the great similitude of the characters with those that are upon St. Hippolyte's statue; which is so evident, that if his statue was made about this time, the antiquity of this manuscript is not to be disputed. If the characters are not so fair, and have not all the marks of antiquity that appear in the king's manuscript at St. James's, yet this has been much better preserved and is more entire. The passage that has led me into this digression, is not to be found in the Vatican manuscript, no more than it is in the king's manuscript."

The following three verses are written in this manner in common bibles, in the fifth chapter of the first epistle of St. John. "6. This is he that came by Water and Blood, even Jesus Christ, not by Water only, but by Water and Blood. And it is the Spirit that beareth Witness, because the Spirit is Truth. 7. For there are three that bear Record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Holy Ghost: and these three are one. 8. And there are three that bear Witness in Earth, the Spirit, and the Water, and the Blood: and these three agree in one.".....Erasmus in his folio edition of the New Testament in Greek omits the seventh verse, and prints the beginning of the eighth in this manner. "For there are three that Witness in Earth." In this method he connects the sixth and the eighth verses together. The folio edition of the Greek Testament by Erasmus is of high authority among the learned, who, in all probability, printed the passage in the way it should be printed according to the evidence of the best manuscripts. It is puerile to suppose that, if the seventh verse is omitted in the Vatican manuscript and the king of Great Britain's manuscript, the sixth and eighth verses are not properly connected. I made a mistake about the eighth verse, which, however, is not very material to the point in dispute about the trinity.

My opponent says, "This critic seems to be grieved that so many bibles are printed in America." I will quote my own words in the beginning of my letter in your fortieth number, to manifest his misrepresentation, and to demand from him an acknowledgment of his error, if he is not totally destitute of candor, in the face of the public.....My words are "As the Americans are printing bibles continually with laudable industry, it would be worth while to consider, whether they should persevere to insert a real interpolation into the bible."

It would be candid at any rate in the printer of an American bible, if he does print the seventh verse, to observe in a note that it is not found in many manuscripts of the New Testament.

My opponent speaks with a very unbecoming regard of the religious writings of the great sir Isaac Newton. He says of me, "It is somewhat comic that he introduces sir Isaac Newton as an authority in biblical criticism." I strongly suspect that he never read ten lines of Newton's Works in his life, and that he even did not know, before I mentioned it, that sir Isaac had written some letters upon the subject of the trinity. I am so ignorant a man as to have attended two courses of lectures on divinity (while those who were designed for the church, only attended one course) which were given by one of the most learned men in the age. This gentleman published an edition of sir Isaac Newton's Mathematical Works which was universally admired, and which at present is actually used in the British University of Cambridge. This gentleman, with whom I had a long friendship, often said to me, that sir Isaac Newton was a prodigy of learning and understanding, was equally superior to the common race of mankind in religious as in mathematical and philosophical knowledge. This opinion I know to be generally maintained by learned men, and if the reader will look into a little Work on the prophecies (which has lately come to the library of Philadelphia) by Mr. Zouch, who is acknowledged in Europe to be a very profound scholar, he will find that Mr. Zouch holds the religious writings of sir Isaac Newton in as much estimation as myself, if not in greater. He calls Newton "the most sublime mind that ever was....as great when he laid open the mysteries of the religious system, as when he unveiled those of the natural."

The word trinity is not used in the scriptures, but was afterwards coined by presumptuous and intolerant dogmatists. The doctrine of the trinity especially as maintained in the Athanasian creed, is contradictory to the principles of common sense, and impedes, according to the observation of sir Isaac Newton, and conformably to our continual experience, the propagation of the gospel, which is the true law of God, and the greatest blessing ever conferred upon mankind. There is a masterly book about the trinity written by Dr. Samuel Clarke (a genius almost as great as Newton) which I would very particularly recommend to the reader.

My opponent has improperly reflected upon the Philadelphia Library Company for collecting infidel and anti-christian publications. The Philadelphia Library, from former and late importations, may justly be praised for many valuable works in favour of christianity, and I believe it is with reluctance that any infidel publications are admitted into it.

My opponent has abused me in the language of the streets, and has falsely accused me of infidelity, when I only wished to contend for the truth of the scriptures. I hope that time and inquiry will shew him all his errors. I will hope that he will alter his opinion about the trinity and will at last acknowledge that "the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God."

It is said in the seventh chapter of Daniel that the pope shall "change Times and Laws: and they shall be given into his Hand for a Time, and Times, and the dividing of Time." The pope made havoc of the ten commandments. He altogether omitted the second, and made ten commandments of the whole, without the second. As universal bishop he made over the whole christian world, what the emperor Constantine had partially done, he made the first day of the week the sabbath instead of the seventh. But I firmly believe the time will come when the Jew and the Gentile will acknowledge one sabbath, one God, and one Saviour, "whom he hath appointed Heir of all Things, by whom also he made the Worlds; who being the Brightness of his Glory, and express Image of his Person, and upholding all Things by the Word of his Power, when he had by himself purged our Sins, sat down on the right Hand of the Majesty on High." FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE Ladies of Philadelphia, who have adopted the projecting hat, lately alluded to, resemble a hooded friar, and carry us back to the ages of monkery, when many a hypocritical head was concealed by a cowl.

A London paper assures us, that mob caps are much the fashion at Paris; a mode of dressing, which Buonaparte surely disapproves.

Black for spencers, robes, and hats is all the rage in Paris: a colour not very seasonable for the hot piping times of peace.

The Belles of Bath dress generally in light cotton gowns, with black stockings, or boots. The majority of the younger ladies are booted, and look like so many of Diana's nymphs, who had been engaged in the chace.

In London, if the question be asked, "Is Miss such a one a woman of fashion?" The ready reply of every Bond-street loungee is, "Oh! she is a mode of the finest transparency."

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

YOUR correspondent, who undertook, in the last number of the Port Folio, to pass some strictures on the proceedings of the legislature of this state, relative to the then projected law, declaring the holding of offices under the general and state governments, at the same time, incompatible, has committed an error in asserting, that the legislature had no right to pass such a law, so far as it was retrospective in its operation. Of this he may be convinced, by a reference to the 8th section of the 2d article of the constitution, the words of which are as follow:

Art. 2, sect. 8. "No member of congress from this state, nor any person holding or exercising any office of trust or profit under the United States, shall, at the same time, hold or exercise the office of judge, secretary, treasurer, prothonotary, register of wills, recorder of deeds, sheriff, or any office in this state, to which a salary is by law annexed, or any other office, which future legislatures shall declare incompatible with offices or appointments under the United States."

By the concluding clause of this section, it is conceived, that the legislature were fully authorised to pass the law above referred to; and their having done so, in opposition to the governor's veto, is a proof of their confidence that the constitution sanctioned the proceeding.

Your correspondent is pleased to compliment the governor on his professional talents and judgment; but surely he cannot think those appointments, which have proved so obnoxious to the people and their representatives, any marks of sound judgment or good discretion in the governor. The public have generally pronounced them, from the beginning, flagrant tokens of partiality, which nothing could justify. In the name of wonder, have we such a lack of professional merit, either among the lawyers or the doctors, that we must lavish all employments, in their particular branches of science, upon two or three men? Sir, it is the spirit of party which claims all the honour of this ungenerous preference. But, although it has been humorously said, that the governor made Mr. Leib a doctor, by appointing him physician at the lazaretto, and the law requires that he should be resident there, it seems that the power of the governor, in this instance, is superior to that of the law, for all this while the doctor is wintering at Washington, and the physician of the port of Philadelphia is performing the duty, for which Dr. Leib receives double the recompense that falls to the other.

I have no objections against Mr. Dallas, as recorder of the city, on the score of talents; but the circumstances under which he was appointed to that office, were highly exceptionable. Whether he will renounce the office he holds under the general government, for the sake of retaining the recordership, I cannot pretend to say; but it is no longer a question, that he must relinquish the one or the other.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

NO. IX.

THE leading points of the Message have been sufficiently canvassed, and it is believed to have been fully demonstrated, that this communication is chargeable with all the faults which were imputed to it, on the outset of the examination. We have shewn, that it has made, or attempted to make, prodigal sacrifices of constitutional energy, of sound principle, and of public interest. In the doctrine respecting war, there is a senseless abandonment of the just and necessary authority of the executive department, in a point, material to our national safety. In the proposals to relinquish the internal revenue, there is an attempt to establish a precedent, ruinous to our public credit: calculated to prolong the burden of the debt, and, generally, to enfeeble and sink the government, by depriving it of resources of great importance to its respectability, to the accomplishment of its most salutary plans, to its power of being useful. In the attack upon the judiciary establishment, there is a plain effort to impair that organ of the government, one on which its efficiency and success absolutely depend. In the recommendation to admit indiscriminately foreign emigrants, of every description, to the privileges of American citizens, on their first entrance into our country, there is an attempt to break down every pale which has been erected, for the preservation of a national spirit and a national character, and to let in the most powerful means of perverting and corrupting both the one and the other.

This is more than the moderate opponents of Mr. Jefferson's elevation ever feared from his administration: much more than the most wrong-headed of his own sect dared to hope; it is infinitely more than any one who had read the fair professions in his inaugural speech could have suspected. Reflecting men must be dismayed at the prospect before us. If such rapid strides have been hazarded in the very gristle of his administration, what may be expected when it shall arrive to manhood? In vain was the collected wisdom of America convened at Philadelphia....In vain were the anxious labours of a Washington bestowed. Their works are regarded as nothing better than empty bubbles, destined to be blown away by the mere breath of a disciple of Turgot, a pupil of Condorcet.

Though the most prominent features of the message have been portrayed, and their deformity exhibited in true colours, there remain many less important traits not yet touched, which, however, will materially assist us in determining its true character. To particularise them with minuteness would employ more time and labour than the object deserves; yet to pass them by wholly, without remark, would be to forego valuable materials for illustrating the true nature of the performance under examination.

There remains to be cursorily noticed, a disposition in our chief magistrate, far more partial to the state governments, than to our national government; to pull down rather than to build up our federal edifice....to vilify the past administration of the latter....to court for himself popular favour, by artifices not to be approved of, either for their dignity, their candour, or their patriotism.

Why are we emphatically and fastidiously told, that "the states, individually, have the principal care of our persons, our property, and our reputation, constituting the great field of human concerns." Was it to render the state governments more dear to us, more the objects of affectionate solicitude?.... Nothing surely was necessary on this head; they are already the favourites of the people, and if they do not forfeit the advantage by a most gross abuse of trust, must, by the very nature of the objects confided to them, continue always to be so. Was it then to prevent too large a portion of affection from being bestowed on the general government? No pains on this head were requisite, not only for the reason just assigned, but for the further reason that the more peculiar objects of this government, though no less essential to our prosperity than those of the state governments, oblige it often to act upon the community in a manner more likely to produce aversion than fondness. Accordingly every day furnishes proof, that it is not the spoiled child of the many. On this point the high example of the president himself is pregnant with instruction. Was it to indicate the supreme importance of the state governments over that of the United States? This was as little useful, as it was correct. Considering the vast variety of humours, prepossessions, and localities, which, in the much diversified composition of these states, militate against the weight and authority of the general government, if union under that government is necessary, it can answer no valuable purpose to depreciate its importance in the eyes of the people. It is not correct; because to the care of the federal government are confided, directly, those great general interests, on which all particular interests materially depend: our safety in respect to foreign nations; our tranquillity in respect to each other; the foreign and mutual commerce of the states; the establishment and regulation of the money of the country; the management of our national finances; indirectly, the security of liberty, by the guarantee of a republican form of government to each state; the security of property, by the interdiction of laws violating the obligation of contracts, and issuing the emissions of paper money, under state authority (from both of which causes the right of property had experienced serious injury); the prosperity of agriculture and manufactures, as intimately connected with that of commerce, and as depending, in a variety of ways, upon the agency of the general government: In a word, it is the province of the general government to manage the greatest number of those concerns, in which its provident activity and exertion are of most importance to the people; and we have only to compare the state of our country antecedent to its establishment, with what it has been since, to be convinced that the most operative causes of public prosperity depend upon that general government. It is not meant, by what has been said, to insinuate that the state governments are not extremely useful in their proper spheres; but the object is to guard against the mischiefs of exaggerating their importance, in derogation from that of the general government. Every attempt to do this is, remotely, a stab at the union of these states; a blow to our collective existence as one people....and to all the blessings, which are interwoven with that sacred fraternity.

If it be true, as insinuated, that "our organization is too complicated....too expensive"....let it be simplified; let this, however, be done in such a manner as not to mutilate, weaken, or eventually destroy our present system, but in a manner to increase the energy, and insure the duration of our national government, the rock of our political salvation.

In this insinuation, and in the suggestion that "offices and officers have been unnecessarily multiplied:" in the intimation that appropriations have not been sufficiently specific, and that the system of accountability to a single department has been disturbed; in this and in other things, too minute to be particularized, we discover new proofs of the disposition of the present executive, unjustly and indecorously to arraign his predecessors.

As far as the message undertakes to specify any instance of the improper complexity of our organization, namely, in the instance of the judiciary establishment, the late administration has been already vindicated.

As to the "undue multiplication of offices and officers," it is substantially a misrepresentation. It would be nothing less than a miracle, if, in a small number of instances, it had not happened that particular offices and officers might have been dispensed with. For in the early essays of a new government, in making the various establishments relative to the affairs of a nation, some mistakes in this respect will arise, notwithstanding the greatest caution. It must happen to every government, that in the hurry of a new plan, some agents will occasionally be employed, who may not be absolutely necessary; and this, where there is every inclination to economy. Similar things may have happened under our past administration. But any competent judge, who will take the trouble to examine into it, will be convinced, that there is no just cause for blame in this particular.

The president has not pointed out the cases, to which he applies the charge; but he has communicated information of some retrenchments, which he has made, and probably intends that the truth shall be inferred from this.

Three instances are particularly presented; these shall be briefly examined; it will be seen that they do not justify the imputation. They respect certain ministers at foreign courts; some navy agents at particular ports; and some inspectors of the revenue in particular states.

As to the first, it is believed to be a pretty just idea, that we ought not greatly to multiply diplomatic agencies. Three permanent ones may, perhaps, be found sufficient in the future progress of our affairs; for France, Spain, and England.... The expediency of having these, is recognized by the conduct of our present chief magistrate. But others must be employed, and, during particular seasons, it may be wise to do it for a considerable length of time. Indeed there is strong ground for an opinion entertained by very sensible men, that there ought to be a permanent minister at every court, with which we have extensive commercial relations.

Two other ministers were employed by both the former administrations, one with Portugal, the other with Holland; and it is asserted, without fear of denial, that this was done by the first president with the approbation of Mr. Jefferson. One other minister was employed by the late president at the court of Berlin.

A commercial treaty with Portugal is admitted, on all hands, and for obvious reasons, to be particularly desirable; as very interesting branches of our commerce are carried on in the Portuguese dominions. We are still without any such treaty. To send to that court a diplomatic agent to endeavour to effect one, was a measure of evident propriety; to recal them before a treaty has been effected, must be of questionable expediency. The views and circumstances of nations change; and an opportunity may occur, at some particular conjuncture, for effecting what was not before possible, which may be lost by the want of a fit agent on the spot to embrace it. But admitting that the experiment has now been sufficiently tried to justify its abandonment, still it does not follow that it was unwise to have continued it as long as it was: and as this must at least rest in opinion, the continuance, if upon an erroneous calculation in this particular, is no proof of a "disposition to multiply offices" or officers. And those, who consider the nature and extent of our commercial relations with Portugal, will not cease to think it problematical, whether the expense of a diplomatic agent, especially in a situation, in which nothing has been defined by treaty, ought to stand in competition with the benefits, which may result from the presence of a minister at the court of that kingdom. This consideration alone is sufficient to repel the charge.

NUMBER X.

AS to Holland being the second power which acknowledged our Independence, and made a treaty with us, a step which involved her in war with Great Britain, it was deemed proper to treat her with a marked respect. Besides this, from the time of our revolution to the present, we have had large money concerns with her people. A trusty and skillful public agent was for a long time necessary to superintend those concerns. If in a different capacity, it could not have cost much less, and by the annexation of a diplomatic character, a double purpose was answered. The honourable nature of the station enabled the Government to find an agent at a less expense than would have been requisite to procure one merely for the money object. It is not meant to deny, that the great change which has lately happened in the affairs of that country, making it in effect a dependency on France, rendered a removal of the minister proper; but it does not follow that it ought to have been done sooner. It is also known, that Mr. Murray, the late envoy, has been for a considerable time past, employed in our negotiations with France; which probably was a collateral reason for not recalling him sooner. In respect to one, if not to both these ministers, it may be observed, that a time of war was not the most eligible moment for their removal of a minister.

As to Berlin, the inducements for keeping a minister there, have never been fully explained. It is only known, that our commercial treaty with Prussia had expired, and that a renewal has been effected by the envoy sent thither; but influential as was the court of Prussia in the affairs of Europe during the late dreadful storm, it may have been conceived, that a cultivation of the good will of the Prussian monarch was not a matter of indifference to the peace and security of this country. If this was the object of the mission, though there may have been too far-fetched a policy in the case, it offers a defence of the measure, which exculpates the executive at least from the charge of a desire to multiply officers improvidently.

On the most unfavourable supposition then, here was one diplomatic agent too many, and two others were continued longer than was absolutely necessary. This surely is not of magnitude sufficient to constitute a serious charge, where malevolence did not inspire a spirit of accusation. In considering this question, it ought to be remembered, that it is the prevailing policy of governments to keep diplomatic agents at all courts where they have important relations.

As to the navy agents, it is sufficient to say, that they were temporary persons, who grew up out of our rupture with France; who, when they were appointed, were useful to accelerate naval preparations at as many points as could be advantageously occupied, and that it was only proper to discontinue them when an accommodation had been effected, and after they had had time enough to wind up the affairs of their agency. This was not the case previous to Mr. Jefferson's administration. In other instances of removal he only did it to make way for members of his own sect, and it will not be pretended that here there was any foundation for the charge under examination.

As to the inspectors of the revenue, the case in brief stands thus....When the excise on distilled spirits was established, three different descriptions of officers were instituted to carry it into effect. Supervisors, inspectors, and collectors were distributed to districts, surveys, and divisions, one to each. A district comprehends an entire state; a survey some large portion of it, or a number of counties; a division, for the most part, a single county. In some of the small states, there were no district officers for the surveys....the duties of inspector being annexed to those of supervisor; in larger ones, there were inspectors more or less numerous according to their extent. As other internal revenues were established, they were put under the management of the same officers. The bare statement of the fact shews the necessity of these officers. The revenues of no government were perhaps ever collected under a more simple organization, or through a smaller number of channels. It is not alleged that the first and last classes of officers were unnecessary. It is only to the middle class that any specious objection can be made. Let us conjecture the reasons for employing them.

In some of the states great opposition was expected, and was actually experienced. In such states especially, it was evidently useful to have the exertions of some men of weight and character in their sphere of moderate extent, to reconcile the discontented;....to arrange the details of business, and to give energy to the measures for collection. In others, similar officers were probably useful in the early stages, for the purpose of establishing the details simply. The subdivision was in all cases favourable to an active and vigilant superintendence. Nor does it require extraordinary penetration to discern that the policy was wise, at the time when the measures were adopted. It is possible that upon the complete establishment of the plan, when all opposition had been vanquished, and when the collection has become an affair of mere routine, that this intermediate class may have ceased to be essential. But till this had become perfectly evident, it would have been premature to alter the original plan. Though it be true, that some years have elapsed since the excise law was passed, it is not very long since it has been in full and uninterrupted operation. Other laws, introducing other branches of internal revenue, have been subsequently passed, from time to time, and the agency of the same officers have probably been found useful on their first introduction and execution. Hence it is easily accounted for that they were not before discontinued, if indeed experience has shewn that they are not still necessary, which is itself problematical. Nothing is more easy than to reduce the number of agents employed in any business, and yet for the business to go on with the reduced number. But before the reduction is applauded, it ought to be ascertained that the business is as well done as it was before. There is a wide difference between merely getting along with business and doing it well and effectually.

These observations sufficiently shew that in the instances which have been cited, there is no evidence of a disposition in the preceding administrations, improperly to multiply offices and officers. Acting under different circumstances, they conducted as those circumstances dictated, and in all probability, in a manner the best adapted to the advancement of the public service. A change of circumstances, may in some instances have rendered a continuance of some of the agents thus employed unnecessary; and the present Chief Magistrate may even be right in discontinuing them; but it is not therefore right to attempt to derive from this any plea of peculiar merit with the people; and it is very far from right to make it a topic of slander on predecessors. Perhaps however this is too rigorous a construction, and that nothing more was intended than to set off to the best advantage, the petty services of petty talents.

If this was the true aim, it is to be regretted that it was not so managed as to avoid the appearance of a design to depreciate in the public estimation, the men who went before.—Had this delicacy or caution been observed, the attempt would have attracted neither notice nor comment.

"Commas and points he sets exactly right,
"And 'twere a sin to rob him of his mire."

NUMBER XI.

THE Message observes that "in our care of the public contributions entrusted to our direction, it would be prudent to multiply barriers against the dissipation of public money, appropriating specific sums to every specific purpose, susceptible of definition; by disallowing all applications of money varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount, by reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and thereby circumscribing discretionary powers over money, and by bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money where the examination may be prompt, efficacious and uniform." In this recommendation we can be at no loss to discover additional proof of a deliberate design in the present Chief Magistrate to arraign the former administrations. All these suggestions imply in them a former either negligent or defective attention to the objects recommended; some of them go further, and insinuate that there had been at least a departure from correct plans, which had before been instituted. The censure intended to be conveyed is as unjust as the conceptions which have dictated it, are crude and chimerical. In all matters of this nature, the question turns upon the proper boundaries of the precautions to be observed; how far they ought to go; where they should stop; how much is necessary for security, and order; what qualifications of general rules are to be admitted to adapt them to practice, and to attain the ends of the public service. It is certainly possible to do too much as well as too little; to embarrass, if not defeat the good which may be done, by attempting more than is practicable; or to overbalance that good by evils accruing from an excess of regulation. Men of business know this to be the case in the ordinary affairs of life: how much more must it be so, in the extensive and complicated concerns of an empire? To reach and not to pass the salutary medium is the province of sound judgment. To miss the point will ever be the lot of those who, enveloped all their lives in the mists of theory, are constantly seeking for an ideal perfection, which never was and never will be attainable in reality. It is about this medium, not about general principles, that those in power in our government have differed; and to experience, not to the malevolent insinuations of rivals, must be the appeal, whether the one or the other description of persons have judged most accurately. Yet discerning men may form no imperfect opinion of the merits of the controversy between them, by even a cursory view of the distinctions on which it has turned.

Nothing, for instance, is more just or proper than the position, that the legislature ought to appropriate specific sums, for specific purposes; but nothing is more wild or of more inconvenient tendency than to attempt to appropriate "a specific sum for each specific purpose, susceptible of definition;" as the Message preposterously recommends. Thus (to take a familiar example) in providing for the transportation of an army; oats and hay for the subsistence of horses, are each susceptible of a definition, and an estimate, and a precise sum may be appropriated for each separately; yet in the operations of an army, it will often happen that more than a sufficient quantity of the one article may be obtained, and not a sufficient quantity of the other. If the appropriations be distinct, and the officer who is to make the provision be not at liberty to divert the fund from one of these objects to the other (as the doctrine of the Message implies), the horses of the army may in such a case starve; and its movements be arrested—in some situations even the army itself may likewise be starved, by a failure of the means of transportation.

If it be said, that the inconvenience here suggested, may be avoided, by making the appropriations for forage, generally, and not for the items which compose it separately: The answer is, first, that this, by uniting and blending different things, susceptible each of a precise definition, is an abandonment of the principle of the Message; secondly, That it would be only a partial cure for the mischiefs incident to that rigorous principle. It might happen that the badness of roads would injure the waggons of the army more than was anticipated, and so much more as to exhaust the specific fund appropriated for their repairs; it might also have happened from various causes that at an earlier period of the campaign, the consumption of forage had been less than was calculated, so that there was a surplus of the fund destined for this object: If in such a case the public agent could not transfer that surplus to the repairs of the waggons; here in like manner, the motions of the army might be suspended, and in the event famine and ruin produced.

This analysis might be pursued, so as to prove that similar evils are inseparable, from a much more qualified application of the principle in the message, and so to demonstrate that nothing more can safely or reasonably be attempted, than to distribute the public expenses, into a certain number of convenient subdivisions or departments; to require from the proper officers, estimates of the items, which are to compose each head of expense, and after examining these with due care, to adapt the appropriations to the respective aggregates; applying a specific sum to the amount of each great subdivision:—the pay of the army; military stores; quarter-masters' stores, &c. &c. This, with even more detail than could well be executed, has been uniformly done, under the past administrations of the present government, from the very beginning of its proceedings. More will in the experiment be found impracticable and injurious; especially in seasons and in situations, when the public service demands activity and exertion. In like manner, the former practice of the government, has corresponded with the rule, taken in its true and just sense, of "disallowing all applications of money, varying from the appropriation in object, or transcending it in amount." It is confidently believed, that whoever shall allege or insinuate the contrary, may be challenged to point out the instance in which money has been issued from the treasury for any purpose, which was not sanctioned by regular appropriation, or which exceeded the appropriated amount; or where there was an expenditure of money allowed, that was not strictly within the limits of such an appropriation; except indeed, upon the impracticable idea of minutely separating, and distinguishing the items which form the aggregate of some general head of expenditure.

It is likewise material, to have it well understood, that generally speaking, the distinction between the appropriations for different objects, can only be strictly observed at the treasury itself; which can easily take care that more money shall not go out for any purpose, than is authorized by law; and can see that this money is fairly expended by the proper officer, in conformity with the general spirit of the appropriation prescribed by the law. But it is in most cases impossible for the officer, charged with a particular branch of the public service, to separate nicely, in the details of expenditure, the different funds which may have been placed in his hands. Thus, still drawing our examples from the military department, where the danger of misapplication is always the greatest) if several sums be placed in the hands of the quarter-master general, for different objects, he must of necessity, distribute a large proportion of them among his principal deputies, and these again among subordinate agents. Unless this distribution be pursued through the remotest ramifications, down to the moment of final expenditure, it is evident that it must fail throughout; and it is no less evident that it cannot be so far pursued. The mere accountantship would be an insuperable obstacle; it would require in every the most inferior agent, a profound knowledge of accounts, and would impose both on principals and subordinates the duty of keeping such a multiplicity of accounts, as, if even practicable, would exhaust the funds issued for the public service, in mere clerkship. Another most mischievous consequence would ensue. The exigencies of the public service are often so variable, that a public agent would frequently find himself full-handed for one purpose; empty-handed for another, and if forbidden to make a transfer, not only the service would suffer, but an opportunity, with very strong temptation, would be given to traffic with the public money for private gain: while the business of the government would be stagnated by the injudicious and absurd impediments of an over-driven strictness. Happily it is not very material that the principle of distinct appropriations for separate objects should be carried through all the details. The essential ends of it are answered, if it be strictly pursued, in the issuing of money from the treasury; and if this department be careful that the principle lines of discrimination are not transgressed.

The theory of the Message plainly contemplates, that in no case shall the actual money appertaining to one fund, be expended for the purpose of another; though each fund may be sufficient for its object, and though there may be an appropriature for each object. This is another excess of theory; which with a full treasury would often disable the government, from fulfilling its engagements, and from carrying on the public business. To execute this plan consistently with exigencies of national expenditure, would probably require, in ordinary, a triplication of the revenue, or a capital necessary for the whole amount of that expenditure, and would very often lock up from circulation, large sums, which might be of great importance to the activity of trade and industry. Such are the endless blessings to be expected from the notable schemes of a philosophic projector! strict to a fault, where relaxation is necessary; lax to a vice, where strictness is essential!

As to "reducing the undefined field of contingencies, and circumscribing discretionary powers over money," observations similar to those which have been already made, occur. The term reducing, implies that the thing must have already existed in a degree; and indeed it is manifest, that all the minute casualties of expenditure, especially in the naval and military departments, cannot be foreseen and defined. The question then must be, has not the limit been sufficiently narrow for the situation of the Government, in the scenes through which it has passed; comprehending for a great part of the time Indian wars and foreign hostilities? Certainly, if viewed on a proportionable scale, the extent appears to have been as moderate as could have been desired; and no blame can justly attach to the administration on this account.

As to "bringing back to a single department all accountabilities for money," there never has been a deviation from that system. The department of the treasury has uniformly preserved a vigilant superintendence over all accountabilities for public money. A particular accountant indeed has been appointed in the war and navy departments, but he has been subordinate to the treasury department, which has prescribed regulations for his conduct, and has constantly revised his proceedings. It is true, that by his connection with the particular department for which he is accountant, there are cases in which he is to be guided by the directions of the head of that department; but though these directions, if not plainly contrary to the rules prescribed by the treasury, would exempt him from responsibility, the directions themselves pass under the review of the treasury, as a check upon the head of the department to which he is attached; and in cases of abuse, they would serve to establish a responsibility of the principal. To say, that this interferes with a prompt examination of accounts, is to affirm, that a division of labour is injurious to dispatch; a position contrary to all experience. The fact, without doubt, is, that it contributes essentially to dispatch: and that whatever new modification may be adopted, either the accounts of the other departments will never keep pace with the current of business in times of activity, or that modification must adhere to the principle of employing distinct organs.

If it be the design to exclude, in every case, the intervention of the head of the particular department, some or all of these evils will follow: The service of that department will suffer, by unduly restricting its head, in cases in which he must be the most competent judge, and by obliging him, in order to avoid eventual difficulties, to resort, in the first instance, to another department, less alive than himself to the exigencies of his own, for a cautious and slow, perhaps a reluctant acquiescence in arrangements which require promptness; if, in the spirit of confidence and accommodation, the officers of the treasury yield a ready compliance with the wishes of the head of such department, they may inadvertently co-operate in measures which they would have disapproved and corrected on a deliberate and impartial revision. If this spirit be not shewn, not only the immediate service of the department may be improperly impeded, but sensations, unfriendly to the due harmony of the different members of the administration, may be engendered. Collusion stands on one, discord on the other side of the dilemma.

The existing plan steers a middle and a prudent course; neither fettering too much the heads of the other departments, nor relinquishing too far the requisite controul of the treasury. Its opposite supposes all trust may be placed in one department—none in the others. The extravagant jealousy of the overbearing influence of the treasury department, which was so conspicuous in the times of the two former secretaries, has of a sudden given way to unlimited confidence! The intention seems to be to surround the brow of their immaculate successor, with the collected rays of legislative and executive favour. But vain will be the attempt to add lustre to the dim luminary of a benighted administration!

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

FEAST OF ANACREON.

THE Columbian Anacreontic Society last evening gave their annual Ladies' Concert, in a style of superior elegance. The whole suite of apartments occupied by the city assemblies, was thrown open on this occasion. No pains or expense had been spared to provide suitable entertainment, and Mrs. Oldmixon, whose musical powers have long since acquired her great celebrity, was procured from Philadelphia.

The company assembled at an early hour, and were numerous, beyond any former occasion..... The ladies had generally taken ornaments of coquelico, in compliment to the society; and it was only requisite that the seats should have been constructed amphitheatrically, to have exhibited a spectacle, the most striking, brilliant, and fascinating.

The following extract from the bill contains the music which was given:—

9. Scotch Medley Overture, - - - - -	Arnold.

Music selected and arranged by Mr. Hodgkinson, president of the society.

Leader of the orchestra, Mr. Hewitt.

Propriety will not, perhaps, permit on such an occasion the indulgence of critical remarks on the performance, were we otherwise inclined to make such, and did we feel ourselves competent; we shall only, therefore, observe, that of the songs, those most distinguished were the two by Mrs. Oldmixon; the second of Mrs. Hodgkinson's, and the second of Miss Brett's. Mrs. O. in her first, pleased by sweetness and simplicity; in her bravura, she astonished by the prodigious compass of her voice; her flute notes in alt in a particular manner excited the admiration of the audience; which was expressed in loud and universal applauses; courtesy to the stranger, as much perhaps as approbation of her performance, caused these plaudits to be again and again repeated. The song, however, most calculated to charm the listening ear, was Mrs. Hodgkinson's second.... Her "Sweet Passion of Love," was given with a delicacy of tone, a distinctness of articulation, a force of emphasis, and a degree of impassioned tenderness, which reached every heart.

Mr. Gilfort met with much deserved applause, for his truly surprising execution. Mr. Gautier exhibited, as he always does, powers over his instrument, which we have never witnessed in any other. His rondo was captivating.

The sense of tasting was not forgotten by the managers any more than that of hearing; between the acts the gentlemen retired to the tea-room, where they found a plenty of substantial refreshments; while a profusion of fruits and delicacies was served round to the ladies, by the gentlemen of the society; this part of the evening's amusement was received by the company with marks of approbation, not easily to be understood.

On the whole, we believe it may with truth be said, that the satisfaction generally received, was fully equal to the expectations, which had been raised. We beg permission to express our hope, that an institution so honourable to the taste and manners of our city, may continue to receive the electric applause of Beauty and Fashion.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IN the year 1777, the importation of tea from China to England, was about sixteen millions of pounds. From that time to the present, it has increased to no less than THIRTY MILLIONS.

Coffee was first used in Persia, as a beverage among the religious of that country; thence it was transported into Turkey, and found its way into Europe through France. It was first known in Great-Britain, in 1652. The first coffee-house in London was instituted by a Greek.

The Walpole paper is always decorated with the flowers of fancy; and, in the Farmer's Museum, we find many a curious article, worthy the attention of the connoisseur. The following is a gem:

THE SENSITIVE PLANT.

AN EPIGRAM,

The Hint from a Fact

Three bellies in a garden were viewing the plants,
Conducted respectively by their gallants.
"Here Nancy," said William, "is one will reveal
A secret which many fam'd beauties conceal;
For where modest virtue has flown from her stand,
It wilts at the touch, and recedes from the hand."
The young ladies gaz'd as if rather dismay'd,
But Nancy at length said, "Poh! I'm not afraid."
Her fair hand advanc'd—the experiment tried,
When lo! in an instant the plant droop'd and died!
The poor girl first redd'n'd, then whiter than snow
Said faintly—"Lord help me! How does the plant know!"
MOMUS.

The following is a "good enough barometer" of the "popular gale," and well exposes the knavery

* As the sensitive plant does in fact droop and fold up its leaves at the touch of any person, this trick was a very mischievous one on the part of William. Happily for the peace of society, nature, in reality, affords no such criterion.

of the demagogue, and the simplicity of those silly sheep, the people :

Nothing shews folly in a more contemptible light, than its being repeatedly duped by the same deceit. Of all the pretences, which have imposed upon the credulity of mankind, that of patriotism is oftenest used. The reason is evident. Observation of political errors, without attention to their nature or source, gives weight to the clamours of the patriot, and makes the giddy multitude listen to his specious promises of redress, as a drowning person catches at a straw; constant disappointments not in the least abating their credulity.

A poetaster says, in a late volume of advice to the ladies, concerning their behaviour,

"In public places let no nymph appear,
Till she has learnt a fit behaviour there."

This is almost as good counsel as the Irishman gave to his friend, when he advised him never to go into the water, until he had learned to swim.

In a late number of the Philadelphia Gazette, we have perused, with a very continued approbation, the following ingenious satire :

At a numerous and respectable meeting of the young men of this city, held for the purpose of adopting measures to co-operate with the other sex in the glorious improvements in dress, the following resolutions were proposed, and unanimously agreed to:....

Resolved, That the ardent thanks of this meeting be presented to those enlightened few, who have nobly combated the errors and the prejudices of the times, by exhibiting to our enraptured view a great portion of their persons, which, hitherto, an absurd regard for modesty has concealed in obscurity; and that, in future, they be distinguished by the appellation of the Spartan band.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, to report what alteration will be necessary in our dress, to assimilate it, if possible, to that of the other sex; if the pantaloons ought to undergo a revision, or whether they had not better be laid aside, as superfluous and unnecessary.

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to wait on the Spartan band, to express to them our sanguine hopes, that they will not pause in the glorious career they have entered on, but that every year will disclose more and more of their beauteous forms, till at last they arrive at the summit of perfectibility, by appearing "in puris naturalibus."

Resolved, That the pictures of the Spartan band be taken by Mr. Stuart; that he be directed to array them, in their new costume, in his most glowing colours; and that they be placed in the most conspicuous part of the theatre, for the benefit of those, who may not have been gratified with a sight of the originals.

In the enthusiasm of the moment, it was proposed to proceed directly through the streets to the houses of the band, with their pantaloons in their hands, as an evidence of the rapid progress of reformation; but this was negatived, upon the suggestion that, although, in a short time, this would, no doubt, be done by all, yet, at present, the novelty of the scene might attract such a concourse of admirers, as to render their return home somewhat inconvenient. Whereupon the meeting adjourned.

Published by order of the meeting,

The American Ladies' and Gentlemen's Pocket Almanack, for 1802, has just been published, by Mr. Longworth. It must be gratifying to every person of taste, to observe this successful attempt to vie with European artists; and it is to be hoped public patronage will duly appreciate the exertion. It is not too highly commending this little volume, to pronounce it to be honourable to the state of American arts. The quantity of its contents makes it a cheap collection of elegant poetry, selected with much judgment, mostly from living authors. In a word, we may say, without hesitation, it is superior, in point of execution, to any European publication of the sort.

LAW CASE.

The following case is related by Sadi, in his Gulistan, or Rose Garden, and is cited by Puffendorf* with approbation :

A man, who had a disorder in his eyes, called on a farrier for a remedy, and he applied to them a medicine, commonly used for his patients. The man lost his sight, and brought an action for damages; but the judge said, "No action lies, for, if the complainant had not himself been an ass, he would never have employed a farrier!"

The Bond-street heroes, since the late pedestrian feats, are no longer to be called loungeurs, but walkers. They adopt the velocity of running footmen, and thrusting people into the kennel is all the rage.

We read, with great interest, the following advertisement, in a London paper of recent date :

"Speedily will be published, in one volume, quarto, illustrated with maps (dedicated, by permission, to his majesty), Voyages from Montreal, on the River St. Laurence, through the Continent of North America, to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans, in the years 1789 and 1793. With a preliminary account of the rise, progress, and present state of the Fur Trade in that country. By Alexander Mackenzie, Esq."

This book will prove a most valuable accession to the stock of travels in this country. Mr. Mackenzie has been frequently described as one of the most intelligent of tourists.

A lady, of great literary acquirements, lately gave her husband a very severe shock, by assuring him that not a day passed over her head at Mar-gate, without seeing her in old Neptune's bosom!

The archbishop of York was very fond of a pun. His clergy dining with him, for the first time after he had lost his lady, he told them he feared they did not find things in so good order as they used to be, in the time of poor Mary: and, looking extremely sorrowful, added with a deep sigh, "She was indeed Mare pacificum." A curate, who well knew what she had been, called out "Aye, my lord, but she was Mare mortuum first."

We have often heard of a "dingy Desdemona," but the following is new. When Foote once wished to draw a full house at the Haymarket theatre, he inserted in the play-bills, that by particular desire, for that night only, the part of Calista, the fair Penitent, would be performed by a blackamoor lady of great accomplishments.

Barrymore, happening to come late to the theatre, and having to dress for his part, was driven to the last moment, when, to heighten his perplexity, the key of his drawer was missing. "D—n it," says he, "I must have swallowed it." "Never mind," replied Bannister, coolly, "If you have swallowed the key....it will serve to open your chest."

Mr. Whitely, manager of a country theatre, having constantly an eye to his interest, one evening, during the performance of Richard III, gave a tolerable proof of that being his leading principle. Representing the crook-back'd tyrant, he exclaimed, "Hence, babbling dreams! you threaten here in vain; Conscience avault."....."That man in the brown wig there has got into the pit without paying."....."Richard's himself again."

A gentleman dined one day with a dull preacher. Dinner was scarcely over, before the gentleman fell asleep; but was awakened by the divine, and invited to go and hear him preach. "I beseech you, sir, to excuse me, I can sleep very well where I am."

When general Burgoyne was once at a play, which was most miserably acted, at a barn, in Lancashire, he called one of the performers, and asked him what was the name of the piece, "The Stage-Coach, sir," replied Buskin, bowing very respectfully. "Why then," answered the general, returning the bow, with the utmost gravity, "you will greatly oblige me, by giving me early notice the next time it is performed, that I may be an outside passenger."

Two clergymen, descanting of the mischiefs that had crept into the church, one of them said that a large portion of his flock were tinctured with deism; the other complained that many of his congregation were still worse, being infected with atheism. "And I am sure," added a bystander, "that nearly half of our parish is, at this minute, sadly afflicted with rheumatism."

An English gentleman, travelling through the county of Kilkenny, came to a ford, and hired a boat to take him across. The water being rather more agitated than was agreeable to him, he asked the boatman, if any person was ever lost in the passage. Never, replied the boatman, my brother was drowned here last week, but we found him next day.

A conceited Colonel in the Cavalry lately complained that from the ignorance of his officers, he was obliged to do the whole duty of the regiment—I am said he, my own captain, my own lieutenant, my own cornet—and your own trumpeter, added a witty lady.

A fellow once calling a barber a paper skull booby, so irritated the friseur, that he swore, if ever he dared to repeat the phrase, he'd give him such a dressing, as he never had in his life, and added—paper skull indeed! I'd have you to know that my skull is as thick as yours, and be d—d to you.

You and your perpetually introduced in familiar conversation have a bad effect. They remind one of Mrs. Hannah Glasse of culinary memory—"when you have made your water boil, then put your pudding into your pot."

In running over the pages of an old literary journal, there is found a novel, translated from the French, entitled: "The Virtuous Criminal," &c. The philosophers of the new school are very adroit in combining vice and virtue, in their hodge podge of moral relations. Thus we hear of "Artless Deception," "Good natured Parricide," "Honest Thieves," and "Innocent Adultery."

Walking Match.—On Wednesday morning, at half past seven, Thomas Dennison, of Thirsk, in the North Riding of Yorkshire, set out to walk to York, thence back to Carlton, about two miles and a half north of Thirsk, and thence to the house he started from, against Thomas Bradley, of the same place, for thirty guineas a side. Dennison performed the journey, being about fifty-one miles, with considerable ease, in nine hours and a quarter, leaving Bradley from nine to ten miles behind.

* De Jur. Nat. & Gent. lib. 5, cap. 5, § 2,

[Morning Post.]

A London paper narrates, that Mr. Barclay, while in training for his walking match in Yorkshire, lived principally on beef stakes and vinegar! He was regularly exercised every day, and the utmost pains were taken to keep women out of his sight!

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

WALTER AND MARY.

A LONG time ago, as old legends recite,
In the depth of yon forest's deep gloom,
Stood the cottage of Mary, where oft on a night,
While the moon faintly beam'd thro' the foliage her light,
She lov'd with her Walter to roam.

Yet Walter was needy, the child of distress,
Chilling penury call'd him her own;
Tho' fortune had scorn'd with her riches to bless
Poor Walter, yet Mary ne'er lov'd him the less;
Yet in silence he mourn'd, and alone.

Cold and cruel, and miserly, stricken in years,
Was the parent of Mary the maid, Nought he heeded the sigh that would break on his ears,
Nor the smile of affection that beam'd thro' her tears,
As compassion for Walter she pray'd.

Yet pure as the dew-drop that sits on the flow'r,
The affection that warm'd Walter's breast,
More pure than the Spring breeze, when kiss'd by
the show'r,
As pure as the waters of Jordan, what hour
Its stream by the Saviour was press'd.

Old Reuben, the herdsman, was wealthy, and sigh'd
To rival the youth with the maid;
Long to gain her affections, but vainly, had tried;
Oft had offer'd to make poor Mary his bride,
And his wealth, his possessions display'd.

Her parent had pleaded for Reuben, and long
Had Mary rejected his pleas;
In the woods she would sorrow, and list to the song
Of the nightingale warbling the branches among,
And mournfully sigh to the breeze.

In the bosom of Reuben had jealousy reign'd,
The offspring of love unreturn'd;
Her smiles on her Walter his bleeding heart
pain'd,
And madd'ning with fury and rage unrestrain'd,
For vengeance on Mary had burn'd.

One even with Walter, beneath the grove's shade,
When the pale moon-beam stole thro' the boughs,
She reclin'd;...all was still, save the sigh of the maid,
Or the south breeze that rustled....she felt not afraid,
For she listen'd to hear Walter's vows.

With his vassals, the slaves of his ill-gotten ore,
In the grove Reuben sought out the pair,
Seiz'd on Walter, and merciless, pitiless bore
From the bosom of Mary the youth to the shore,
To a vessel that waited him there.

The wild waves and the winds wafted Walter away,
From the scenes of pure, tranquil delight;
While Mary would wander the forest by day,
And pensively love by the sea shore to stray,
While stormy and cold was the night.

Oft as heedlessly wand'ring, poor Mary had stray'd,
O'er the mountain, the heath, or the lawn,
Would Reuben deceitfully tell to the maid,
That her Walter was faithless....her Walter was dead,
Nor thought on the days that were gone:

Yet Mary was listless, as Reuben would tell
That his passion was pure as the dew;
Ah! in vain would he strive each fond thought to dispel
From her bosom, of Walter....for Walter too well
Her heart sweetly whisper'd was true.

Yet in sorrow, and oft, would her parent complain
She would bring his grey hairs to the grave,
For the herdsman would sue....oft would keen sorrow feign,
That Mary rejected the hand of the swain,
Oft implore her a parent to save.

Subdued by affection, she griev'd at the sight
Of her sire, feeble, tott'ring, distress'd:
"Thy bosom," she sobb'd, "shall feel cheerful and light;"
And she fix'd, broken hearted, the sorrowful night,
That the herdsman by her should be bless'd.

Five years had roll'd on, since her Walter had fled,
And the night of the wedding was come,
Cheerless, silent and pensive, to church she was led,
O'er the path that with Walter so oft she would tread,
At the altar to seal her sad doom.

As she pass'd up the aisle, "Oh, my Walter!" she
sigh'd,
"Could you feel as poor Mary feels now;
"Could you know with what joy she would now be thy bride;
"What a burden of sorrow her poor heart does
hide,
You would pardon to Reuben her vow."

Prophetic and sad was the organ's deep strain
To the maid as it rose on her ear;
Fancy told of the time, as at eve o'er the plain
With her first love she rov'd; when no sorrow, no pain
Had embitter'd life's smiling career.

Busy Mem'ry, kind friend in prosperity's hour,
In adversity ever a foe,
Sketch'd to Mary the rude oaken bench in the bow'r,
Where her heart had acknowledg'd love's soft silken pow'r,...
First was taught all its bliss....all its woe.

Not so fleeting the shadow of April's thin cloud,
As the forms by her mem'ry pourtray'd:
Now the organ was hush'd, at the altar she bow'd,
And the pastor, in accents impressive and loud,
Address'd his discourse to the maid.

Scarce the servant of God had yet utter'd a word,
When the wind howl'd around the old pile,
On the church roof scream'd shrilly the lonely night bird,
And a heart breaking groan, deep and hollow was heard
From the furthestmost part of the aisle.

The church it was dark, save the altar around,
No tapers illumin'd the pile;
Again all was silent, and still, and profound,
When Mary faint utter'd, "What groaning, what sound
"That but now floated up the church aisle?"

"'Twas the scream of the screech-owl," the pastor rejoind,
"And the night it is stormy and dark,
"Young maiden, dispel every dread from thy mind,
"Twas the church bell that sounded, as struck by the wind,
"Or the village dog hoarsely did bark."

Hark! another deep groan thro' the church aisle resound!
"Oh, God! save poor Mary," she cried;
When tremblingly shudd'ring, she heard a quick
sound
In the aisle, of a hollow step tread on the ground,
And her Walter stood close by her side.

His hair loosely flowing...his eye-balls roll'd round,
And his bar'd bosom heav'd a deep sigh;
"Thou woman," he rav'd, as she sunk on the ground,
"Whom once I thought faithful, now false I have found,
"Pray, pray to thy God, thou shalt die!"

He plung'd to her heart the cold knife....not a sound
From poor Mary escap'd....she scarce sigh'd:
He pierc'd his own bosom, and dropp'd to the ground;
He drank with his cold lips the blood from her wound;
He clasp'd her, he kiss'd her, and died.

Yet as pure as the dew-drop that sits on the flow'r,
The affection that warm'd Mary's breast,
More pure than the Spring breeze, when kiss'd by
the show'r,
As pure as the waters of Jordan, what hour
Its stream by the Saviour was press'd.

To the brink of yon stream, where the willow trees lean
And rustle, as sweeping the grave tops so green,
Not long since, the shepherds would wander at e'en,
To dress with wild roses the spot
Where the graves of poor Mary and Walter were seen:
In the Summer, the long grass was fresh and was green;
The shepherds in winter would sweep the snow
clean;
And to shelter their graves from the rains of the Spring,
Would build o'er the spot a rude cot.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. VII.

Si les femmes veulent seulement être belles à leur propres yeux, et se plaire à elles-mêmes, elles peuvent, sans doute, dans la manière de s'embeller, dans le choix des ajustemens et de la parure, suivre leur goût et leur caprice, mais si c'est aux hommes qu'elles desiront de plaire, si c'est pour ceux qu'elles se fardent ou qu'elles s'enluminent, j'ai recueilli les voix, et je leur prononce de la part de tous les hommes, que le blanc et le rouge, les rendent affreuses et dégoûtantes.

LA BRUYÈRE.

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

SIR,

I am a young gentleman of considerable property, and having arrived at the age, which I have long contemplated as the period of settling myself by a matrimonial connection, I came some months ago to this city, in hopes of meeting with one, among your Philadelphia belles, who should sufficiently interest my feelings, to be selected as my companion through life. I have been unfortunate in not having a very general acquaintance here: and although I am very willing to allow the ladies, to whom I have been introduced, a great superiority over others in many respects, yet "I, who fondly gaze on nature's face," turn from them with sorrow: and as I mourn over their infirmities, I determine to bid adieu to scenes, where female beauty and artlessness can no longer be found, and in which I can no longer be interested.

The disappointment of my expectations has led me to some observations on the subject of face painting, which I must beg leave to offer to my picturesque friends, through the medium of your excellent paper. By way of preliminary remark, permit me to assure you, I have never known a woman of good sense or true delicacy adopt the practice, which may deservedly be called barbarous, and which, in civilized society, is entirely confined to those weaker daughters of men, who believe the only way of making themselves agreeable in our eyes, is by strutting like the fabled jack-daw, in borrowed plumage. But in this attempt to deceive others, they only deceive themselves; there are few persons, who can mistake the daubed visage of a play-house belle, for the ruddiness of nature. Did it pass without detection, we might be inclined to forgive the deception; but our American ladies have not practised it long enough to excel, and as it is too easily discovered to be relished, I advise them to paint the faces of their dolls, instead of their own. It will amuse their time quite as well, and as in Dolly we do not seek the artless blush of virgin modesty, nor the graceful tear of sensibility, the one will not be concealed, nor the other restrained, lest in its course it should rob the cheek of its borrowed brilliancy.

For my part, and I believe it is the case with all my sex, although I am an enthusiastic admirer of beauty, yet I prefer the ugliest face I ever beheld, to the finest set of features, if they are deformed by artificial colouring.

Now, sir, after having obtruded my humble opinion on this subject, I must beg you will add some of your own arguments in support of mine. For coming from such respectable authority as their friend Mr. Saunter, reproof will have double effect on the fair. It is your duty, sir, conscious as you must be of the deference they pay to your advice, to admonish them to throw aside their white lead, their brushes, their rouge, and all the variety of lotions, which they apply to this most disgraceful purpose. It is your province to acquaint them with ornaments for their minds, and teach them, that a cultivated understanding will give a lustre to their countenances, infinitely superior to any that paint affords. Your proofs must convince them that rouge, far from improving, even a bad face, deforms ugliness itself, and renders it more disgusting. It is you alone, sir, who can persuade them to the belief of this truth, that if the varied emotions of woman's soft and gentle soul beam in her countenance, it matters not whether her complexion is very fair very brown.

Yours,

FAIRLOVE.

In common with many of my correspondents, my friend Mr. Fairlove exalts my power, and exaggerates my influence. Though I have for a long time "capered nimbly in a lady's chamber," although I have overturned several toilets, and broken several bottles of Circassian bloom, yet I fear I have not been successful enough to banish many artificial blushes, or even to induce one, which is natural. Such is my chagrin at the failure of all my projects for reforming the painted sinner, that I have serious thoughts of endeavouring to profit by the sale of rouge. I find that in despite of all my lessons, the ladies will sometimes resort to "Vanity Fair," and

..... "walk the place

Through tape, toys, tinsel, paint, perfume, and lace."

They may read STERNE, and prattle about the "milk of human kindness," but their earnest inquiry is for the milk of roses, and an ounce of white lead, in their false scales of estimation, too often outweighs the solidity of sense and the worth of virtue.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE late closing of the play-house doors, which, of course, barred out our review from the Port Folio, however grateful to our indolence, propitious to our love of reading, and our coyness to write, is a circumstance that excites our genuine regret for the loss of those who may be justly stiled the faithful servants of the public. Indeed, it may be made a very interesting question, whether the lovers of rational amusement have not lost as well as the managers.

Prior to the temporary suspension of our theatrical amusement, The Wedding in Wales was played, and in a manner, we have no hesitation in declaring incomparably superior to the first performance. The house, though thin from the usual causes, was attentive to the story; charmed with the song, and liberal of their praise. Mr. Bernard in the epilogue appeared to be inspired by all the powers of Quaintness and Humour; and, on no occasion has Miss Westray displayed more vivacity and archness than was witnessed and applauded in her character of the lively Welsh spinster.

The deficiency of public encouragement compelled the Managers to close the theatre for two successive nights, but it was opened with renovated attraction on Monday. We rejoiced at seeing the boxes respectably filled, notwithstanding the inclemency of the weather. The Point of Honour, of which, we have made frequent mention in our theatrical review for last season, was revived on that evening. The name of Cooper was no longer affixed to a character which he conceived, and expressed with unusual energy; but the attraction of that of Mrs. Merry, in Bertha, held the balance even. Her wonderful powers imparted to this character an interest, of which we had scarcely thought it posset. Mr. Warren was the substitute for Cooper in Major St. Franc. Although this part be out of his general line of acting, and although he had to contend against the vivid recollection which all play-going Christians retain of the excellence of his predecessor, he was, as he always is, respectable.

The play was succeeded by a grand heroic pantomime called Hercules and Omphale. In this piece, some of the decorations so liberally bestowed upon the tragedy of Alexander the Great are interwoven with much new scenery and magnificent spectacle. Founded upon the fictions of classical antiquity, the story possesses an interest which is rarely excited by pantomime. Considering the extent and variety of its decorations, it went off with great correctness. Some novelties had a peculiarly happy effect; among these the shower of fire deserves to be particularly mentioned. Upon the whole, we think that we may venture to affirm, that for elegant scenery and splendid pageantry, this pantomime has been, hitherto, unrivalled on the American stage.

MISCELLANY.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS,
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

THE London monthly Magazine, conducted by Dr. Aikin, &c. and contributed to by Drs. Priestley, Beddoes, &c. contains much ingenious literary matter, whenever the writers choose to let church and state alone. The following is a most exquisite piece of poetry, which the good taste of the above writers has snatched from oblivion... The delightful images in every couplet will be eagerly gazed at by every lover.

"If I swear by that eye, you'll allow
Its look is so shifting and new,
That the oath I might take on it now,
The very next glance would undo."

Those babies that nestle so sly,
Such different arrows have got,
That an oath on the glance of an eye
Such as yours may be off in a shot!
Should I swear by the dew on your lip,
Though each moment the treasure renews,
If my constancy wishes to trip,
I may kiss off the oath, when I choose.
Or a sigh may disperse from that flower
The dew, and the oath that are there,
And I'd make a new vow ev'ry hour,
To loose them so sweetly in air!
But clear up the heaven of your brow,
Nor fancy my faith is a feather;
On my heart I will pledge you my vow,
And they must be both broken together!"

In the course of my reading I am never more pleased than when I meet some memorial of the versatile talents of Sir WILLIAM JONES, who had the rare good fortune to flourish among a liberal people; to be instructed by PARR, and SUMNER; to possess all the gifts of mind; to challenge the boon of riches, and the shouts of praise, and to resist the sleep of sloth and withstand the blandishments of pleasure.

The British critics analyzing one of his last literary labours, have thus justly praised this accomplished orientalist.

"But there is another circumstance, which recommends this work to our peculiar regard. It is among the last labours of a very eminent and industrious scholar, whose exertions in the cause of literature and of mankind, death has prematurely interrupted. That he has not left his equal behind him for genius and for diligence it may be thought extravagant to maintain. But where shall we look for his persevering courage and ardour of curiosity? The thirst for wealth has always excited, and will still continue to excite, thousands to brave the perils of the ocean, and the utmost severities of climate. It was reserved for sir WILLIAM JONES, and perhaps for him alone, to pursue knowledge with unabated ardour, and unexampled success, in defiance of the scorching suns of India, and the still more dangerous allurements of its pleasures."

I frequently turn over the charming odes of the Anacreon of Persia, and suffer delighted Fancy to cross "the stream of Rocknabad," or loiter in the gay "bower of Mosellay." The following is copied with a hope that the ingenious "P. D." will give it a poetical dress. Not to mention a word of his tardiness of invention or the mediocrity of his rhymes, the "author" is too laboriously engaged in reading poetry to have any leisure to combine a couplet.

Ode from the Persian of Hafiz, translated by Sir W. Ouseley.

I cannot relinquish the delights of love and a flowing cup; I have vowed an hundred times to forsake them; I vow, but I can do no more.

The garden of Paradise, the celestial shades, and the bowers of the lovely Houris are not equal in my opinion, to the mansion of her, whom I adore.

If, as 'tis said, angels are not affected with the power of love; I, a mere mortal, cannot conceive that which constitutes their felicity.

In the time of prayer, the graceful form of my beloved obtrudes itself on my imagination; and induces a Mussulman to become the worshipper of an idol.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

LONDON FASHIONS FOR DECEMBER.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.—The prevailing colours are scarlet, pink, and purple. Black bear muffs and tippets, long before, and in the form of handkerchiefs, are general for morning, and walking-dress; and white muffs and tippets for full dress. Feathers and flowers of all descriptions are universal: long scarlet ribbons are worn round the bosom, from which miniatures are or lockets suspended. Caps in full dress, are more prevalent than last winter.

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

The Ladies of Fashion have taken again the oblong Caps, but the silver bands with which they were ornamented are entirely exploded and replaced by Pearls. Hats of the newest fashion are made with black and rose-colour satin. Instead of the stiff plumes called Esprits, sometimes a long and waving feather is substituted in their place. Flat feathers are generally worn. Shawls are as ridiculous as they are troublesome, by their extreme fullness, but notwithstanding they are considered as very elegant.

The following account of an interesting little volume lately republished, will we, hope attract attention. The writer of it informs us that, it was intended as a preface to the American edition, but was received too late by the publisher. The work is entitled "The Progress of the Pilgrim, Good Intent," in Jacobinical Times."

FROM the earliest times Christianity has had to contend with many enemies. During the four first centuries, the sword of persecution was unsheathed against the followers of a meek and lowly Saviour. By the unrelenting rage of Julian, the very foundations of our religion were threatened to be rooted from the earth. Antichrist afterwards arose, unfurled his bloody banners, and moved with impetuosity in his conquests. The voice of Infidelity, has, through every age, been heard opposing the word of truth, and blaspheming the Son of God. The arm of power, the tongue of sophistry have repeatedly been exerted against Divine Revelation and its peaceable Disciples.

The eighteenth Century has, however, witnessed machinations against the Christian Religion, beyond all others the most artful, the most wicked, and the most formidable. There was a time when the bold arrogance of Human Reason was silent, and when Infidelity dared only in the cloak of Philosophy to look upon the day: but lately we have seen it leagued with political frenzy in the attempt to overthrow and to destroy: lately we have heard it proclaiming its tenets in the plainest and most undisguised terms, without the gaiety of Shaftesbury, the originality of Bolingbroke, or the subtlety of Hume. The dark counsels of the Illuminati, have been directed against the fountain of truth, the stability of government, and the peace of the world. Voltaire, without solidity of talents or profundity of erudition, but with a mind wonderfully versatile, may be considered as the leader of that daring sect. He called to his aid the weightier sagacity of D'Alembert and Diderot, and even seduced the King of Prussia to enlist under his command. France and Germany were designated as the first subjects for the operation of their principles; and the convulsions of France, the unparalleled outrages which she has witnessed, the Jacobinical banditti which she has nourished, the blood of the innocent which has streamed from her scaffolds, the groans which were heard from the prisons of despair, have declared how deadly was the poison. To doubt the existence of a Society which has been termed Illuminati, would be to disbelieve all truth which depends upon the testimony of men. To the world they have been detected and exposed by the writings of Robison and Barreul. The works of the Illuminées themselves are open to the inspection of all who would rather examine and be convinced, than obstinately persist in ignorance. The late Lord Orford, during his residence in France, in a letter to his friend General Conway, mentions, the formation of a Society, for the purpose of overthrowing the Christian Religion.*

The people of Great-Britain, and those of the United States, have felt the infection of principles which partake of the nature of those which have been mentioned. It is not to be denied, that we have heard the sound of a spirit which rages to destroy the authority not only of man, but of God. To this perturbed spirit, will every soul of virtue say, hence from this land, which has hitherto owned the empire of virtue—back to thy abodes of terror and of woe. England has lately produced a writer, who has become the favourite Apostle of Infidelity in the present day. With a command of language which but few have equalled and with originality, at least in effrontery, Godwin has proclaimed his ideas of Political Justice, and admiring numbers have acknowledged his sway.—Voltaire has taught him some of his sneers at religion; Condorcet has given him some of his stupid opinions on the mind, and Rousseau has told him that Eloisa and my Lord B. were people of the strictest virtue. Had the Illuminati systematised their theories, they would most probably have exactly corresponded with those of William Godwin. The herd of females which they intended to form, for the purposes of licentious indulgence, this philosopher's opinions would admit as a school of rational pleasure—their theoretical government, his doctrines would inculcate as the best to promote the general happiness, and to cherish the generous spirit in man.

While the enemy is rushing in like a flood, it is the duty of all who love their God and their fellow creatures, to lift up the standard against them. In discharge of this duty, many works have been written which must carry conviction to the hearts of all who are willing to believe. Among these works, "The Progress of the Pilgrim Good In- tent in Jacobinical Times," holds a station of merit and of influence. Public estimation in England has already called for three editions of this performance. It is now published for a second time, from an American press, in hope that it may promote the cause of religion and virtue. Its design is to expose the reigning infidelity of the present day, to show the inconsistencies, the dangers, and the inextricable calamities into which they lead. It follows the footsteps of the Pilgrim Good Intent, through the mazes of deluding Philosophy, through all the trials, the perils, and distresses which as a sinner he had to encounter, and finally conducts him in the company of Resignation, Faith and Certainty, to the Celestial City, where his enemies could not pursue him, but where glowing and everlasting transport received him. In imitation of the manner of the Pilgrim's Progress, the style of this performance is allegorical. Allegory has always been a popular method of conveying instruction, and is adapted to the capacities of all men. Instead of winding through the intricacies of reasoning, it follows a chain of facts—While it enlightens the understanding, it captivates the attention, interests the affections, and leaves a deep impression upon the memory. If systems cannot be built or overthrown by allegory, it can pourtray some of their greatest excellencies, it can expose some of their most formidable evils. It would, however, have been sufficient to say, that our Saviour spoke by parable, and he has thereby approved and sanctioned allegorical representations.

These remarks are offered merely as a desultory Preface to an anonymous work, which is considered as calculated to be useful among inquiring men; and as far as these opinions may have influence, it is recommended as a work happy in the manner which has been adopted, and successful in the execution.

From the Newburyport Herald we extract the following note of the same work.

NEW PILGRIM'S PROGRESS;

Or, The Progress of the Pilgrim Good Intent in Jacobinical Times.

This work is written in a handsome stile; shows an intimate knowledge of the things concerning which it treats with a strong conviction of the worth of government and religion.—Good-Intent sets out from the town of Sincerity to travel to the Celestial City. Among other adventures, he, and his companions, Mr. Curiosity, Mr. Credulity, Mr. Hothead, Mr. Party-spirit, and others, are allured to the palace of Mr. Philosophy into which they enter over the serpentine stream of False Research.

The scenes here are well imagined to discover the dishonest arts of infidels by which men are led from christianity, and respect for social order, to be the promoters of anarchy and atheism. Infidels are in the habit of deceiving all, who listen to them, by calling religion superstition, government despotism, and church order persecution.

In the apartment of Mr. Rational Christian, as he called himself, Good-Intent saw the means by which Priestly and others, built their system of natural or rational religion on the ruins of Christianity. They form a scheme in their own minds; they reject all scriptures which contradict them. This, Good-Intent discovered to be real DEISM.

At the dwelling of Sentiment the Porter, whose house was kept by Philanthropy, Moral Energy, Sensibility and Refinement, he saw the follies of a numerous class of people. The admirers of Novels and Romances, the pretenders to the moral virtues without the christian graces, who think it religion to weep over a wounded butterfly, while they drive a hungry beggar from their door, who think themselves good, if they converse sentimentally, and shed tears of sensibility, though they neglect the duties, and reject the doctrines of the gospel; these persons will see themselves in the house of Mr. Sentiment. The house was full of books to show, that moral virtues, without christian piety, exists only in books, not in real life. Those ardent readers, who affect to have them are mere pretenders.

Like all works of genius the uniformity of its excellence renders it difficult to determine what parts to select as specimen of the performance.

BIOGRAPHY.

LIFE OF COLLEY CIBBER.

COLLEY CIBBER, a person eminent in the history of the English stage as an actor, manager, and dramatic writer, was born in London, in 1671. His father, a native of Holstein, was a statuary, who came over to England some time before the restoration. Though not among the more eminent names of his profession, he was an artist of considerable merit; and has left several specimens of his talents in London, of which the most noted are the figures of raving and melancholy madness, placed at the entrance of Bethlem hospital. Colley bore the name of his mother, the descendant of a good family in Rutlandshire. His first education was at the free-school of Grantham, whence his father hoped to get him elected into Winchester college, where he had a claim on account of his maternal descent from William of Wykeham; but he was disappointed. It was then intended to send him to the university; but some circumstances prevented altogether the design of bringing him up for the church, and at length he pursued the inclination he had long felt for the stage, and at the age of eighteen entered as a performer at Drury-lane theatre. His encouragement was at first very small; yet his hopes of success induced him to venture on a matrimonial engagement.... The first part in which he attracted much notice, was that of Fondlewife, in Congreve's Old Batchelor. He imitated in it the manner of the popular comedian, Dogget, with great success; and the cast of ridiculous old characters was ever after one in which he was most admired. In 1696, he first appeared as a dramatic author; and his comedy of "Love's Last Shift, or the Fool in Fashion," was pronounced by lord Dorset the best first play he had known. He himself acted the principal character, that of a fashionable fop or coxcomb; and this cast also proved happily suited to his talents. A distinguished subject of that species, the lord Foppington of Vanbrugh's Relapse, was committed to Cibber's representation, and acquired him great applause. Another comedy, in 1697, entitled "Woman's Wit," was but indifferently received; and his tragedy of "Xerxes," in 1699, only proved how inadequate his talents were to sublime and dignified composition. This piece stood the stage only one night, a circumstance to which the Tattler alludes in an humorous inventory of a theatrical sale, under the title of "The Imperial robes of Xerxes never worn but once." The comedy of "Love makes a Man, or the Fop's Fortune," formed by Cibber out of two plays of Beaumont and Fletcher (for he had no scruple of profiting by the invention of others), proved very successful, and still occasionally appears in our theatres. Another pleasant bustling piece, also with a borrowed plot, "She would and She would not, or the Kind Impostor," was among his successful attempts. It was followed, in 1706, by "The Careless Husband," a comedy on which his principal reputation is founded, and which obtained the praise even of Pope, a man never his friend, and at last his bitterest satirist. It is, however, by no means a perfect play, being almost entirely without plot, and depending chiefly upon smart conversation-scenes, and the display of some lively rattling characters, with which the stage at that time abounded. Though its professed purpose is the reclaiming of a faithless husband, yet the virtuous wife is but barely endured, and all the superiority is given to the easy agreeable rake. But Cibber was not a man from whom much moral accuracy could be expected. It is needless to enumerate all his other dramatic pieces, of which some were successful, some otherwise. His importance as an actor and a writer continued upon the whole to increase; and in 1711 he subjoined the character of manager, by becoming a joint patentee of Drury-lane theatre. His knowledge of the world and of the public taste, rendered him a very useful associate to his brother-managers, Wilks and Dogget. At the accession of George I. a new patent was made out to Wilks, Cibber, Booth, and Steele. This association for some time went on amicably; but sir Richard's necessities obliging him to make continual calls upon the common stock, the rest at length refused further advances. This resolution so offended Steele, that he withdrew from the business of the theatre; on which account, the acting managers made a deduction from his receipts. A chancery suit was the consequence, and Cibber pleaded the common cause before sir Joseph Jekyll, master of the rolls, with so much clearness and judgment, that a decision was given in their favour. To conclude the topic of his managerial conduct, it appears that his opinion respecting dramatic pieces was not always to be depended upon, and that his behaviour to authors, especially young ones, was often highly insolent and overbearing, which exposed him to some severe retaliation.

In 1717, Cibber brought out his comedy of "The Nonjuror," a free imitation of Moliere's Tartuffe, pointed against the Jacobite party which at that time was a considerable object of apprehension, as well as of aversion to the friends of the Hanoverian succession. It had a great run at the theatre, and procured for the author a liberal donation from the king; but it increased the number of his enemies, and exposed him to much hostility in his dramatic career. The ridicule employed against him, had a wider scope from his appointment in 1730 to the post of poet-laureat. This appendage of a court, which, even the decent abilities of several later incumbents, has hardly been able to preserve from becoming ridiculous, was rendered completely so by the hapless lyrics of Cibber. The laugh was raised against him from all quarters; and had the court had any reputation to lose as a judge and patron of literature, this unfortunate appointment could not have failed to injure it. Cibber, however, who was not easily disconcerted, had the sense to join the laugh over his butt of sack, rather than attempt to vindicate his poetical character. About this time, he parted with his share in the patent, and withdrew from the business of the stage. He acted, indeed, occasionally, to an advanced age, nor was his vigour apparently abated, when, in his seventy-fourth year, he performed the part of Pandolph in his own play of "Papal Tyranny." To close the account of his dramatic works, it may be mentioned that he completed Vanbrugh's unfinished and excellent play of the "Provoked Husband, or Journey to London." Cibber's additions consist in the scenes of altercation between lord Townley and his lady.

In 1740, Cibber greatly amused the public by a work of biography and anecdote, entitled, "An Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian, and late Patentee of the Theatre-royal. With an historical View of the Stage during his own time." The sprightliness and good-humoured frankness with which this is written, together with the abundance of anecdote, and the real judgment with which several distinguished performers are characterized, rendered it a very popular work, and have supported its reputation to the present day. It has been a misfortune to his memory, that, from some cause, or probably an accumulation of causes, of which one was, doubtless, party-difference, he so grievously offended Pope, that this powerful and irritable bard has taken peculiar pains to transmit him in unfavourable colours to posterity. Not contented with several satirical strokes interspersed in his works, Pope has, in the later editions of his "Dunciad," dispossessed Theobald of his painful pre-eminence as its hero, and installed Cibber in his stead, though to the injury of his first conception of that character.

Cibber did not suffer these attacks in silence.... He expostulated with Pope in two letters, in which he sometimes appears to have the advantage both in serious remonstrance and jocular railery: and from the tempers of the two, it cannot be doubted that at the time, the contest was more painful to Pope than to Cibber. But Pope's satire is immortal, whereas Cibber's sarcasms are no longer read. Cibber may, therefore, be represented to future times with less credit for abilities, than he really deserves; for he was certainly no dunce, though not, in the higher sense of the word, a man of genius. His effrontery and vanity could not be easily overcharged, even by a foe. Indeed, they are striking features in the portrait drawn by himself.

A work of his old age, of a very different cast from those already mentioned, was "The Character and Conduct of Cicero considered, from the History of his Life, by the Reverend Dr. Middleton, &c. &c." quarto, 1747. Here he had certainly got out of his depth. The work was never valued, and is now forgotten. Cibber finished his long and busy course, at the close of 1757, when he entered upon his eighty-seventh year. He had several children. One of them, Theophilus Cibber, adopted both his father's professions, of actor and dramatic writer, but with inferior success. He was a character of thorough meanness and depravity, and finished a life of distress and infamy by shipwreck, in his passage to Ireland. Cibber's youngest child, Charlotte, who married Mr. Charke, a performer on the violin, was also brought on the stage; but that was one only out of a multiplicity of parts she acted in life; and perhaps no woman ever passed through a greater variety of adventures and occupations. They all terminated, however, in profligacy and wretchedness.

POLITICS.

The subsequent Sketch is "crayon'd out," in bold colours. It is spirited and faithful. The Editor chooses to preserve it, as characteristic of the political visage of America.

[From a correspondent at Washington, to the Editor of the Gazette of the United States.]

"COL. BURR's vote to refer the bill, for destroying the judiciary, to a select committee has greatly puzzled the Virginia party:—indeed his whole conduct is incomprehensible to them. Instead of lodging and boarding (as Mr. Jefferson did when Vice-President) at an Inn, he has taken a handsome suite of rooms and lives in the style of a perfect gentleman. All invitations to drink Toddy, and play cards, at Tunnickliff's Hotel, with the Virginians, have been declined, and he is not upon terms of familiarity with any one of them. It is said he has no great personal respect for the Virginia members, and indeed from what I've seen of them they are not calculated to excite the veneration of such a gentleman as Mr. Burr. I attended in the Senate when the resolution for destroying the judiciary was debated; it is impossible for me to convey by any description I can give, a correct idea of the splendour and profoundness of the argument. Mr. Morris's speech was a mighty effort of his mighty mind. 'Twas eloquent and augmentative, far beyond any thing my imagination had conceived possible. A crowded gallery and lobby seemed electrified, and his manner was quite as imposing, dignified and graceful as his speech was full of learning, argument, and brilliancy....Mr. Tracy's was also highly Ciceronian, and the speeches of Mr. Hillhouse and Mr. White were greatly impressive. The most able from the ministerial side of the house were those of Mr. Baldwin and General Mason; who are unquestionably far, very far, superior to any of their party. Mr. Brackenridge has been much puffed by little Smith, the printer here, but without having in the least merited it, as you must know by having seen his speech; 'tis a feeble thing, and all the argumentative part is taken from a piece written on this subject by Mr. Taylor of Virginia, and published in the Examiner at Richmond under the signature of Fabricius. It is said, the puffs direct, and indirect, which have been given to this speech by the friends of Mr. B. and by himself, have made him as vain as a turkey, and that he really believes himself to be a second Daniel. In the house of representatives Mr. Giles leads the ministerial phalanx, and is the only member of it whose capacity is adequate to the conducting the measures of the party. Mr. Randolph attempted to lead, but failed; he has good talents for declamation, but his best friends do not give him credit for any thing more. Mr. Giles went home some time ago, and in his absence many of his subalterns claimed the command; the consequence was, they split and divided among themselves daily. On the return of Mr. Giles a grand caucus was held in the assembly room here; he amalgamated the party; they agreed there should, for some days, be a dumb legislation; that they would act, but not debate. This strong proof of subordination was not refused to Mr. Giles, and nothing was said for two days by the ministerial party. There are many who suppose all this was designed as contempt and disrespect towards the friends of the constitution, but I know (without being at liberty to acquaint you from what source) their real object was to muzzle some of their own party who had become troublesome. An old gentleman from Massachusetts, by the name of Bacon, had fretted his party sadly, and this arrangement served to drill and keep him quiet. He is a garrulous old gentleman, talking every day, on every subject, and to the annoyance of every body. He is in one sense a moving speaker, for when he rises the whole house is in motion and on the wing, although the speaker, wishing to divide with his friends the painful task of hearing, is constantly roaring "to order"....There are two of the Jersey gentlemen who are mighty hum drum orators; prior to the grand caucus they were vastly troublesome and spoke daily. Dr. Eustis and Dr. Mitchell are said to be gentlemen of talents; they have the manners and air of polished gentlemen; they however are not fitted for buffeting in the tempestuous sea on which the Virginians have launched them, and seem to take but little share in the business of the house. Although the ministerial party constitute a monstrous majority in Congress, they are not satisfied, because some gentlemen, on whom they had counted are not with them. Mr. Tillinghast of Rhode-Island votes uniformly with the constitutionalists: this is not relished, and Mr. Ellery a fat well tempered senator from Rhode-Island, assures his messmates at Tunnickliff's tavern, that I shall not be elected again; apropos of Rhode-Island; a ridiculous thing occurred yesterday in the Senate; Mr. Theodore Foster rose, and after addressing the President for two minutes, stopped short; after a considerable pause he continued, "Really sir, I must sit down, for I have forgot."....The passage of the bill to destroy our judiciary may be much obstructed, but it will pass. Mr. Jefferson has set his heart upon this measure; 'tis his favourite measure, and his party will (whatever scruples some of them may feel about the unconstitutionality of it) make this desired offering to his revengeful spirit. I have been told, by members of Congress of both parties, that Louisiana has certainly been ceded by Spain to Buonaparte, and that the fleets we have heard were about to sail from Erest, were destined for St. Domingo and the Mississippi. Since being here, I have attended very constantly the debates in both houses. Although the constitutionalists are not strong in numbers they are prodigiously so in talents; in the house they have many able men; the Connecticut delegation are a host in themselves; the most active and pre-eminent of the constitutionalists are Messrs. Griswold, Bayard, Rutledge and Dana; the last of these gentlemen is highly distinguished by his wit and ingenuity. Mr. Giles has put his paw upon the mint establishment and it will go; indeed I fear all our national establishments will be crushed one after another."

[The following, copied from Mr. Colman's paper, though it relates to a local misrepresentation in a Jacobin paper at New-York, deserves particular attention. Because, while it does justice to the political opinions of Gen. HAMILTON, Mr. ADAMS, and Mr. JAY, it completely refutes a popular misrepresentation respecting the real character and views of the federal party.]

COMMUNICATION.

To detect and expose the daily misrepresentations and falsehoods of the American Citizen, is little short of the toil of Sisyphus; and as far as respects the editor of that paper, the labour is equally fruitless. It is also hoped, that but a small part of the community are so far under the influence of party spirit, as to give credit to his slander; but least some should be led to believe what they see often repeated without contradiction, it becomes a duty to guard against such imposition.

In the Citizen of Tuesday, the editor asserts, that the federal party "was originally composed of Tories who fought against the revolution; Tories who retired within the British lines during the conflict, and some revolutionary officers who embarked in the contest to gratify personal ambition, and to farther private views, but who never felt the glow of republicanism at heart. Amongst a host of those characters, we may rank General Hamilton, John Adams, and John Jay, with a numerous band of minor federalists."

Has the rage of party so far swallowed up every feeling of genuine patriotism, so effectually extinguished in the bosom of true Americans the love of country, as to permit a fugitive foreigner thus to asperse the characters of men, who boldly risked their lives in support of our independence, and whose purity of motives has never before been doubted? No difference in political sentiment, merely, can justify so impudent a calumny. The integrity of these gentlemen has been witnessed and acknowledged by their countrymen; whatever difference may obtain on the subject of present public measures, it is confidently hoped that every real American will indignantly frown upon such base attempts to rob them of what is eminently their right. It is difficult indeed to perceive how any conscientious man can reconcile it to himself, to countenance one, whose habitual conduct is a reproach to the party whose interests he advocates.

This editor spares no opportunity of blackening the character of General Hamilton; he distorts every circumstance in his life, and propagates every falsehood that malice can invent, to destroy his fame. A name at once so formidable and so hostile to the schemes of such people as Cheetham, cannot but excite the most lively fear and deadly hatred; whatever therefore can lessen its influence or ruin the confidence reposed in it, must be seized on without scruple; if it will but answer these purposes no matter how gross the calumny.—Pursuing this plan the editor of the Citizen declares, that General Hamilton "introduced into the Convention, as is well known, a monarchical system of government, and endeavoured, by intrigue and by eloquence, to impose it upon them. Hence, after it was found impracticable to institute a monarchical government, General Hamilton, determined to do all he could, if not all he wished, became a zealous and conspicuous advocate of those branches of the constitution which savour most of royal power."

How far this is consistent with the complaint of the editor just before, that the proceedings of the Convention are at this moment wrapped in mystery, is left for him to shew; for certainly if the account he gives be correct, it must be pretty evident that whatever mystery there may have been it has been effectually unfolded. This remark is meant to have no other importance, than to shew that even from his own mouth, this editor stands convicted of inaccuracy if not of untruth....But the charge itself as it is explicitly made deserves an explicit reply, and it is therefore asserted in the most unequivocal manner, that it is FALSE; and the editor of the Citizen is challenged to produce the shadow of a proof in support of what he asserts to be a fact well known. Besides this assertion another shall now be made of hardly less consequence; the correctness of which, however it may be doubted by others, we confidently assert will not be denied by Mr. Maddison himself, or any one speaking for him....Mr. Maddison was the man in the Convention who favoured the highest-toned form of government.

General Hamilton was among those who proposed and advocated in the Convention our present Constitution; he afterwards exerted all his masterly talents, both as a writer and a speaker, to procure its adoption, and he has never ceased to lend it all his support. In the organization of our government under it, he has given so many and such irrefragable proofs of his all-comprehensive mind, as justly to entitle him to the gratitude of his country....Posterity at least will appreciate his distinguished worth, and notwithstanding the pigmy efforts of his sworn foes, "A grateful fame shall wait upon his memory....Unfading honours shall gather round his monument and thicken over it."

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

DAVID LONGWORTH of New-York, noted for being the proprietor of a Shakspeare Gallery, and for taste in beautiful editions, plates, &c. proposes publishing a number of volumes, which shall include the productions of the most celebrated modern poets. The editor of these projected volumes is of opinion that the increased taste of the public for works of merit, executed in an elegant style, is an incitement to this undertaking. He contemplates using a licence, which he thinks will meet approbation. Among the writings of poets, even of considerable celebrity, there is much inequality; and some things, occasionally, escape their pens, scarcely worthy of perusal. It is presumable that the purchasers of elegant copies of poetry would wish the contents to be in the same style of superiority with the execution, and as free as possible from alloy. He, therefore, though he does not contemplate a mutilation of works of merit, proposes omitting such productions as shall appear inferior and uninteresting. The first volume will contain "The Pleasures of Memory," by Mr. Rogers, and "The Pains of Memory," by Mr. Merry, with other Poems, by Rogers, some of which have but just appeared.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IN the ironical "Advice to the Officers of the British Navy," a pamphlet modelled after Swift's

"Directions to Servants," is the following curious lesson to the lieutenant.

After being relieved in any of the night watches, when you pass the beds of the other officers in the way to your own, shake them one by one, till you are sure the drowsy fellows are perfectly awake, and then tell them that it is a fine night, that the wind has shifted a quarter of a point, or any thing else remarkable, and they will certainly be much obliged by your attention and kindness.

A country gentleman was once allured to town by the promises of the duke of Newcastle, who for many months kept him in constant attendance, until the poor man's patience being quite exhausted, he one morning called upon his patron, and told him that he had at length got a place. And pray, sir, said the duke, where is your place. In the Gloucester couch, replied the disappointed expectant.

The Aurora says, "No man is more persuaded of his own consequence than Mr. Dana, of Connecticut." With due deference to the sage of Clonmell, we humbly conceive that there is one man in the world, who appears to be more persuaded of his own consequence than Mr. Dana; and that is the man, who, some time since, called upon the democrats throughout the United States, if they had any petition to make to congress, to apply to HIM, and assured them that HE would attend to their requests; who, in telling the story of Dr. Logan's fainting-fit, related to the public, as a principal circumstance, that the accident happened near HIS house, and to render the account more exquisitely affecting, informed us, that several members of congress had just left HIM; and who, still more recently, undertook to render the constitutionality of a repeal of the judiciary act "more clearly understood," after Mason, and Baldwin, and Breckenridge, and Jackson, and even Wright, and Cocke had in vain exhausted their talents in the endeavour. "This is the trout that must be caught with tickling," and we are told that several members of congress actually amuse themselves, in their hours of relaxation, by bestowing attentions upon him, for no other purpose than to see to what a ridiculous height his vanity and fancied consequence may be carried.

In criticising the dress or the manners of our fair country-women, it is not quite fair to measure them entirely by a foreign standard. We should remember PRIOR's pleasant account of the diversities of custom.

We simple toasters take delight
To see our women's teeth look white,
And every saucy ill-bred fellow
Sneers at a mouth profoundly yellow.
In China none hold women sweet,
Except each tooth is black as jet.
King Chihu put nine queens to death,
Convict on statute....Ivory teeth,
An equal instance in this matter,
Is in the manners of a daughter.
In Europe if a harmless maid,
By nature and by love betray'd,
Should, ere a wife, become a nurse,
Her friends would look on her the worse.
In China, Dampier's Travels tell ye,
Look in his index for Pagelli,
Soon as the British ships unmoor,
And jolly long-boat rows to shore,
Down come the nobles of the land,
Each brings his daughter in his hand,
Beseeching the imperious tar
To make her but one hour his care.
The tender mother stands affrighted,
Lest her dear daughter should be slighted,
And poor miss Yaya dreads the shame,
Of going back the maid she came.

The French poets and philosophers have been much inclined to infidelity. Who is ignorant of the hatred, cherished by Voltaire and Rousseau against the christian religion, and, according to Herault de Sechelle's account of Buffon, he appears to have been an atheist.

In the printing house of that great scholar, Henry Stevens, every person spoke Latin from the garret to the kitchen, from the master to the old-maid, who served in the shop. The brothers were so very anxious to have all books accurately printed at their press, that, after diligently examining every sheet twice before they printed it off, they put out a third proof at their door, and promised a louis d'or to any person that should find a fault in it.

We are told by a connoisseur, that whoever would wish to see the pictures of TITIAN, in their utmost possible perfection, should visit Spain, the warm and dry air of that country having still preserved the brilliancy of his colours. The colour is entirely gone in that sublime piece of the Cornaro family, belonging to the duke of Northumberland.

Mr. Seward says of MONTAIGNE, that he has an energy of thought, and a raciness and force of expression, that we but rarely meet with in any of our essay writers, except Jeremy Collier. His essays would well bear another translation than that which Cotton has made of them, in whose flimsy language, the spirit and nerve of the honest and spirited Gascon lose all their strength and effect.

Philip II was a man of such phlegm, that having sat up a whole night with his secretary to write a dispatch, the secretary, overpowered with fatigue, and not knowing what he did, instead of strewing it with sand, when it was finished, by mistake took up the inkstand, and covered it with ink. Philip, nothing moved, took up the inkstand in one hand, and the sand box in the other, and presenting them to the secretary, said, Friend, remember another time that this is the ink, and that the sand.

In our house of representatives, there appears to be, on the majority side, a feeble band of chirping impertinents, who serve as a sort of avant couriers, to the leading Ciceros of the party.

When a husbandman claimed kinship with Robert Grosthead, bishop of Lincoln, and then requested from him an office. Cousin, said the bishop, if your cart be broken, I will mend it; if your plow be old, I'll give you a new one, and even seed to sow your land, but a husbandman I found you, and a husbandman I'll leave you. The prelate, who made this reply, knew nothing of the rights of man, of the dignity of republicans, nor was he versed in that blessed doctrine, which, confounding the order of nature, and distinctions of society, lifts up mean and unqualified persons to the heights of power, and depresses the noble, the learned and the virtuous. No, this old-fashioned bishop lived in benighted times, long before Common Sense was published, or the French revolution began.

Portsmouth, situated 43d. 5m. north. 70d. 41m. west from London, contains 5511 inhabitants. The town has been very healthful, not one in fifty-five having died. A billious remitting fever prevailed the whole year, which in several instances, in September and October, manifested the malignant type.... From June to October, the cholera infantum was prevalent. From September to the end of the year, the hooping cough was endemic, very few children escaped it. A fifth part have died of phthisis pulmonalis!!! "Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no physician there?"

The editor of the Aurora in one of his profound political letters from Washington, elegantly declares, that "the speech of Mr. Randolph was as severe as any thing I have heard! but couched in that mellow style of language, which, while it corrects, does not torture!" This, we suppose, is a specimen of the new phrase of our new times, this is a sort of reformed and Gregorian style of fashionable expression in our Washington court calendar. Here we have severity, equal to any thing the sage of Clonmell ever heard of, couched like a drowsy lion. Aye, and that same severity has found a soft couch! For he is couched in mellowness; and being thus in clover, or rather mellow himself, he does not even dream of torturing any one, but, like that harmless and fictitious lion in Shakspeare, roars as gently as any sucking dove, yea roars like any nightingale.

Duane assures us that "vast assemblages of ladies attend every day in the house of representatives, and that he foresees that, at no very distant period, the city of Washington is destined to be the centre of polished society." It is supposed that when this same city becomes another Paris, Mr. Duane will settle there, and that vast assemblages of Frenchmen, renegadoes, and other gentle beings will constitute the great school of urbanity.

One Cato, a black man, and writer in the Aurora, asserts, "that it would be very easy to settle all the disputes about the judiciary bill, if we only attend to the meaning of words, for in all the debates of our wise men, the word office has never been satisfactorily defined." On reading this extraordinary paragraph, we were fully persuaded that Messrs. Morris, Calhoun, Tracy, Bayard, &c. should be dispatched as a committee to Philadelphia to confer with this Aurora Lycurgus, and learn the exact definition of words.

Letters from the banks of the Delaware, corroborated by official dispatches from the coral caves of many a river God, announce that the shad, warmed by the genial heat of our winter, has forsaken his winter-quarters, and chooses to come on shore, and bask in Market-street. Shad, as all the morning papers affirm, are now "as plenty as blackberries" in autumn; and, for ourselves we are positive that in these fortunate revolutionary times, we shall gather fivepenny-bits from every parsley bed, and to meet herds of mammoths will be as common as to meet droves of sheep.

There is a Mr. Smilie in the house of representatives, a most unfortunate legislator, who labour-eth under a two-fold inconvenience, that of being perfectly unintelligible to others, and also of groping with so blunt a discernment, that he cannot find his own meaning. Mr. BAYARD, on a late occasion, was glad that this gentleman knew what he said, which was a very unusual thing.

We are glad to see in the shop of Mr. Humphreys, one of our active booksellers, a very copious list of subscribers to Parkinson's Chymical Pocket-book. This little volume presents, in a nut-shell, much useful science.

The popularity of Wordsworth's Ballads increases every hour. We are confident, that Messrs. Humphreys and Groff, the praise-worthy publishers of poetry, not unworthy of the muse of CHAT-TERTON, will be amply remunerated for their care and expense in publishing a complete and neat edition of verses, which will outlive their century.

One of the late eccentric song-writers in opera, has, in the manner of the facetious O'Keefe, declared, that his love is general, and affects

"The pretty maid,
The witty maid,
The napping maid,
The strapping maid,
The thinking maid,
The drinking maid,
The bold maid,
And the old maid,
The so so maid,
And the no maid."

Nay, what is still more strange, that he is a victim of

"The sleeping eye,
The weeping eye,
The strolling eye,
The rolling eye,
The hinting eye,
The squinting eye,
The dun eye,
And the one eye,
The so so eye,
And the no eye."

The file-leaders of democracy are obliged to keep watch and word over some of the slumberers among the herd. Many of those, who are only told by the head, are weary of long arguments against lucid truths, and with craving appetites and closing eyes, seem to wish that some one of their keepers would exclaim with Virgil's neat-herd,

"Ite domum, pasti, si quis pudor, ite juvenci."

The following matrimonial dialogue with a climax, will be allowed, by many a Benedick, to be characteristic.

Mrs. Souchong. I wish you would take me to Margate, my dear.

Mr. Souchong. I would much rather not, my duck.

But why not, my love?

Because I don't choose it, my sweet.

Not choose it, my darling?

I can't afford it, my precious.

Why not afford it, Mr. Souchong?

Because it is d—d expensive, Mrs. Souchong.

Expensive! why, neighbour Jenkins and his whole family are there, man.

Neighbour Jenkins is a fool, and his wife is no better than she should be, woman.

I think, however, you need not abuse my friends, sir.

I shall not imitate the example of your friends, madam.

Then if you won't go, I will; that's pox, husband.

And if you go, you don't have a penny from me, that's pox, wife.

An INSTRUCTED SENATOR, Mr. Stone, a senator, from North Carolina, repairs to Washington, to join a deliberative assembly, with a mind, manacled by the instructions of his constituents. To what an abject state of humiliation must the mind of a man of abilities be reduced, which could submit to be dictated to by the people, and instructed by ignorance. On this occasion, Mr. Morris observed, "I cannot but express my deep regret for his situation. Tied fast as he is by his instructions, arguments, however forcible, can never be effectual. I ought, therefore, to wish for his sake, that his mind may not be convinced by any thing I shall say; for hard indeed would be his condition, to be bound by the contrariant obligations of an order and an oath. I cannot, however, but express my profound respect for the talents of those, who gave him his instructions, and who, sitting at a distance, without hearing the arguments, could better understand the subject, than their senator on this floor, after full discussion."

The proud and accomplished EDMUND BURKE, once resisted, with manly vigour, an attempt to controul his mind, by the crude politics of his Bristol constituents. It is pleasant to the writer to copy and to implicitly believe the maxims of this brilliant scholar, this sagacious statesman, this genuine patriot.

"My colleague expresses himself in favour of the coercive authority of instructions.

"Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him: their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasures, his satisfactions, to their's; and, above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interest to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from Providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment, and he betrays, instead of serving you, if he sacrifice it to your opinion.

"My worthy colleague says, his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all, the thing is innocent. If government were a matter of will upon any side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not of inclination; and what sort of reason is that in which the determination precedes the discussion; in which one set of men deliberate, and another decide; and where those, who form the conclusion, are, perhaps, three hundred miles distant from those, who hear the arguments."

To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear; and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions; mandates issued, which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience; these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.

The debate in the House of Representatives, of the 15th instant, was considerably acrimonious, and we remark, that it turned chiefly upon the motion of Mr. Bayard, which was for a postponement of the bill, repealing the judiciary establishment, until the third Monday in March.

The honourable mover advocated his motion on the ground of expediency; alleging that no possible inconvenience or mischief could arise from the postponement, since the law if passed, on the instant, was not to take effect, until the first of July; that the interval would afford time to discern the operation of the proposed measure on the public mind, &c.

By the friends of the bill very strenuous, and, in some degree, intolerant opposition, was made to the postponement; this is the day, was the cry of some; this is our day, was the exclamation of others; while the emphatic language of those, who sorrowfully acknowledged, that they approached with dismay the constitutional question, was, this is not our day.

In the course of the preceding debate, we notice, with some small pleasure, one courteous exception, from the general complexion of majority remarks. The observations we refer to, fell from a gentleman, whose attainments as a polite scholar, we are not now to recognize, for the first time. As his words, breathe conciliation, rather than comfort, we have nothing to thank him for, save the urbanity of his diction. Take a specimen.

Mr. Randolph—I should not have arisen now, but from seeing the day nearly gone, and from being prepared for a re-iteration of motions that will consume the whole of it.

Other reasons are urged. We are told, the great constitutional question may be evaded; when I say so, I do not mean to impute to gentlemen any disposition to embarrass the discussion, but a disposition to shrink from a question, which they say, will give a stab to the constitution. Believing as they do, I think the fear an honourable fear; but thinking differently myself, it becomes me to speak differently. It becomes me to declare that this is a great constitutional question, that ought to be decided and decided soon. It ought not to be left till the public mind shall be acted upon incorrectly; till some twenty or thirty years hence, it shall be operated upon by war, by intrigue or by improper excitement. When I see all the dangerous motives, such as war without, and treason within, which too frequently operate, and compare the state of the country, under their influence, with its present situation, entirely free from them; I say this is the period for decision; for decided it must be. I feel for gentlemen, whose correct disposition it is, to shrink from a question, whose result must be adverse to them. I have been in the same situation. I, like them, have shrunk from some questions, but did they wait for me till their power was taken from them? According to this course, no decision can take place, but that which conforms to the fears of a minority, &c.

Here we cannot refrain from indulging an exclamation, which proceeds from the most solemn conviction of mind, in its contemplations, on this momentous subject. Happy, thrice happy would it be for the interests of this great and growing nation, if, in the language of this shining son of the ancient dominion, no decision should take place, on this occasion, "but that which conforms to the fears of a minority!"

The Legislature of the United States, is not "the only tribunal, before which, the great constitutional question, involved in the principle of this repealing bill, can be decided." The constitution of your country has said, that your "judges both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." This is a part of the charter of our land, settled, confirmed and adopted by conventions in all the states, and the national legislature have no right to expunge it from that instrument, by a law. "The constitution," (as was elegantly expressed, by Judge Patterson, in his celebrated charge* on a very important controversy) "encircles and renders it an

"holy thing. The constitution is certain and fixed; it contains the permanent will of the people, and is the supreme law of the land; it is paramount to the power of the Legislature, and can be revoked or altered only by the authority that made it. The life giving principle and the death-doing-stroke must proceed from the same hand. What are legislatures? Creatures of the constitution; they owe their existence to the constitution; they derive their powers from the constitution; it is their commission; and therefore, all their acts must be conformable to it, or else they will be void."

When two acquaintances meet in the rain, it is very natural for one of them to tell the other that it is a wet day; a simple assent to so evident a position is given, without stopping to controvert it, and so the matter ends. But it is far otherwise, when a man has to pay for a book and read many pages to be informed of matters that he knew before.

A clergyman in England in a sermon preached for the benefit of the Humane Society, instituted for the recovery of persons apparently dead by drowning, chose with exquisite felicity the following text from Acts 20, 12.... "They brought the young man alive, and were not a little comforted."

Circulating Libraries, now so general and useful, says an English writer, are of no greater standing than fifty or sixty years. The first in London was commenced in the Strand, by a bookseller of the name of Wright, about the year 1740; he was succeeded by Batho, who was succeeded by Mr. John Bell: his library has lately been sold at auction. The number of circulating libraries in Great Britain in 1800 was one thousand. In the Capital of the United States there are two, and Boston in New England boasts of one.

PROBLEMS

Proposed for the solution of Mr. Breckenridge.

A man is standing before a genial fire, when, by the intenseness of the weather, the thermometer is at the freezing point. If you remove him from the fire, he will assuredly freeze. Qu. if the fire be extinguished, whether he will still be warm?

Again, "There are two reapers in a field, one of which shall be taken away, and the other left." Qu. which of them would you take away, to have them both left?

[Farmer's Museum.

A paper entitled the Watchtower, published at New-York by one Cheatham, tells his readers that the elegant speech of Mr. Morris, of the Senate, on the repeal of the judiciary, is a weak performance. The man who thus wishes to deceive the ignorant and perhaps honest part of his customers, exhibits either weakness of intellect, or wickedness of heart, or both. [ibid.]

It is rumoured that the printing the United States laws in Massachusetts is given to the Editor of the National Ægis at Worcester. The same gentleman is also appointed postmaster. The original intention of publishing the laws was for their diffusion among the people; but how is the attainment of this object to be effected, by publishing them in a paper, just established, and which, we presume, has the smallest circulation of any one in Massachusetts? The attorney-general of the United States can probably solve this enigma. In Boston, they are now published in the Chronicle, but formerly in the Centinel, the latter of which has the greatest circulation of any paper in the state.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

I am a strenuous advocate for the system of reformation, which is the order of the day; and by which I hope, eventually, to see that tottering old building, THE CONSTITUTION, destroyed.

Our first step for this purpose, has been to direct the attention of the citizens to that part where they are most vulnerable...their purses. We have, in consequence, endeavoured to convince them, that a great many props of the fabric are very expensive, and of no use, and, therefore, ought to be pulled down; by which means (if we are successful), it will be left in such a situation, that, from the laws of gravitation, it must fall.

Pleasing myself with a belief that it might be of some service to my party, and thinking it proper (as long as they do not interfere with my interest) to give due praise to whatever has or may advance its schemes, I penned the following

ODE TO PARSIMONY.

....."Luxury's all turn'd out of doors, Frugality took in."

1.

O, GODDESS of the sallow cheek,
The hollow eye, the shrivell'd neck,
And brow with wrinkles clouded,
On broken crutch, with erring aim.
Supporting ill thy palsied frame,
In tatter'd blanket shrouded!

2.

Already we thy presence own,
Already is thine influence shewn,
Throughout this favour'd free land;
And soon shalt thou in warm debate
Display thyself in every state,
And reformation be plann'd.

3.

Although uncouth I own thy form,
Yet still thou hast such pow'r to charm
Our servants in high station,
That all shall chaunt thy praise with glee;
E'en Gallatin shall yield to thee
The purse strings of the nation.

O'er all our councils urge thy sway,
Their speech direct....their projects lay;
O give them thy protection!
Let each possess a miser's heart,
That we at waste no more may start,
Secure in thy direction.

5.

Then shalt thou, on our welfare bent,
Attentive thrice count o'er each cent,
And, spite of silly scoffers,
Against the fed'ral false pretence
Of necessary self defence,
Shut fast the public coffers.

6.

Why keep, to stun our peaceful ears,
Artillerists and engineers,
Who waste our ammunition?
Disband them every one....good Lord!
Une école militaire! (a) absurd!
'Tis quite an imposition!

7.

Stop not, but while with action warm,
Fill'd with the spirit of reform,
Cleanse the Augean stable:
Sell off at once the public stores,
The cannon, powder, ships, boats, oars;
Leave not a spar or cable.

(a) There are some federalists, who think an institution of this kind necessary, and affirm, that, without it, in case of war with any foreign power, we should be obliged, as formerly, to import engineers from Europe, as if native energy required the assistance of art! But grant their position, cannot engineers be hired as cheap as patriots? It is surely never worth our while to raise them. This argument holds good also against the naval school.

Thou knowest how inutile are Those ships prepar'd for barb'rous war,
That proudly brave the ocean;
And how much better 'tis to grant
Some millions an ally may want,
Than tempt that dread commotion, (b)

9.

What tho' by fell piratic pow'r,
Our merchants in unlucky hour
Were of their treasure plunder'd?
It makes no difference; to them
The loss had been the very same,
If Jove had storm'd or thunder'd.

10.

If Europe wishes us to pour
The gifts of Ceres from our store,
To keep her sons from starving;
Why, let her take them (d)....'tis confest,
That dinner is not worth the guest,
That is not worth the carving.

11.

Then see the forts unfinish'd lie,
Sans stores, sans troops, and loudly cry
"Were surely thus of no use!"
Oh! sell them, sell them....that's your plan,
Their seat, their stones and mortar can,
No doubt, some eagles produce.

12.

The judges....what a numerous band!
What service are they in a land,
Where vice so very scarce is?
Thy patience let them not abuse;
Nor longer listen to their use....
Their use!....a very farce is. (c)

13.

What halcyon times we soon shall have! (f)
What happiness, when thou shalt save
US from excise and duty!
The golden age again appears!

(b) I have heard, with much astonishment, that many of our merchants are dissatisfied with parts of our treaty with France. I wonder what they would have! A'nt it the best we could get? Havn't we had a great deal of trouble about it, and even sent the fashionable Mr. Dawson all the way to France for it? They want to persuade us, that, as the government was formed to take care of the liberty and property of all the citizens, it ought to pay them for their property, which it thought proper to make France a present of! But this sophism won't do. They'll find, that a "great, free, powerful, and independent nation," who chose to make that treaty, will also know how to reject all such claims on the treasury.

(d) See this profound argument urged with his usual eloquence, in (if they are yet in existence) Dr. Priestley's "Letters to the Inhabitants of Northumberland."

(e) The disbandment of the judicial army will destroy the greatest barrier to that acme of happiness, which, under our present administration, we are so rapidly progressing to. What but the enlarged ideas of public benefit, which our servants in power possess, could urge them to such exertions as they are making? They even labour (if I may be indulged in a favourite expression of a very pretty author of the present day, who delights to see his trifles, as he modestly terms them, printed with a neat type, on fine paper) con amore! They

"Give the guardian laws their majesty to know!"

I hope soon to see our fetters thrown aside, and, in place of all the parade of trial we have hitherto had, an imitation of the Athenian ostracism introduced, which is certainly more consonant to the individual dignity of mankind....Then shall no impudent Aristides dare to show his head amongst us.

(f) It will be perceived, that I had an eye on Virgil's

.....redeunt Saturnia Regna.

Whether Virgil or I have the best right to the expression, I leave to future commentators on us to determine; though I confess these are a kind of gentry I don't like. They pay no respect to persons. Indeed I should not be surprised, if some of them were stupid enough to compare the incomparable Jefferson to Augustus: or (parva componere magnis), me to Virgil.

The world regains its acorn years, (g)
In all their pristine beauty!

14.

And yet, sage Goddess, I confess
Tho' great thy merit and address,
There's one thing unattended,
The pay our servants still receive
Is more, I think, than we should give;
Pray, could not that be mended? (h)

15.

But pardon....sure the civic zeal
That those in pow'r (our servants) feel,
Unlike "politic sinners,"
Can ne'er permit them to debase
The dignity of human race,
By serving for their dinners!

16.

Oh, no!....e'en now I think I see
Each with his "hog and hominy,"
At luxury and state scowl;
And swear, full hearty, that a slice,
When sauc'd by thee, is far more nice
Than venison or wild fowl.

17.

Then from their meal, before they rise,
To drink perdition to excise,
Each takes his sup of whisky;
Delightful bev'rage! at whose shrine
(Debar'd by poverty from wine)
Thy poet oft gets frisky.

18.

Each senator, by thee inspir'd,
Then ("fill'd with fury, rapt, inspir'd,"
Or, like Sir Hugh, "in cholers,")
Shall loudly cry...."economize!"
The president himself, despise
His THIRTY THOUSAND DOLLARS!!!
ASMODEO.

(g) "Acorn years."...Some great philosophers have asserted, that mankind, at this happy time, fed upon acorns. Their opinion, however, has been contested by others, equally great, who affirm, that it was not the fruit of the quercus, because the glans is bitter, and therefore not palatable, but of the castanea, vulgarly called chestnut. But this controversy is too important for me to decide. It is very certain that, in process of time, mankind, disdaining the plain food of their ancestors, in consequence of an aristocratic party springing up amongst them, introduced the luxury of wheat, which, in a short time, destroyed all that natural simplicity, for which they were formerly distinguished. They even became so shameless, as to boast of their depravity by the establishment of the cereal.

(b) I was much pleased with an idea that dropped from one of the opposition, Mr. Bayard, which, however he meant it, is a very just one: i. e. he said, we might think the legislature, which costs the nation four or five hundred thousand dollars, useless; break it down, and import laws ready made from Westminster-hall, for ten or fifteen thousand dollars.

Eas est etiam ab hoste doceri. I think this hint ought not to be thrown away; though I would not approve of bringing our laws from Westminster-hall. We might hire people enough of our own to make them, at the price he mentions. Suppose the office set up at auction, and struck off to him, who would serve for the lowest wages?

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. VIII.

"In vain, poor nymph, to please my youthful sight,
You sleep in cream and frontlets all the night;
Your face with patches foil, with paints repair,
Dress with gay gowns, and shade with foreign hair."

FARNELL.

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

SIR,

I AM from the country, and having heard much of you, and of your good advice to the fair sex, I take the liberty of laying my case before you, in hopes that your good sense will direct me in my future conduct, and that your goodness of heart will sympathise with, and console me, under the weight of my present sufferings.

You must know then, sir, that I have been but one week married, to a most worthy young gentleman, whose natural honesty of disposition, and haughtiness of spirit cannot, even in a wife, brook or forgive deception. But I will relate all the facts which have led to my husband's neglect of me, and then, perhaps, you may tell me how it may be overcome.

We were both of us born and educated in the country; and our parents living near to each other, we have been, from our infancy, companions, and, consequently, at a very early age, contracted a warm friendship. No wonder then, that this attachment should ripen to a more exalted kind: and, when I was only sixteen, he asked my hand. I could not, for a moment, think of any other man as a husband, and would immediately have been married, but the wisdom of our parents interposed, and it was agreed that Mr. Z. must first get into a way of maintaining me.

Our engagement was considered as sacred, and four years were allotted as the time to elapse, before the completion of our wishes. Fate ordained a temporary separation. My lover went to distant lands; and, in order to dissipate the gloom occasioned by his absence, my parents permitted me to come to this city. My manners or appearance not being at all outré, I was very soon brought into notice, contracted a love for the dissipation of a city life, and for three years rioted in its pleasures. When I found my health and bloom begin to decay, I resorted to the common practice of giving false colours to my face, which I found, when applied with judgment, always succeeded as I wished.

About six months ago, Mr. Z. returned. He was delighted to find me here; and, altogether, our meeting was, as you may imagine, rapturous beyond description. Our marriage was immediately spoken of; and, among other remarks, he said, "I am glad to find you have not been rake enough to destroy the radiant bloom of nature and health.

Thy cheeks, love, amid all thy dissipation, still retain their roses. This (patting my face with his hand) is the honest blush of innocence and nature. How much superior, in my eyes, to all the daubings of foreign artifice!" This was truly a hair breadth escape from a discovery, which, during the remainder of our courtship, I always made out to avoid.

Now we have been married but one little week, and my husband appears to have resigned himself to such a state of sullen sadness, as no efforts of mine, I fear, will ever overcome. Unluckily, he came suddenly into my chamber the other morning, and caught me (oh mournful to relate!) in the very act of rouging. Struck with surprise, he stood aghast. My embarrassment was so great, that the brush fell from my hand, and I was motionless, with one side of my face red, the other pale as a corpse; one lip rose-coloured, the other blue, and quivering with fright; and my nose only once dipped in Gowland's lotion. You may judge of my distress, and his vexation. I at last broke silence, with "my dear, it is very unkind to open my door, without knocking."..... "Unkind, madam? Then I will ever remain so, to such a haggard image of falsehood and hypocrisy as you present."

In his paroxysm of rage, my toilet was instantly cleared of all its boxes and phials. He desired me immediately to wash my face, and take a final leave of all my charms. I thought compliance my duty, and I am now a living instance of the pernicious effects of paint on my skin, and of the absurdity of using such artifice, to allure the affections of men. I am deservedly the victim of my own folly; and, if sincere repentance be any atonement for my crime, it is fully expiated; and my tears, which have flowed incessantly for four days, must have washed it from every other tablet, but that of my husband's memory. He treats me with coldness when we meet, and tries every possible means of shunning my presence. If I attempt to apologize for the offence I have given him, he bids me cease, nor pile up falsehood upon falsehood, until I have reared a monument of my disgrace.

But this, all this might have been borne, had not his injustice, when we were together in a large company the other evening, almost determined me to quit him forever, and seek a safe retreat from his scorn, in the bosom of parental affection. He called out to me across a room, "My love, you have forgotten to put on your checks to-night. Are you sure all your teeth are in your mouth?.... Is that your glass eye or not?" And then whispered to, and laughed with, some gentleman, who sat next to him.

Consider, Mr. Saunter, how vexatious such treatment must be, to a mind of any sensibility.... I am willing, however, if Mr. Z. will receive me again into favour, to forget the past, and make every amendment in my life, which his good sense can require; although I do not think I have deserved so severe a punishment. I hope, sir, your compassion will appeal for me, and your wisdom reason my husband into forgiveness, or teach me fortitude to support his contempt.

Yours,

FIDELIA.

THEOLOGY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. EDITOR,

I send you an extract, from Brown's system of divinity, on the controverted passage, in the epistle of John; which I hope you will allow to occupy a place in your Port Folio. Speaking on the passage, he says, "Indeed, the Socinians, modern Arians, and some others, pretend the last mentioned text, 1 John 5, 7, to be spurious; because 'Many Greek manuscripts want it.' But of these, many want also other texts; and the similarity of the 7th and 8th verses made a careless transcriber apt to overleap one of them. 'Many of the ancient translations want it.' But none of these translations are of great weight in this matter, as they want much more of the New Testament. Nor are any of them, except the Syriac version and Jerome's Latin one, much worth. 'The ancient fathers do not quote it, when it would have been much to their purpose, in their disputes with heretics.' But that might be, because they had deficient copies, or cared not to adduce a text, which their opponents might have rejected. Let it be observed further, The orthodox had no temptation to forge it, having plenty of proof for their faith concerning the trinity beside. But the anti-trinitarians had strong temptations to drop it out of their copies, which is also more easily done. And yet, perhaps, it originated from no design but the hurry of a transcriber, amidst the rage of persecution. About 1400 years ago, we find complaints of some anti-trinitarians attempting to corrupt the scripture; but never till late, that the orthodox had done so. This text is referred to by Tertullian, about A. D. 200; quoted by Cyprian about 250, and by Athanasius, or one in his name, about 350. Jerome hath it in his translation, about 400, and, admitting it to be in all the best Greek copies, he severely blames the want of it in the old Latin version. Soon after it is quoted by Eucherius and Virgilius. In 484 the African bishops quote it in the confession of their faith, which they presented to Hunneric, that Arian king; and about thirty years after, Fulgentius, when required by an Arian king to produce his objections against the Arians, quoted it three times. When the Vulgate Latin translation was solemnly, and with great care, corrected from Greek and Latin manuscripts, by order of Charles the Great, about 800, and again by the famed university of Sorbonne, about two hundred years after, this text was retained. Erasmus, who inclined to arianism, first suspected it, and dropt it out of his first edition of the New Testament: but restored it in his subsequent editions, upon the credit of an old British copy. It is said, that nine of Stephen's sixteen manuscripts, from which he printed his excellent edition of the Greek New Testament, had this text. No doubt many of the manuscripts, from which other principal editions were formed, are now lost. A printed copy is even more authentic, than almost any manuscript extant, the oldest of which were written some hundred years after all these of the apostles were worn out or lost; for more learning and care have been exercised to render some printed editions correct, than perhaps was taken on all the manuscripts written for a thousand years before the reformation. The passages appear deficient and unconnected, if a verse be dropped. Mill and Bengelius have, therefore, honestly retained it in their excellent editions, notwithstanding they have fairly, and with much more candour than Michaelis, represented the objections against it."

From this it appears, that all the stress, which a writer in your paper lays on the authority of Erasmus is unfounded. For Erasmus, though he omitted the text in his first editions, yet, after more research and mature deliberation, inserted it in his following editions, which have unquestionably the most authority. It appears likewise, that sir Isaac Newton was not the first, who suspected this passage. Erasmus first conceived suspicions. But he found that his suspicions were groundless. As this text is a good weapon in the hands of trinitarians, they would be foolish, were they to throw it away. It is a weapon, which God hath put into their hands, and therefore they are bound to use it. But were they to lay it aside, they would be armed sufficiently to contend with success against all their adversaries. For the doctrine of the trinity is founded not on this single passage, but on a multitude of texts, so plain, that a denial of the doctrine by those, who admit the authority of the scriptures as decisive on all such points, is indeed matter of surprise to

REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

IN a journal, literary, moral, and political, called the Spectator of the North, published at Hamburg, for the month of May, 1797, is contained a Review of a series of letters, relative to the United States, which, together with the work reviewed, seems strangely to have escaped the notice of our countrymen. Possibly, the severity of remark in which this traveller has indulged, on the several topics, which arrested his attention, may have restrained such as were apprized of the existence of this work, from laying open its contents, to the American public. The letters are not within our reach, but we present an imperfect sketch, such as a translation can afford, not doubting, that some of the readers of your Miscellany, will feel an interest in the perusal.

LETTERS CONCERNING THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

The Letters concerning the United States of America, of which we are going to give some account, are the productions of a German gentleman, by the name of Bülow, formerly an officer in the Prussian service, who in the month of July, 1795, embarked at this place (Hamburg) for the United States, where he had conceived the project of making a permanent settlement, and who, if we are rightly informed, is either already returned, or is expected every moment to arrive, being determined to live in his own country; convinced by his own experience, that Germany is quite as good as Pennsylvania.

Mr. Bülow had been seduced, like a croud of other Europeans by that prospect of fortune and happiness, which during a space of fifteen years back, so many travellers have laboured to shew us, in the deserts of North America. Undeceived, like other enlightened travellers, who have lately returned from America, Mr. Bülow furnishes us, in his letters, with materials, for the history of a country, about which, it should seem, we have hitherto had nothing but Romances.

Running over the Letters of Mr. Bülow, and calling to mind, all that the Brissot's, the Crèvecoeur's, &c. have written, on the same subject, one is tempted to believe, that it falls to the lot of certain countries, to be judged of, as famous personages have often been; by turns too much applauded and too much decried; successively the sport of false commendation from enthusiasts, and the calumny of slanderers. Far be it from our intention to place Mr. Bülow in this latter class; and if in the course of his details or the inferences he makes from them, some shades of ill humour should occasionally be seen, we are ready to pardon the mixture, on the score of disappointment, in one, more especially, who after having passed the seas, to settle in a country, where so many writers had promised him the golden age, has the misfortune to discover, that there, as well as here, mankind are still in the midst of the iron age.

The Letters of Mr. Bülow have hitherto appeared only scattered through several numbers of a German Journal*. But we are assured, that a complete collection is about to be published, and it is probable that they will soon be translated into French. Our readers will thank us for not waiting, till then, to make them known.

In the fifteen letters, which are before us, Mr. Bülow particularly regards the United States in a moral and political light; he begins however by observing them in some other points of view.

"The banks of the Delaware present to the stranger, on his first arrival a good idea of North America; they are well cultivated. Thick woods, smiling meadows, handsome country seats, charm the eye of the traveller, more especially when, like us, he has seen, for ten weeks together, nought but sea and sky. The town of Wilmington presents itself very agreeably in the form of an amphitheatre, on the declivity of a small hill. The eastern bank of the river is less interesting.".....

....."Many buildings are erecting at Philadelphia; but we see very few edifices built upon the true principles of architecture. Materials of all kinds, even marble, is abundant.....Several merchants of that city, have undertaken buildings on a scale far beyond their means; and to defray the expense, they borrow money at three per cent per month.".....

"The natural history of America, is not yet sufficiently known, notwithstanding all the labours of Buffon, who moreover was not free from prejudices.....Some of our literati have religiously adopted them. They pretend, for instance, that every thing degenerates, in this quarter of the globe; and they will not fail to anathematise me, when judging of things from the testimony of my own senses, I maintain, that the horse, the ox, nor the sheep, have in no way degenerated here, neither in shape, in strength, nor in symmetry of figure.

"At a race-ground, near Germantown, I saw the finest and the swiftest horses run a four mile heat, in eight minutes. I know not whether this was a mark of inferiority. It is true, that an Englishman present affirmed, that the race horses in his country, ran the same distance in seven minutes; but this was, perhaps, an Anglicism.....What I am very sure of, is, that the horses of Germany cannot perform as much."

"It is also pretended, that the provisions of America are not so good as those of Europe, because hunger returns sooner after eating; but is this good reasoning? Wholesome food digests more easily and more rapidly than bad. Moreover, the remark is false, or, at least, is only applicable to some individuals, and some particular spots in America. For myself, I am not oftener hungry here than in Europe, and I know other Europeans, who say the same. Their meat is as fine to look at, and quite as good tasted, as it is at Hambury, and their veal is even much better."

"We made a visit to Mr. Legaux, at Springmill, the same of whom Brissot speaks in his travels. He has a vineyard, the plants of which came from Bourdeaux, from Champagne, Burgundy, and the Cape of Good Hope. The last are those, which, as he informed us, succeed best.....The vintage of this year (1795) has completely failed; but the seasons immediately preceding, the proprietor made wines, both red and white, equal in quality to the best Medoc. The wine produced by the Cape plants is excellent. Mr. Legaux was formerly a lawyer of Normandy. The situation of his house is delightful. The Schuylkill forms several cascades in the vicinity, which are precipitated, with a rumbling velocity, from some eminences, then peacefully gliding, till they inundate the meadows below. All the environs of this river are fine and beautiful."

Mr. Bülow, in speaking of the climate of North America, and of the sudden changes of heat and cold, of which the majority of travellers are wont to complain, observes, that these complaints are extravagant; and that, in fact, this climate is less changeable and less capricious than that of the north of Germany. In support of all that has been heretofore said, to prove that, in proportion as the forests are cleared, and the ground tilled, Mr. Bülow cites Tit. Livy, who relates, that the Tiber was once frozen to the very bottom; and he further recounts, that Julian was once stopped by the snow, in marching from Paris to Strasburg, and that in the month of September. The temperature of Italy, and that of France, have, in fact, softened a little since that period.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IN the following extract from the speech of Mr. Hemphill, on the bill for a repeal of the Judiciary law, we find sound and correct principle, seasoned with a spice of delicate irony. The stigma of adopting a foreign scale of interpretation, to test the weight of the judicial branch in our constitution, is retorted with no common ingenuity upon the authors of the reproach.

"It is said they (the judges) are not independent of parliament: Why, sir, nothing is independent of parliament, and there is not the same necessity there. There being no written constitution in England, the judiciary forms no check upon parliament—and besides, our government is not a copy of the British government; and this is not the only instance, where we have outstripped, as it is called, our too favourite prototype. There is not a leading feature in the constitution, that bears testimony of any servile imitation; it is our opponents, who wish to test our constitution, by the principles of the British government; it is they who wish a construction to be put upon the constitution by Congress, which shall be considered as the constitution itself; and are unwilling that there should be any check to oppose it, and of course every construction put upon it by the different legislatures, will exhibit the appearance of a new constitution to be tossed and blown about by every political breeze. The powers of Congress will be equal to the powers of the English parliament—transcendant, splendid, and without controul. I little expected, that such lordly power would be grasped at by our plain Republicans, who have no ambitious desires, and who wish rulers to be contented with humble prerogatives."

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.
No. XII.

FROM the manner in which the subject was treated in the fifth and sixth numbers of The Examination, it has been doubted, whether the writer did or did not entertain a decided opinion as to the power of Congress to abolish the offices and compensations of judges, once instituted and appointed pursuant to a law of the United States.... In a matter of such high constitutional moment, it is a sacred duty to be explicit. The progress of a bill lately brought into the Senate for repealing the law of the last session, entitled, "An act to provide for the more convenient organization of the courts of the United States," with the avowed design of superseding the judges, who were appointed under it, has rendered the question far more serious than it was while it rested merely on the obscure suggestion of the Presidential Message. 'Till the experiment had proved the fact, it was hardly to have been imagined, that a majority of either house of Congress, whether from design or error, would have lent its sanction to a glaring violation of our national compact, in that article, which of all others is the most essential to the efficiency and stability of the government; to the security of property; to the safety and liberty of person. This portentous and frightful phenomenon has, nevertheless, appeared. It frowns with malignant and deadly aspect upon our constitution. Probably before these remarks shall be read, that constitution will be no more! It will be numbered among the numerous victims of democratic phrenzy; and will have given another and an awful lesson to mankind....the prelude perhaps of calamities to this country, at the contemplation of which imagination shudders.

With such a prospect before us, nothing ought to be left un essayed, to open the eyes of thinking men to the destructive projects of those mountebank politicians, who have been too successful in perverting public opinion, and in cheating the people out of their confidence; who are advancing with rapid strides in the work of disorganization....the sure forerunner of tyranny; and who, if they are not arrested in their mad career, will, ere long, precipitate our nation into all the horrors of anarchy.

It would be vanity to expect to throw much additional light upon a subject which has already exhausted the logic and eloquence of some of the ablest men of our country; yet it often happens, that the same arguments placed in a new attitude, and accompanied with illustrations which may have escaped the ardour of a first research, serve both to fortify, and to extend conviction. In the hope that this may be the case, the discussion shall be pursued with as much perspicuity and brevity, as can be attained.

The words of the constitution are, "The Judges both of the Supreme and Inferior Courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour, and shall at stated times receive for their services a compensation which shall not be diminished during their continuance in office."

Taking the literal import of the terms as the criterion of their true meaning, it is clear, that the tenure or duration of the office is limited by no other condition than the good behaviour of the incumbent. The words are imperative, simple, and unqualified: "The judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." Independent therefore of any artificial reasoning to vary the nature and obvious sense of the words, the provision must be understood to vest in the judge a right to the office, indefeasible but by his own misconduct.

It is consequently the duty of those who deny this right, to shew either that there are certain presumptions of intention deducible from other parts of the constitutional instrument, or certain general principles of constitutional law or policy, which ought to control the literal and substitute a different meaning.

As to presumptions of intention different from the import of the terms, there is not a syllable in the instrument from which they can be inferred; on the contrary, the latter member of the clause cited, affords very strong presumption the other way.

From the injunction, that the compensation of the judges shall not be diminished, it is manifest, that the constitution intends to guard the independence of those officers, against the legislative department; because, to this department alone would have belonged the power of diminishing their compensations.

When the constitution is thus careful to tie up the legislature, from taking away part of the compensation, is it possible to suppose that it can mean to leave that body at full liberty to take away the whole? The affirmative imputes to the constitution the manifest absurdity of holding to the legislature this language: "You shall not weaken the independence of the judicial character, by exercising the power of lessening his emolument, but you may destroy it altogether, by exercising the greater power of annihilating the recompense with the office." No mortal can be so blind as not to see, that, by such a construction, the restraint intended to be laid upon the legislature, by the injunction not to lessen the compensations, becomes absolutely nugatory.

In vain is a justification of it sought in that part of the same article, which provides that "The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may from time to time ordain and establish." The position that a discretionary power to institute inferior courts includes virtually a power to abolish them, if true, is nothing to the purpose. The abolition of a court does not necessarily imply that of its judges. In contemplation of law, the court and the judge are distinct things. The court may have a legal existence, though there may be no judge to exercise its powers. This may be the case, either at the original creation of a court, previous to the appointment of a judge, or subsequently by his death, resignation, or removal. In the last case, it could not be pretended that the court had become extinct by the event. In like manner, the office of the judge may subsist, though the court in which he is to officiate may be suspended or destroyed. The duties of a judge, as the office is defined in our jurisprudence, are twofold....judicial and ministerial. The latter may be performed out of court, and often without reference to it. As conservator of the peace, which every judge is ex officio, many things are done, not connected with a judicial controversy, or, to speak technically, with a lis pendens.

This serves to illustrate the idea, that the office is something different from the court; which is the place or situation for its principal action, yet not altogether essential to its activity. Besides, a judge is not the less a judge when out of court, than when in court. The law does not suppose him to be always in court, yet it does suppose him to be always in office; in vacation as well as in term. He has also a property or interest in his office, which entitles him to civil actions, and to recompense in damages for injuries that affect him in relation to his office; but he cannot be said to have a property or interest in the court, of which he is a member. All these considerations confirm the hypothesis, that the court and the judge are distinct legal entities, and therefore may exist the one independently of the other.

If it be replied, that the office is an incident to the court, and that the abolition of the principal includes that of the incident....The answer to this is, that the argument may be well-founded as to all subsequent appointments, but not as to those previously made. Though there be no office to be filled in future, it will not follow that one already vested in an individual by a regular appointment and commission, is thereby vacated and divested. Whether this shall or shall not happen must depend on what the constitution or the law has declared with regard to the tenure of the office. Having pronounced that this shall be during good behaviour, it will preserve the office, to give effect to that tenure for the benefit of the possessor. To be consistent with itself, it will require and prescribe such a modification and construction of its own acts, as will reconcile its power over the future, with the rights which have been conferred as to the past.

Let it not be said that an office is a mere trust for public benefit, and excludes the idea of a property or a vested interest in the individual. The first part of the proposition is true—the last false. Every office combines the two ingredients of an interest in the possessor, and a trust for the public.

Hence it is, that the law allows the officer redress by a civil action, for an injury in relation to his office, which presupposes property or interest. This interest may be defeasible at the pleasure of the government, or it may have a fixed duration, according to the constitution of the office. The idea of a vested interest holden even by a permanent tenure, so far from being incompatible with the principle that the primary and essential end of every office is the public good, may be conducive to that very end by promoting a diligent faithful, energetic, and independent execution of the office.

But admitting, as seems to have been admitted, by the speakers on both sides the question, that the judge must fall with the court, then the only consequence will be, that congress cannot abolish a court once established. There is no rule of interpretation better settled, than that different provisions in the same instrument on the same subject, ought to be so construed, as, if possible, to comport with each other, and give a reasonable effect to all.

The provision that "The judiciary power shall be vested in one superior court, and in such inferior courts as the congress may, from time to time ordain and establish," is immediately followed by this other provision, "The judges both of the supreme and inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour."

The proposition, that a power to do, includes virtually, a power to undo, as applied to a legislative body, is generally, but not universally true. All vested rights form an exception to the rule. In strict theory, there is no lawful or moral power to divest by a subsequent statute, a right vested in an individual by a prior; and accordingly it is familiar to persons conversant with legal studies, that the repeal of a law does not always work the revocation or divestiture of such rights.

If it be replied, that though a legislature might act immorally and wickedly in abrogating a vested right, yet the legal validity of its act for such a purpose could not be disputed; it may be answered that this odious position, in any application of it, is liable to question in every limited constitution (that is, in every constitution, which, in its theory, does not suppose the whole power of the nation to be lodged in the legislative body); and that it is certainly false in its application to a legislature, the authorities of which are defined by a positive written constitution, as to every thing which is contrary to the actual provisions of that constitution. To deny this, is to affirm that the delegated is paramount to the constituent power. It is, in fact, to affirm, there are no constitutional limits to the legislative authority.

* As in the parliament of Great-Britain.

The enquiry then must be, whether the power to abolish inferior courts, if implied in that of creating them, is not abridged by the clause which regulates the tenor of judicial office.

The first thing which occurs in this investigation, is, that the power to abolish is at most, an implied or incidental power, and as such will the more readily yield to any express provision with which it may be inconsistent.—

The circumstance of giving to Congress a discretionary power to establish Inferior Courts instead of establishing them specifically in the constitution, has, with great reason, been ascribed to the impracticability of ascertaining beforehand the number and variety of courts, which the development of our national affairs might indicate to be proper; especially in relation to the progress of new settlements, and the creation of new states. This rendered a discretionary power to institute courts indispensable; but it did not alike render indispensable a power to abolish those which were once instituted. It was conceived, that with intelligence, caution, and care, a plan might be pursued in the institution of courts, which would render abolitions unnecessary. Indeed it is not presumable with regard to establishments of such solemnity and importance, making part of the organization of a principal department of the government, that a fluctuation of plans was anticipated. It is, therefore, not essential to suppose, that the power to destroy was intended to be included in the power to create: Thus the words "to ordain and establish," may be satisfied by attributing to them only the latter effect.

Consequently, when the grant of the power to institute courts, is immediately succeeded by the declaration that the judges of those courts shall hold their offices during good behaviour; if the exercise of the power to establish the courts cannot be reconciled with the actual holding or enjoyment of the office, according to the prescribed tenure, it will follow, that the power to abolish is interdicted. The implied, or hypothetical power to destroy the office must give way to the express and positive right of holding it during good behaviour. This is agreeable to the soundest rules of construction; the contrary is in subversion of them.

Equally in vain is a justification of the construction adopted by the advocates of the repeal, attempted to be derived from a distinction between the supreme and inferior courts. The argument, that as the former is established by the constitution, it cannot be annulled by a legislative act, though the latter which must owe their existence to such an act, may, by the same authority, be extinguished, can afford no greater stability to the office of a judge of the supreme court than to that of a judge of an inferior court. The constitution does indeed establish the supreme court; but it is altogether silent as to the number of the judges. This is as fully left to legislative discretion as the institution of inferior courts; and the rule that a power to undo is implied in the power to do, is therefore no less applicable to the reduction of the number of the judges of the supreme court than to the abolition of the inferior courts. If the former are not protected by the clause, which fixes the tenure of office, they are no less at the mercy of the legislature than the latter: And if that clause does protect them, its protection must be equally effectual for the judges of the inferior courts. Its efficacy in either case must be founded on the principle that it operates as a restraint upon the legislative discretion; and if so, there is the like restraint in both cases, because the very same words, in the very same sentence, define conjunctly the tenure of the offices of the two classes of judges. His sophistry can elude the conclusion.

It is therefore plain to a demonstration, that the doctrine which affirms the right of congress to abolish the judges of the inferior courts is absolutely fatal to the independence of the judiciary department. The observation, that so gross an abuse of power as would be implied in the abolition of the judges of the supreme court, ought not to be supposed, can afford no consolation against the extreme danger of the doctrine. The terrible examples before us, forbid our placing the least confidence in that delusive observation. Experience, sad experience warns us to dread every extremity—to be prepared for the worst catastrophe that can happen.

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

As it is the earnest wish of the Editor to preserve in this miscellany whatever will reflect light upon the political occurrences of the time, he publishes the following article, which exhibits the stress of the late argument in our national senate, on the judiciary bill. The correctness of the report of this argument has been tested, and is vouched for. He, who studies it will have a distinct "view of the whole ground."

MR. BRECKENRIDGE,

WHILE my honourable friend recollects himself, I beg leave to say a few words in answer to an argument, which has been much pressed to-day. I did not intend to rise again on this subject, especially at so late an hour (about 5 o'clock), and I promise to detain the house but a few minutes.

I did not expect, sir, to find the doctrine of the power of the courts to annul the laws of congress, as unconstitutional, so seriously insisted on. I presume I shall not be out of order in replying to it. It is said that the different departments of government are to be checks on each other, and that the courts are to check the legislature. If this be true, I would ask where they got that power, and who checks the courts when they violate the constitution? Would they not, by this doctrine, have the absolute direction of the government? To whom are they responsible? But I deny the power, which is so pretended. If it is derived from the constitution, I ask gentlemen to point out the clause, which grants it. I can find no such grant. Is it not extraordinary that, if this high power was intended, it should nowhere appear? Is it not truly astonishing that the constitution, in its abundant care to define the powers of each department, should have omitted so important a power as that of the courts to nullify all the acts of congress, which, in their opinion, were contrary to the constitution.

Never were such high and transcendent powers in any government, much less in one like ours, composed of powers specially given and defined, claimed or exercised by construction only. The doctrine of constructions, not warranted by the letter of an instrument is dangerous in the extreme. Let men once loose upon constructions, and where will you stop them. Is the astutia of English judges, in discovering the latent meanings of law-makers' meanings, not expressed in the letter of the laws, to be adopted here in the construction of the constitution? Once admit the doctrine, that judges are to be indulged in these astute and wire-drawn constructions, to enlarge their own power, and controul that of others, and I will join gentlemen of the opposition, in declaring that the constitution is in danger.

To make the constitution a practical system, this pretended power of the courts to annul the laws of congress cannot possibly exist. My idea of the subject, in a few words, is, that the constitution intended a separation of the powers vested in the three great departments, giving to each exclusive authority on the subjects committed to it. That these departments are co-ordinate, to revolve each within the sphere of their own orbits, without being responsible for their own motion, and are not to direct or controul the course of others. That those, who make the laws, are presumed to have an equal attachment to, and interest in the constitution; are equally bound by oath to support it, and have an equal right to give a construction to it. That the construction of one department of the powers vested in it, is of higher authority than the construction of any other department. And that, in fact, it is competent to that department, to which powers are confided exclusively, to decide upon the proper exercise of those powers. That, therefore, the legislature have the exclusive right to interpret the constitution, in what regards the law-making power, and the judges are bound to execute the laws they make: For the legislature would have at least an equal right to annul the decisions of the courts, founded on their construction of the constitution, as the courts would have to annul the acts of the legislature, founded on their construction.

Although, therefore, the courts may take upon them to give decisions, which impeach the constitutionality of a law, and thereby, for a time, obstruct its operations, yet I contend that such a law is not the less obligatory, because the organ through which it is to be executed has refused its aid. A pertinacious adherence of both departments to their opinions, would soon bring the question to issue, in whom the sovereign power of legislation resided, and whose construction of the law-making power should prevail.

If the courts have a right to examine into, and decide upon the constitutionality of laws, their decision ought to be final and effectual. I ask then, if gentlemen are prepared to admit, that in case the courts were to declare your revenue, impost, and appropriation laws unconstitutional, that they would thereby be blotted out of your statute book, and the operations of your government be arrested? It is making, in my opinion, a mockery of the high powers of legislation. I feel humbled by the doctrine, and enter my protest against it. Let gentlemen consider well before they insist on a power in the judiciary, which places the legislature at their feet. Let not so humiliating a condition be admitted, under an authority resting merely on implication and construction. It will invite a state of things, which we are not justified by the constitution in presuming will happen, and which, should it happen, all men of all parties must deplore.

Mr. Morris. I rise to congratulate this house and all America, that we have at length got our adversaries upon the ground where we can fairly meet. They have now, though late, reached the point, to which their arguments tended from the beginning. Here I knew they must arrive, and now I ask, if gentlemen are prepared to establish one consolidated government over this country. Sir, if the doctrine they advance prevail; if it be the true doctrine, there is no longer any legislature in America but that of the union.

All the argument they have used in this debate went, of necessity, to that conclusion, which is now happily avowed. The honourable member tells us, the legislature have the supreme and exclusive right to interpret the constitution, so far as regards the making of laws, which, being made, the judges are bound to execute. And he asks where the judges got their pretended power of deciding on the constitutionality of laws. If it be in the constitution, says he, let it be pointed out. I answer, they derive that power from authority higher than this constitution. They derive it from the constitution of man, from the nature of things, from the necessary progress of human affairs. When you have enacted a law, when process thereon has been issued, and suit brought, it becomes eventually necessary that the judges decide on the case before them, and declare what the law is. They must, of course, determine whether that which is produced and relied on, has indeed the binding force of law. The decision of the supreme court is, and, of necessity, must be final.—This, sir, is the principle, and the source of the right for which we contend.

But it is denied, and the supremacy of the legislature insisted on. Mark then, I pray, the result. The constitution says, no bill of attainder or ex post facto law shall be passed, no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration to be taken, no tax or duty shall be laid on articles exported from any state, no preference shall be given, by any regulation of commerce or revenue, to the ports of one state over those of another. Suppose that, notwithstanding these prohibitions, a majority of the two houses should (with the president) pass such laws. Suppose, for instance, that a capitation tax (not warranted by the constitution) or a duty on exports were imposed.... The citizen refuses to pay. But courts, dependent on the will and pleasure of the legislature, are compelled to enforce the collection. Shall it be said that there is an appeal to the supreme court? Sir, that appeal is subject to such exceptions and regulations as congress shall make. Congress can therefore defeat the appeal, and render final the judgment of inferior tribunals subjected to their absolute controul. Nay, sir, to avoid all possible doubt or question, the honourable member last up has told us, in so many words, that the legislature may decide exclusively on the constitution, and that the judges are bound to execute the laws which the legislature enact. Examine then the state to which we are brought. If this doctrine be sustained (and it is the fair logical deduction from the premises laid down) what possible mode is there to avoid the conclusion, that the moment the legislature of the union declare themselves supreme, they become so. The analogies so often assumed to the British parliament will then be complete. The sovereignty of America will no longer reside in the people, but in the congress, and the constitution is whatever they choose to make it.

I saw the end to which those arguments went, but I would not throw it out to the people. Gentlemen will, however, recollect, that, early in this debate, I prayed them to pause and consider. I mentioned to them without this bar the result of their doctrine, and yesterday I warned them to beware of deciding upon abstract propositions. But they insisted on the decision, and they still persist; let me then ask what safety is left for the states?

Experience under the old confederation had shewn, that applications made by congress to large communities were nugatory, and that to carry on the business of the national government, it should be invested with a right of applying directly to individuals. But then the danger that it might swallow up the sovereignty of the states became evident. To provide against that danger, the constitutional doctrine was established, that no power should be exercised by congress, but such as was expressly given, or necessarily incident, and, as a farther security, provision was made, prohibiting certain definite acts. But of what avail are such securities, when your legislative authority is to be bounded only by your own discretion?

While I was far distant from my country, I felt pain at some things, which looked like a wish to wind up the general government beyond its natural tone; for I knew that if America should be brought under one consolidated government, it could not continue to be a republic. I am attached to republican government, because it appears to me most favourable to dignity of sentiment and character. I have had opportunities to make the comparison. But if a consolidated government be established, it cannot long be republican. We have not the materials to construct even a mild monarchy, if, therefore, the states be destroyed, we must become the subjects of despotism.

It may perhaps be said, that all judges are bound by oath to support the constitution. But I ask how is that to be done? Their power over your laws is denied, and when once it is established that you and you alone are the legitimate interpreters of the constitution, they must be bound by your construction.

Gentlemen may flatter themselves that the danger from this quarter is remote or ideal. I know that so long as peace shall last, the states will be the general favourites, because they offer numerous objects to gratify little ambition, but no sooner shall this country be involved in war, than all men will look up to the national government for patronage and protection. Having then the command of large military force, it must, under the construction now set up, become supreme. Remember that the old congress conferred, without authority, dictatorial power over a large extent of country, and that it was exercised and submitted to without opposition. Gentlemen in this house represent the sovereignty of the states. I now call upon them. Are they ready to prostrate that sovereignty at the feet of the general government? I, sir, on the part of the state of New-York, beg leave to enter my solemn protest.

MISCELLANY.

[At a time, when the most licentious customs are followed even by those, who are saluted by the soothing name of the correct and the fashionable, the subsequent reproof from an elegant writer may, possibly, effect a partial reformation. "LYTTLETON" writes with much earnestness and indignation; and as these qualities are in aid of truth and virtue, we sincerely hope that he will not raise the "satiric thong" in vain.]

From the Gazette of the United States.

MR. BRONSON,

EVERY man, however insulated his situation, must feel an interest in the preservation of that pure decorum, which is the very life of a polished community. The continuance and exact observance of common and public decency is an object of universal concern. No one, uncorrupted by vicious principle, can regard with apathy, the least innovation, whose tendency is clear and direct to the corruption of the public manners. It may, at the same time, be remarked, that pernicious and fatal invasion of established decorum so frequently assumes a fascinating and deceptive garb, that it is incumbent to be both watchful for its detection and bold in its exposure. Your correspondent feels no peculiar interest in the subject of his present address. He is neither the father of girls, for whose moral safety he is anxious, nor is he the brother of sisters, whose notions and deportment, in the kind character of a friend and guardian, he is accustomed to watch with incessant vigilance. But, in the field of general and common interest, he deems himself susceptible of feelings, strong, lively, and approximating to those, excited in the anxious bosom of a parent or a brother. He will, therefore, without assuming the authority or displaying the severity of a censor, point to an object of public regard, which appears to call for open reprehension, and to require immediate and effectual correction.

It is the privilege and the practice of your correspondent, sir, to be familiar with scenes of fashion, gaiety, and delight. It has been his pride to believe, that there exists not on earth, a society suffering less from the corruptions ordinarily attendant upon polished association, than that, in whose enjoyments, he is wont to participate. In its scenes, it is novel to mark deviation from decorum, and extraordinary to witness the slightest invasion of the chastest rule. An appreciation of this state of society, above all comparison with any substitute, which could be produced by the fickle slaves of fashion, induces me to appeal to the correct, and honourable feelings of my fair countrywomen, upon a recent innovation, which savours strongly of licentiousness. I refer to the introduction of the Waltz Dance into the polished circles of our city, whose prevalence, it is hoped, will be short, when fairly marked by public discountenance as an indecency.

But few of your readers can be presumed to be acquainted with the Waltz. It may, therefore, be pertinent to mention, that this Dance, is marked by a familiarity of person, a voluptuousness of movement, a lasciviousness of look and a destitution of reserve, which must be obnoxious to that correct taste, which essentially differs both from mad licentiousness and from prudish austerity.... It should be further noted, that the revolutions are constant and giddy, that the feet of the dancers are in close and intimate union, that the male supports the female by gentle pressure of the waist, that the female, with skill, occasionally acquiesces in the softness of the scene, and then again repels her partner, and that the eye intent upon the eye speaks love and pleasure. Let me add to the description, that the measures of the music are soft and Syrenian, and what sense so blunt as not to perceive the tendency?

The lovers of the invaluable SPECTATOR will here call to mind the "Moll Pateley," which was so obnoxious to his correspondent, the "Substantial tradesman, who appears not to have been polished out of paternal feeling, or honest decorum. They will recognize the identity of "Hunt the Squirrel" and "The Chase," and will readily perceive the affinity between "Moll Pateley" and "The Waltz." The pen of Addison and his fellows was employed to correct this error of his day and to banish "Moll Pateley" from the town. It is fervently to be wished, that Monitorial exertion might be able to drive back the Waltz from our uninvited circles to the domes of luxury in the East, or produce its exile to a more appropriate abode among the natives of our American wilderness.

In a state of rigid and austere opinion, dancing in any form or fashion is proscribed as savouring of indecorum. But in the plain unadulterated dances, commonly known and practised in our country, I have been accustomed to see nothing but a healthful exercise and an innocent amusement. The dance, however, may well be deemed an unseemly entertainment, when society is found in that state of fanciful and fictitious polish, in which the gay are led to indulge in scenes, suited only to the recesses of a seraglio, and adapted only to the practice of Circassians, whose servile employment it is, with the vigilance of vestals, to preserve alive, by frolic, attitude and gesture, the glimmering flame in the bosom of a pampered Achmet. Who then will hesitate to declare, that the Waltz dance has claims to patronage and practice rather from voluptuaries under an Asiatic sun, than from such as seek for innocence in their gaiety, and reason in their delight. Surely, its restriction may be expected to the abodes of those pitiable beings, who sacrifice innocence and happiness at the shrine of sensual pleasure, when its tendency is, manifestly, to familiarize the sexes to scenes, which are inimical to virtue, and to break down those barriers of reserve, which are wont to guard from corruption.

What then must be the feelings of an American, a plain man, who loves his country and its plain, unvitiated manners, at witnessing the introduction of a dance, which, when it has obtained the sanction of fashionable currency, must impair the character of his fair country-women, for pure, correct and decorous deportment?—Can he see with the same unconcern his own daughters or his sister practising the lascivious step to melting music, as he regards the theatrical hireling, who professionally mingles in the mad and mazy round, to gratify the vitiated taste of admiring sensualists? No! with all the proneness of dissipation and extravagance, which increasing wealth and progressive luxury can give, we have yet measures of corruption to fill, ere we attain that plenitude of polished depravity which will compel us to regard, with indifference or approbation, so gross an invasion of the ancient, decorous and unpolluted manners of the country.

We are now free to express the hope, that modest and high-minded American females, whose pride is in purity of manners, and whose glory is in chastity of deportment, will regard with favour and feeling our serious appeal, and doom this alien to a speedy exile. We have spoken with plainness, for the subject demanded it; we have aimed at an honest and faithful, tho' not severe, exposure of a hateful practice. Our conclusion is made with confidence, that there is no true man's eye, to which the Waltz is not disgusting; that its encouragement must be conceived to result from pitiable vanity, which seeks an unaccustomed display of personal charms, or from something worse than vanity: That no fancied gracefulness will garnish unbecoming familiarity, or supply the absence of genuine delicacy: And, in short that the Waltz dance, by the discreet and correct part of our community, is decisively conceived to be incompatible with the dignity and delicacy of the American fair; and to be only adapted to the character of an hireling or a slave in the halls of an Eastern despot, where the effeminate lord and the abject ministers of his pleasure are upon the same level of baseness and degradation.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following affectionate sonnet, the writer of this article applies to the cherished scenes of his rural life, and to a favourite friend, once his constant companion in the "wildly devious walks" of literature:

To climb at early dawn the mountain's side,
Ere devious herds have brush'd the dews away,
He mias: at noon amid yon elms to stray,
Whose artless tufts the cooling current hide.

Mine from the purple heath's horizon wide,
To trace the splendours of reclining day:
Until the moon my homeward path to guide,
Dustain the forest edge with silver grey.

And if such scenes the rising soul expand,
The flutter'd heart if simple bliss be calm,
Where nature closelier knits the social tie,
No light addition should my TYLER's hand,
With equal friendship's animating balm,
To letter'd ease the place of fame supply.

I will extract, for their edification, a passage from an old writer, one Camerarius, who thus learnedly details the properties of a perfect horse:

He must have three parts, like those of a woman; broad breast, round hips, and flowing mane. In three things, he must be like a lion; his countenance fierce, his courage great, and his power invincible. In a threefold capacity, must he partake of the nature of the sheep; he must have its nose, its patience, and its docility. He must have three parts of a deer; the head, the leg, and the skin: three of a wolf; throat, neck, and hearing: three of a fox; ear, tail, and trot: three of a serpent; memory, sight, and flexibility: and three of a hare; running, walking, and perseverance,

An acute critic, commenting upon a celebrated modern tragedy, declares, that the principal character has very little reason to discover himself at the close of the play, except to relieve the poet, who has, at last, arrived at his fifth act. The truth is, action, in the modern drama, does not, like a good watch, proceed in a regular time, but is put backwards or forwards, according to the caprice or the convenience of the owner.

In a review of a volume of travels through America, the following observation occurs, respecting the real value of that hospitality, displayed by recent men, in a new country:

Hospitality is a virtue; but in a country like that which our traveller visited, it might truly be said to be a virtue, which amply repays itself. All countries, emerging from a state of nature, are, in general, distinguished for hospitality. A man, secluded from the frequent intercourse of human life, amid the deep and dreary forests of America, will think himself abundantly recompensed for his civilities to a stranger, who, for a moment, lets him feel that there are other human beings, beside himself.

In the chancel of a village church in England, on a grave stone, is the following epitaph, in monkish verse:

Vos qui transitis, Thomam deflere velitis;

Which may be thus translated, without much disgrace to the elegance of the original:

All you that come near, upon Tom drop a tear,
From whom 'twill appear, that the rich are poor here.

A new weekly paper, under the denomination of the "Democratic Republican, or Anti-Aristocrat," has just made its appearance in Baltimore. It is edited by a person, who styles himself Cornelius Firebrand, junr. and its contents comport admirably with the incendiary title of its editor.

[Philadelphia Gazette.]

Rosa, an Italian professor at Paris, has invented a process for making excellent bread, from two-thirds of flour, and one third of acorns. The acorns are freed from their natural bitterness, by boiling them in water. The bread, made of equal parts of flour and acorns, is wholesome and pleasing to the taste, but harder and less white than the first.

Sheridan, in his life of dean SWIFT, is singularly happy, both in the thought and expression of the following paragraph, descriptive of the pleasure experienced by the dean, from an act of signal charity:

"This was the first opportunity he had, of letting loose that spirit of generosity and benevolence, whose greatness and vigour, when pent up in his own breast, by poverty and dependence, served only as an evil spirit to torment him."

In the legislature of New-York, the Hon. Thomas Storm has been unanimously elected Speaker. This, the Yorkers doubtless think, as consul Obrien would say, "looks squally," it bodes, we fear, a boisterous session.

Buonaparte has been invited, by the Cisalpine provisional government, to appoint the first magistrates of that republic, which he has consented to!

A quack in the city of New-York, who assumes the name of Dr. Roberts, advertises his skill in the cure of a variety of disorders to which the human frame is liable; particularly the Venereal, without the use of Mercury. He undertakes generally, to cure all disorders, not incurable; more especially the king's evil, cancers and sore legs. Invalids, we think, are under infinite obligations to Dr. R. as, contrary to the commonly received axiom, there is now help for sickness and sore shins.

The meditated 'lopping of the excrescent parts' from the constitution by the present democratic majority, is likened by a facetious writer in 'The Balance,' to the spoiling of a wig which was worn by one of the primitive parsons of New-England. His parishioners were incensed and grieved that he should wear a wig in the Boston fashionable cut, and which they thought unscriptural, and dashed with that part of the decalogue, which denounces the worship 'of any graven image, or any likeness 'of any thing that is in heaven above, or earth 'beneath.' The parson paid attention to their remonstrances, and, assembling them together, delivered over to them the frizzled cause of their complaints, to be mutilated and fashioned by them to their liking. After clipping and hacking it till they thought there was no sin in worshipping it, it being the likeness of nothing in heaven or on earth, they consented that their pastor might wear it. So will it fare with the Constitution. After the first false amendment, every bungler will be applying his shears to its curls, and clipping it to his liking, till, in a moment of public lethargy, this Sampson of our trust, will be made to bow to the art of some usurping and darling Dalilah.

The political imbecility of one of our members of Congress is quite a topic of condolence in the Coffee-house circles. If Mr. Bayard saucily exults that Mr. Smilie sometimes knows his own sentiments, it should be remembered that not to know one's own mind is a common failing; that Mr. S. on classical authority has an established right to be simple, for one of the seven sages of Greece has declared that "The majority are foolish," and moreover the "honourable gentleman" has the honour to remember Sir Hudibras both in his republicanism and in his indistinctness of conceptions;

"His notions fitted things so well
That which was which he could not tell:
But, oftentimes, mistook the one
For the other, as great clerks have done."

At a college commencement, one of the new created masters undertook to preach before his brethren. Wit, at that time, being allowed by peculiar dispensation, he selected for his text,

"We are of yesterday, and know nothing

Beloved, says he, this text fitly divides itself into two parts:

1. The first, respecting our standing, "We are but of yesterday,"
2. The second, respecting our understanding,—"And know nothing."

When I know more, I will tell you more.

Meanwhile, let what you have heard suffice, with an....Amen.

A French Gentleman once travelling in his cabriolet from Paris to Calais was accosted by a man, who was walking along the road, and who begged the favour of him to put his Great-coat, which he found very heavy, into his carriage.... With all my heart, said the gentleman, but if we should not be travelling to the same place, how will you get your coat? Monsieur, answered the man, with great naiveté, "Je serai de dans." I shall be in it.

During the punning reign of king James I, a man being reprimanded for swearing, replied, he did not know there was any harm in it. No harm in it! said a person present, why, don't you know the commandment, swear not at all. Why, I don't swear at all, I only swear at those who offend me.

Quin, the comedian, and another gentleman, riding one summer's day upon Lansdown, observed, at some distance, a person on horseback, whose silver laced coat and waistcoat shone prodigiously in the sun. Several conjectures were formed, respecting the quality of the approaching meteor; till at length he came near enough to discover that he was a Bath apothecary, famous for finery and dress. Oh, said the gentleman, 'tis only the quick silver doctor at last. Aye, said Quin, in his dry manner, all is not gold that glisters, you see.

Count T. complained to Foote, that a slanderer had ruined his character. So much the better, replied the wit, for it was a damned bad one, and the sooner destroyed the better.

An apothecary, a quaker, meeting Dr. Fothergill, in the street, thus accosted him:.....Friend Fothergill, I intend dining with thee to-day. I shall be glad to see thee, replied the doctor. I intend bringing my family with me, says the apothecary. So much the better, quoth the doctor; but pray, friend, hast thou not some joke? No joke indeed, replies the apothecary, but a very serious matter. Thou hast attended friend Ephraim these three days, and ordered him no medicine. I cannot live at this rate, in my own house, and must therefore live in thine. The doctor took the hint, and prescribed handsomely for the benefit of his friend Ephraim, and his friend Leech, the apothecary.

Although we have for a long time refused giving any further place to cheese-communications being of opinion the cheese has been toasted and re-toasted till it has become quite unpalatable, we hope the following bagatelle, from a valuable correspondent, will be received with a relish.

Extract of a letter from Washington.

"The celebrated mammoth cheese, which has long been the fruitful topic of public discussion, will not totally cease to exist after the fourth of March, when it is to be immolated on the altar of liberty.

The president having discovered, by dint of that sagacity, for which he is so distinguished, that the rind is not calculated for consumption, called a council of the wise men of the west, 'in order to take into joint-cogitation the applicability of this circumambient part of this magnitudinary whole.' After mature deliberation, and much sapient discussion, it was resolved, in conformity to that system of economy, which has uniformly guided the counsels of the present executive, to collect the parings, embalm and deposit them in a golden urn, to be prepared for that purpose, and to be lodged in the Knick-nackatory at Monticello, there to remain in secula seculorum, as a trophy of private patriotism, and a monument of public gratitude and taste.

"That nothing might be wanting to add dignity to the precious deposit, the president, in the true spirit of gallantry, addressed the fair framers of the stupendous offering, requesting 'a reiterated developement of those intellectual powers, which their co-exertions had so felicitously effectuated, in the conformation of this gigantic production of the dairy, by supplying an appropriate inscription for the comprehensive vase.' The request of the august applicant was readily complied with; and I am happy that it is in my power to furnish you with a copy of this concentration of female genius.

THIS URN

Contains the superficial stratum of a circular mass of vaccine juice,

Consolidated by

The female patriots of Massachusetts, and in concert with

Their acquiescent husbands presented to

Th: Jefferson, the political Colossus of Columbia; In testimony

Of their grateful admiration of those talents,

So strenuously exerted

In accelerating the approach of that

Blessed Era

Which in the language of derision is termed

The Gallic Millennium:

When those exclusive barriers that now surround

The mono-matrimonial state

Shall be broken down;

And the human mind

Shall bound at will over the sunny regions of Unrestrained enjoyment—

In brief

When Nature's reign shall be restored,

This Urn was fabricated, replenished and inscribed at that memorable Epoch in American History, when Philosophy was President—

Stability Secretary of State,

And

Loyalty was Secretary of the Treasury,

Under the government

Then stiled Federal.

"The above delicate morceau of monumental literature is not unworthy of those female talents which gave consistency and shape to the milky flood of votive patriotism. It is by no means what in the cant of criticism is called a whetish composition. On the contrary, it is highly enriched with the courtly curd of compliment, and seasoned with the Attic salt of sentiment."

[N. Y. Even. Post.]

A Tobacconist having made a fortune by his business resolving to set up his carriage, consulted a classical friend respecting a proper motto, adding that he was afraid he should be accused of ostentation and laughed at by his less fortunate neighbours. Never mind that, replied the friend, I can give you a motto that will silence them. The carriage was started, and the words "Quid rides," appeared in conspicuous characters on the pannel. Those, who understood Latin, and were disposed to laugh at the new made gentleman, felt the reprimand. But the croud, taking it for English, shouted as he passed, Quid rides....Quid rides.

An elegant writer, describing the perfections of a lovely woman, declares, in glowing phrase, that "the fire, which flashed from her eyes, shewed, that she felt all the passions, which she inspired."

Among the many works from the American press, which evince the industry and literary enterprise of our printers, no one is more extensively useful than "Parkinson's Chymical Pocket-book," lately published by Mr. James Humphries, of this city. The pupil and the master of chymistry, from this book, will equally obtain information; the lover of science will peruse it with pleasure and profit; and the curious will be by it indulged. Its facts are correct; they are taken from the works of masters of the science; its theories are ingenious; they are those of the most wise of modern chymists. "An Account of the principal Objections to the Antiphlogistic System of Chymistry," is added to this work, by Dr. James Woodhouse. The acknowledged talents and known correctness of this gentleman, are sufficient pledges of the value of this addition.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The subsequent satire will be more fully understood, by recurring to an admirable prose description, which the historian of the Aurora has given to a wondering world in the far famed Museum of Mr. Peale.

Behemoth, biggest born of earth
Upheaves his vastness,
And thirteen democratic Virtuosi have decided that even the dry bones of the Mammoth afford very pretty picking.

AMERICAN MIRACLE.

The SKELETON, with which it is Mr. Rembrandt Peale's intention shortly to visit Europe, was yesterday so far put together, that previous to taking it to pieces for the purpose of packing up, WE, AND TWELVE other gentlemen partook of a collation WITHIN the breast of the animal, all comfortably seated round a small table, and one of Mr. Hawkins's Patent Portable Piano's;—after which the following toasts were drank, accompanied with music.

1. The Biped animal MAN—may peace, virtue and happiness be his distinguishing character.

2. The American People—May they be as pre-eminent among the nations of the earth, as the canopy we sit beneath surpasses the fabric of the Mouse. Tankee Dooodle.

3. Agriculture—In constituting the pride and riches of our country, may its rewards be as abundant as THIS FRUIT* was unexpected.

4. The Constitution of the United States—May "its ribs be as ribs of brass, and its back-bone as molten iron."† Hail Columbia.

5. The arts and sciences—nursed in a genial soil, and fostered with tender care, may their honour prove as durable as the boxer which surrounds us.

6. The brains of freemen—May they never be so barracaded by the jack-ass bones of opposition as to crush their native energy.

7. The Friends of Peace—To all else, such bones to gnaw, as dried by ten thousand moons, may starve their hungry maws.—Jefferson's March.

8. All Honest Men—If they cannot feast in the Breast of a Mammoth, may their own breast be large enough.

9. The Ladies of Philadelphia—Ere their naked beauties prove as horrible as bare bones, may virtue behold them clothed in the garment of modesty.

10. The present company—May their second birth, though from the womb of the breast, be followed with every blessing of life.

Volunteer.—Success to these Bonny parts in Europe.

ORPHEUS! thou flinty-rock-enliv'ning God!
Thou dancing-master to the tree clad mountains!

Be kind for once, and tell me by a nod,

A nod familiar, gentle, kind,

That up Parnassus I may wind

And tippie inspiration at the muses' fountain

Where thou, its keeper, fiddlest all the day

While pebbles, sands and stones, like hail-storms round thee play....

Orpheus! I venerate thy fiddling talent

And wish to make of it a little trial,

I know thee musical and very gallant

Too much so to return a flat denial....

I pray thee, fiddler! to accept from me,

The homage of my high consideration,

Arcadian swains did not more joy to see

Thy wife and thee among them shew your faces,

Teaching the aukward oaks the airs and graces,

Than I should, would'st thou kindly take thy station

At Peale's Museum, pride of this great nation!

Thou know'st, sweet Orpheus! that this Mr.
Peale

Has sent his Raphael and his Rembrandt round,

Wherever toe-nails of a flea are found

To serve, without reward, the common weal!

These apes of Italy have had good luck

Wherever bee-like, they have stopp'd to suck;

Yet when they only skeletons could find

They brought the bones, but left the life behind...

Now, Orpheus! could'st thou visit the Museum?

* These bones were discovered by farmer's digging for Manure.

† Job, chap. 40.

Striding the back-bone of a crocodile
Which Mr. Peale transported from the Nile,

And hum a single couplet of Te Deum;

In cap'ring fit
The wren and tit,
The lion, bear,
The monkey, hare,
The crouching cat,
The half-blind bat
And cunning rat,
The Turkish dog,
The mud-clad hog,
And hopping frog,
The long-tailed mouse,
The dappled louse,
And Jersey growse,
The soaring eagle,
Sharp-eyed beagle,
The chatt'ring daw,
And Indian squaw,
Rocks, sands and stones,
And Mammoth's bones,
The spider too,
And all the crew,
Of insects vile,
Brought many a mile,
The sable bug,
(So fond of rug)
The gabbling goose,
And aukward moose
Would all get loose

Would bound, turn round, and reel and squeal
While Raphael, Rembrandt, ev'ry Peale
From street to street, from door to door,
In extacy would run and roar,
"The wondrous work explore"....

Orpheus! I wish to sound a strain
That e'en thyself would'st not disdain,
Of dinner-parties in a Mammoth's belly,
Of puddings, custards, pies and jelly,
What toasts roar'd loudly thro' the Mammoth's ear, or,

Were sweetly sounded thro' his wide posterior....
This is my theme, sweet Orpheus! let me cheer
In strains most musical, Mazzei's ear
While lolling idly in his rocking-chair....
Rembrandt and other gentlemen were seen
Within a Mammoth's belly, round and clean, (Bones of a Mammoth found by some rude boor, While, heedless of his luck, he dug manure)
Within its maw a walnut table plac'd,
Profusely deck'd to please the varied taste,
A frog's hind leg here met the roving eye,
And there the muscles of a spider's thigh,
A bat's small pinion in a muscle-shell
In snail's blood fried, sent forth a sav'ry smell,
High season'd, in an eagle's upper bill
Were pour'd the juices of a fat skunk's tail,
Within the thigh-bone of a Spanish mule
A Salamander's blood was plac'd to cool!
Upon a block of petrified cork-wood,
Right on the centre of the table stood
A precious prize....a huge green-turtle's shell
Found in the belly of an Erie whale,
Who swimming over Niagara's fall
Was bruised so much, it died at Montreal!....
Within this shell, a motley soup was made
Which more than all had Rembrandt's art dis-
play'd,

Thousands of strange ingredients in it thrown,
Were stirred together with an ass's bone....
To pay his homage to each curious guest
Who revelled at this philosophic feast,
Mazzei toning for his people's ease
Had thither sent a slave with Mammoth cheese....
A mity cheese in Cheshire lately made
Without the hands of slaves or foreign aid,
And sent to him who guides the helm of state
Who, moon-like rose, just when our sun had set....

By free-born yankees made within a state Which (ne'er till now had meanly prais'd the great,

Which ne'er till now, had stoop'd to flatter one
Who had belied his friend, our Washington.)
This cheese they nibbled like so many mice,
While mites skipped nimbly and as thick as lice
On head of Callender before 'twas shorn
By barber's shears which cruelly had torn Husbands from wives, unmov'd by their petition
That they might still retain a thirty years possession,
Now seated round the walnut table snug
Sipping Siberian whisky from a mug,
Found undigested, by an Indian squaw
Within a Cassowari's monstrous maw....
Rembrandt arose, the master of the feast
And thus address'd each virtuoso guest,
"Philosophers! the table-cloth remov'd,
"List to my toast, and be it well approv'd....
"Hawkins! strike up the tune, which David play'd

"When at his feet the queen of Sheba laid
"To bathe his legs....a condescending maid"....
Hawkins obey'd the order and began,
While Rembrandt gave "The Biped creature man,
"May virtue, peace and happiness appear,
"His character, distinguishing him here."
The soft, and love-sick strains crept gently round,
And thro' the Mammoth's tail and ears they found

Wide open'd doors and breath'd a pleasant sound,
A pipe of flint-stone Rembrandt now display'd
(By Little Turtle's mother's grandsire made)
And fill'd it with tobacco made long since
By Walter Raleigh. When he last went hence,
He left it with the tribe from which descends
Cornplanter, noblest of our Indian friends!....
The chesnut tree which grows on Aetna's side, (Whose trunk can more than fifty Mammoth's hide)

A coal to light this curious pipe supplied....
The pipe went round, and as the smoke curled up,
Each virtuoso forward stretched his head, (Much like tame geese when under gates they tread)

And through his nostrils tried to get a sup....
Rembrandt again rose up with pompous phiz,
And look'd as if he meant his guests to quiz
With a strange toast, of which not one who heard
Could, for his soul, well understand one word....
"The brains of freemen! may they never be
"So barricaded by the jack-ass bones
"Of opposition, that their native energy
"Be crushed, like adder's heads, between two stones."
Hawkins, with jaws, extended wide, look'd round,
His patent portable breath'd not a sound,
In admiration and in wonder lost
Ign'rant what tune to play to such a toast,
Then idly dropt his fingers on the keys,
And struck (apparently with greatest ease)
Such sounds of harmony as hungry cats,
Would make when running o'er the keys in chace of rats....

The tune concluded, Rembrandt rose again
And gave a gentle toast in mildest strain,
"The friends of peace! may all else have such bones
"To gnaw, as dried by twenty thousand moons
"May starve their hungry maws,
"And break their jaws."

A toast so mild, deserved soft melting airs,
And Hawkins, ever ready, struck their ears
With that sweet march, which when our freedom died,

A Frenchman made to soothe Mazzei's pride....
Rembrandt again rose up and roared aloud,
A toast among the philosophic crowd,
"The Philadelphia Ladies! as we love
"Them all, we'll say, before their naked beauties prove

"As horrible as bare bones, may we see
"Their limbs beneath the garb of modesty"....

Could a philosopher this toast express?
Who loves sweet nature in a naked dress?
Who loves to see her naked, unadorned?
Who, as superfluous has ever scorned
The artificial trappings of the world,
And swears that nature from her throne is hurled?....

If future females should conceal each limb
With robes, philosophy would be a whim....
Uncertain theory, mere speculation;
An idle business of calculation....
What philosophic brain pretends to know
The changes female forms may undergo....
And if a change in female forms should be,
How should we know it, when we cannot see
Their limbs, beneath the garb of modesty?...
But, Orpheus! cease, for God's sake cease that strain

I'm tired of singing, by my soul, I am,
My throat is parched....give me a cooling dram....
When next I want thee, I shall call again....
Yet one breath to tell each curious ear,
That after ten toasts and a volunteer,
Rembrandt first crept from out the Mammoth's maw,
And hung suspended by the lower jaw,
Then eighteen feet dropt down upon the earth,
Where Raphael stood to greet him at his "second birth"....

Some crept between the ribs....some thro' the ears,
Gutted of all its guests, the beast appears,
Save Hawkins, who within his belly latent
Took up his portable piano patent,
Together much too large t'escape before,
They found a passage thro' the wide back-door.

The following pretty parody will please all who remember "The Mountaineers."

SONG.

Tune—"Mollow Drum."

WHEN the busy toil of day is done,
And beneath the mountain sinks the sun,
Soft and fair,
The vernal air,
And echo answers merrily;
When I move
To meet my love,
My bounding heart beats cheerily.

When the yellow moon-beams light the vale,
And the bird of sorrow sings her tale,
Sad and low
The warbled woe,
Sounds thro' the wild-wood drearily;
Then breathe I
The tender sigh,
While beats my heart less cheerily.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. IX.

..... A lazy lolling sort,
Unseen at church, at senate, and at court,
Of ever listless loiterers, who attend
No call, no trust, no duty and no friend.
Thee too, my Paridel, I saw thee there,
Stretch'd on the rack of a too easy chair,
And heard thy everlasting yawn confess
The pains and penalties of idleness.

POPE.

MR. SAMUEL SAUNTER,

Although you have adopted the humble appellation of a "Lounger," and have not been ashamed to acknowledge yourself as such, yet we have not had such an exact description of you, as would make the world consider you in that light. Lounger, although simply defined by Dr. Johnson to be an idler, I take it, has a far more extensive signification than that word. It indicates not only a person, who spends a lazy life, but also one, who seems tired of that life; who is continually roving from one thing to another in search of amusement; which, if by chance he should find, is of so short duration, that he is obliged to keep himself in a perpetual agitation, to prevent life from becoming insupportable.

This cannot be denied to be the definition of a loungeur; for, I am sorry to say, that I come exactly under that description, and every body that knows me says that I am a loungeur, if ever there was one. Some, indeed, have even gone so far as to ask me, whether I was not Samuel Saunter?

In your introductory speculation, you observe, that the very idleness of an idler is instructive; admitting this, you must also allow, that the description of the habits of a loungeur, will edify, as well as amuse a portion of the readers of your paper. The following journal, without disguising myself in the least, is an exact copy of my daily occupation, and to my certain knowledge, it nearly answers that of several young gentlemen of my acquaintance.

Nine o'clock A. M. Time to rise. The academy bell ringing. remember when I was obliged to run with a school-boy's haste at the sound. Came down stairs. The family up. MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

IN a late democratic caucus, it was proposed to change the arms of the United States; and agreed, nem. con. that it would be highly improper to suffer the old ones to remain, under the new order of things. Much dissention happened on the choice of subjects.

As some of the members found it rather difficult to convey their ideas in appropriate phrases, and the imaginations of others were not very fertile, it was thought proper to postpone the consideration of the subject until the next meeting (which had not taken place at the time the post left Washington), when it was expected they would all be in readiness with their exempla.

I send you the following sketches, which were the only ones presented; and which, although a federalist, I think you will acknowledge to be "crayoned out" by their respective authors, with a peculiar felicity of invention.

REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LETTERS CONCERNING THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

AT the time that Mr. Bülow wrote his first letter, the treaty, recently concluded between England and the United States, engaged all the attention of the Americans, and was the cause of a schism among them. Mr. Bülow seems to have been struck with the language of the opponents to this governmental act; he, notwithstanding, takes no side in this question; but, from what he says, it is easy to collect, that neither disinterestedness, patriotism, nor services are a sufficient shield against calumny.

"Most of the public newspapers," says he, "are full of invective against the authors of this treaty; even Washington is not exempted. He is accused of having drawn from the public treasury, more money than he had a right to. He is charged with affecting airs of royalty and courtly manners. They say, that he is invisible to all but his ministers, and that he despises the simple citizen. He is reproached with being sold to the aristocrats of the country. He is even called the ally of George the third. The appellation given to the late treaty is, that it is a monument of infamy, attesting the ingratitude of America towards the French, who fought for their liberty. It is contended, that, since the conclusion of this treaty, the British privateers have taken more vessels from the Americans, than they did before, &c. &c. It appears, that a large majority of the American people are opposed, in sentiment, to this treaty; and what is most remarkable is, that the most violent complaints are made by the inhabitants of the interior country.

"I will not undertake to inquire, whether the treaty is consonant to the interests of America, or whether it would not have been better to refrain from making treaties with any European powers, contenting themselves with the observance of a strict neutrality. Nor will I venture the slightest judgment, with respect to the imputations against Washington. I content myself with a plain narrative of facts."

In his second letter, Mr. Bülow recurs to the etymology of the word republic, which is discovered without much difficulty; and, from his explanation of the term, he concludes, that the measures of government, rather than the form, constitutes a republic. However paradoxical it may seem, it would be conformable to the etymology, as well as to the nature of things, to call the government of Frederick II republican, inasmuch as the administration of this prince contributed to the good of his people. *The form of government does not constitute the essence of a republic. It is well known, that the constitution of a republic may long outlive the republic. Cicero, in his letters, often exclaims, The republic is no more! And that, before the civil war of the first Cæsar, at a time when the republican form existed entire.

In order to apply these observations to the United States, Mr. Bülow proposes this question: Are the measures of the government of the United States republican? And, although he avows, that he is not competent to make a peremptory decision, it is easily seen, that he leans to the negative.

Among other laws, which he cites, as being contrary to the public good, we notice those that concern the wild lands, which, according to him, give rise to speculations, wherein dishonesty predominates.

These speculations, says he, occasion fraud, which makes the property very precarious, which is very contrary to public good. As these lands pass, in a single day, through twenty different hands, it is impossible to discover the true proprietor; and it happens, that some people are so little scrupulous, as to sell the same lands to a variety of different people. It happens sometimes, that, when a person begins a settlement on his purchase, up come an host of other purchasers, bringing their title deeds of a prior date, and thus some are obliged to pay the purchase money, two or three times over.

In the third letter, Mr. Bulow speaks of the sovereignty of the people, as he before spoke of the republic; and he pretends that, when the laws are conformable to the interests of the people, their sovereignty exists, under any form of government. He seems to question the sovereignty of the people in the United States. He asks if they are worthy of being so? If they are virtuous? And he directly eludes the answer. It is necessary, says he, to be almost as reserved upon the reputation of a people, as upon that of an individual. "I confess," continues he, "that I believe in original sin; I believe that natural propensities are transmitted from sire to offspring. It cannot be denied that children receive an internal organization, similar to that of their parents, and this structure contributes to determine character, more than Helvetius imagines. Here, then, it may be asked, whence do the Americans derive their origin?"

"The inhabitants of New-England, a very respectable race of men, persecuted on account of religion, fly to this country, and establish themselves there, at their own expense; but in process of time they have been joined by a great number of candidates for Botany-bay*, emigrants from Ireland, who cannot be cited as models of good manners; and German peasants, from the borders of the Rhine, whose descendants are said to love dollars above every thing, and nothing but dollars, and who, consequently, have not degenerated from their ancestors."

This is not the only passage wherein Mr. Bülow speaks of the taste of the Americans for dollars. "People of observation," says he, in his fifth letter, "have remarked, that the English, in general, have a profound veneration for the rich. This respect for money is quite as striking among the Americans. As the thirst for consideration is general, every one tries to grow rich, as soon as possible, cost what it may. This avidity corresponds but little with republican virtues. But why should we believe that the Americans are champions of virtue?"

Generally speaking, Mr. Bulow treats with great severity the people he went to visit; and his judgment would appear more impartial perhaps, if he now and then made an exception, which every ingenuous man must make. He shows this indulgence only to Washington, whom he treats better in his fifth letter than in the first, doubtless because he knew him better at one period than the other. It is where he speaks of the two parties that divide America. "The anti-federalists," says he, "since the revolution, have taken the name of democrats. Being, by the federalists, denominated jacobins and anarchists, they think, in their turn, to stigmatise them, by giving them the name of aristocrats."

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

No. XIII.

THE advocates of the power of congress to abolish the judges, endeavour to deduce a presumption of intention favourable to their doctrine, from this argument....The provision concerning the tenure of office (say they) ought to be viewed as a restraint upon the executive department, because, to this department belongs the power of removal; in like manner as the provision concerning the diminution of compensations ought to be regarded as a restraint upon the legislative department, because to this department belongs the power of regulating compensations. The different members of the clause ought to be taken distributively, in conformity with the distribution of power to the respective departments.

This is certainly the most specious of the arguments, which have been used on that side. It has received several pertinent and forcible answers.... But it is believed to be susceptible of one still more direct and satisfactory; which is not recollected to have been yet given.

If, in the theory of the constitution, there was but one way of defeating the tenure of office, and that exclusively appertaining to the executive authority, it would be a natural and correct inference, that this authority was solely contemplated in a constitutional provision upon the subject. But the fact is clearly otherwise. There are two modes known to the constitution, in which the tenure of office may be affected....one the abolition of the office, the other the removal of the officer. The first is a legislative act, and operates by removing the office from the person....the last is an executive act, and operates by removing the person from the office. Both equally cause the tenure, enjoyment, or holding of the office to cease.

This being the case, the inference, which has been drawn, fails. There is no ground for the presumption, that the constitution, in establishing the tenure of an office, had an exclusive eye to one only of the two modes, in which it might be affected. The more rational supposition is, that it intended to reach and exclude both; because, this alone can fulfil the purpose, which it appears to have in view: And it ought neither to be understood to aim at less than its language imports, nor to employ inadequate means for accomplishing the end, which it professes. Or, the better to elucidate the idea, by placing it in another form, it may be said, that since, in the nature of things, the legislative, equally with the executive organ, may, by different modes of action, affect the tenure of office; when the constitution undertakes to prescribe what that tenure shall be, it ought to be presumed to intend to guard that, which shall have been prescribed against the interference of either department.

In an instrument abounding with examples of restrictions on the legislative discretion, there is no difficulty in supposing that one was intended in every case, in which it may be fairly inferred, either from the words used, or from the object to be effected.

While the reason, which has been stated, refers the provision respecting the tenure of judicial offices as well to the executive as to the legislative department, were it necessary to examine to which, if to either of them, it ought to be deemed most appropriate, there could be no difficulty in selecting the latter, rather than the former. The tenure of an office is one of its essential qualities. A provision, therefore, which is destined to prescribe or define this quality, may be supposed to have a more peculiar reference to that department, which is empowered to constitute the office; either as directory to it in the exercise of its power, or as fixing what otherwise would be left to its discretion.

It is constantly to be recollected, that the terms of the provision do not look particularly to either department. They are general. "The judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour." 'Tis not from the terms, therefore, that an exclusive applicability to the executive organ can be in-

* What an arch heretic is this Mr. Bulow, if his faith be graduated by the scale of the republican creed, as understood by the rulers of the land at this day! According to Jefferson and others, there is but one only and true republic, viz. a representative democracy.——Note of Translator.

* By this, must be understood persons deserving of Botany-bay, an establishment formed within a few years, to receive the malefactors, whom England formerly transported to the colonies, which she has since lost.——Note of the Reviewer.

ferred. On the contrary, they must be narrowed to give them only this effect.

It is different as to the provision concerning compensations. Though equally general in the terms, this can have no relation but to the legislative department; because, as before observed, that department alone would have had power to diminish the compensations. But this reason for confining that provision to one department, namely, the power of affecting the compensations, so far from dictating a similar appropriation of the other provision, looks a different way, and requires, by analogy, that the latter should be applied to both the departments, each having a power of affecting the tenure of office, in a way peculiar to itself. Nor can it be too often repeated, because it is a consideration of great force, that the design so conspicuous in the former of these two provisions, to secure the independence of the judges against legislative influence, is a powerful reason for understanding the latter in a sense calculated to advance the same important end, rather than in one, which must entirely frustrate it.

A rule of constitutional law opposed to our construction, is attempted to be derived from the maxim, that the power of legislation is always equal; and that a preceding can never bind or controul a succeeding legislature by its acts, which, therefore, must always be liable to repeal, at the discretion of the successor.

The misapplication, or too extensive application of general maxims or propositions, true in their genuine sense, is one of the most common and fruitful sources of false reasoning. This is strongly exemplified in the present instance. The maxim relied upon, can mean nothing more, than that as to all those matters, which a preceding legislature was free to establish and revoke, a succeeding legislature will be equally free. The latter may do what the former could have done, or it may undo what the former could have undone. But unless it can be maintained, that the power of ordinary legislation is in itself illimitable, incontrollable, incapable of being bound either by its own acts, or by the injunctions or prohibitions of a constitution, it will follow, that the body invested with that power may bind itself, and may bind its successor: so that neither itself nor its successor can of right revoke acts, which may have been once done. To say that a legislature may bind itself, but not its successor, is to affirm, that the latter has not merely an equal, but a greater power than the former, else it could not do what the former was unable to do. Equality of power only will not suffice for the argument. On the other hand, to affirm that a legislature cannot bind itself, is to assert, that there can be no valid pledge of the public faith, that no right can be vested in an individual, or collection of individuals, whether of property or of any other description, which may not be resumed at pleasure.

Without doubt a legislature binds itself by all those acts, which engage the public faith; which confer on individuals permanent rights, either gratuitously or for valuable consideration; and in all these instances a succeeding one is not less bound. As to a right, which may have been conferred by an express provision of the constitution, defining the condition of the enjoyment; or as to an institution or matter in its nature permanent, which the constitution may have confided to an act of the legislature; its authority terminates with the act that vests the right, or makes the establishment. A case of the first sort is exemplified in the office of a judge; of the last, in the creation of a new state, which has been very pertinently mentioned as a decisive instance of power in a legislature to do a thing, which, being done, is irrevocable.

But whatever may be the latitude we assign to the power of a legislature over the acts of a predecessor, it is nothing to the purpose, so long as it shall be admitted that the constitution may bind and controul the legislature. With this admission, the simple inquiry must always be....has or has not the constitution, in the particular instance, bound the legislature? And the solution must be sought in the language, nature, and end of the provision. If those warrant the conclusion, that the legislature was intended to be bound, it is perfect nonsense to reply that this cannot be so because a legislature cannot bind itself by its own acts; or because the power of one legislature is equal to that of another. What signifies this proposition, if the constitution has power to bind the legislature, and has, in fact, bound it in a given case? Can a general rule disprove the fact of an exception, which it is admitted may exist? If so, the argument is always ready, and equally valid to disprove any limitation of the legislative discretion.

Compelled, as they must be, to desist from the use of the argument, in the extensive sense, in which it has been employed, if its inventors should content themselves with saying, that, at least, the principle adduced by them ought to have so much of force, as to make the exception to it depend on an express provision....it may be answered, that in the case under consideration, there is an express provision. No language can be more precise or peremptory than this. "The judges, both of the supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behaviour." If this be not an express provision, it is impossible to devise one. But the position, that an express provision is necessary to form an exception, is itself unfounded. Wherever it is clear, whether by a circumstance expressed, or by one so implied as to leave no reasonable doubt, that a limitation of the authority of the legislature was designed by the constitution, the intention ought to prevail.

A very strong confirmation of the true intent of the provision respecting the tenure of judicial office results from an argument by analogy. In each of the articles, which establishes any branch of the government, the duration of office is a prominent feature. Two years for the house of representatives, six for the senate, four for the president and vice-president, are the respective terms of duration; and for the judges, the term of good behaviour is allotted. It is presumable, that each was established in the same spirit, as a point material in the organization of the government, and of a nature to be properly fundamental. It will not be pretended that the duration of office prescribed as to any other department, is within the reach of legislative discretion. And why shall that of judicial officers form an exception? Why shall the constitution be supposed less tenacious of securing to this organ of the sovereign power, a fixed duration than to any other? If there be any thing, which ought to be supposed to be peculiarly excepted out of the power of the ordinary legislature, it is emphatically the organization of the several constituent departments of the government, which in our system are the legislative, executive, and judiciary. Reasons of the most cogent nature recommend that the stability and independence of the last of these three branches should be guarded with particular circumspection and care.

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

From the Washington Federalist, February 19.

Yesterday, in the house, a very handsome and correct speech was made by Mr. Stanley (N. C.) against the repealing bill.

Mr. Giles rose in favour of the bill. He commenced with abusing the administrations of Washington and Adams, which abuse was continued through the whole speech. His language reminded us of Smith's correct remark, that the democrats were iron orators.—He certainly discovered some ingenuity, and as we expected, an immense deal of sophistry, of palpable sophistry, indeed argument was of course out of the question.

The speech of Mr. Giles disappointed both parties: as to the constitutionality, he said not one word that cannot easily be refuted; as to the expediency, he was not more successful. We believe that in the opinion of both parties, he has sunk ninety-nine per cent.

The debate has taken such a turn that we do not think it will close in less than two weeks from the commencement. The most splendid speeches on the federal side are yet to be delivered. All will be done that can be done to preserve the constitution; but hope is almost without foundation.

February 20.

Yesterday, in the House, in committee of the whole, on the Judiciary Bill, Mr. Bayard was the only speaker. He commenced with a reply to Mr. Giles, who talked the preceding day: Mr. Giles had introduced a variety of matter totally irrelevant to the subject: but as that matter was intended to affect the question, it was necessary to reply. This respected the sinking fund, the internal revenue, the direct tax, the Indian war, the commencement of the navy, the mission of Messrs. Marshall, Pinckney and Gerry, Mr. Giles's insult of Washington, his assertion that the late law was intended to preserve the influence of an expiring party, his unfounded calumnies of the judges in executing the sedition law, his assertions that the Federal wish was to destroy the state sovereignties—the common law—the conduct of the supreme court with regard to these commissions of Mr. Giles's attack on the pulpit, &c. These subjects Mr. Giles had introduced as preliminary to his arguments on the bill before the house—and to these subjects Mr. Bayard was compelled to reply. After which he took up the consideration of the inexpediency of the bill. This subject was handled in a most masterly manner. He was about to enter on the constitutionality of the bill, when after speaking three hours and an half, he observed, that having detained the committee so long, and having yet many remarks to make, if it were the wish of the chairman, or of the committee, he would postpone the further consideration of the subject till the succeeding day. It was then moved that the committee rise. The general voice was against it, but on Mr. Bayard's rising again, it was perceived that his voice was broken, and that he was in some measure exhausted—Mr. B. said that he should not be able to offer what he had wished; he might proceed, but should not be able to conclude his observations as he desired. The committee then rose.

Mr. Bayard began about 12, and suspended his remarks at half past three; this day he will conclude.

The speeches of Mr. Morris and Mr. Tracy in the Senate, and of Mr. Hemphill in the house, have received great applause, but as far as we are able to judge, we must pronounce the speech of Mr. Bayard far superior, not only to those, but will rank with the speech of a Demosthenes, a Cicero, or a Chatham. This is saying much, but when that speech shall be published, not a single person will dispute the correctness of this remark.

Mr. Bayard addressed himself mostly to the understanding: he examined the subject with the greatest penetration and more extensively than any, we might say perhaps than all his predecessors.

We cannot omit here observing that the speech of Mr. Bayard, as it respected the expediency of the bill had a sensible effect on the democratic members; indeed we have heard some of them say, that their minds were convinced of the inexpediency of the bill. But we have reason to fear that their implicit obedience to the mandatory recommendations of the executive, and their violent passion and party prejudice, will induce them to overlook the destruction of our liberty and of our union.

FROM THE ANTI-DEMOCRAT.

FAREWELL, A LONG FAREWELL TO ALL OUR GREATNESS.

THE fatal bill has passed: our constitution is no more. After Mr. Dana, Mr. Plater, and Mr. Talmage spoke against the bill, on Monday evening, several motions were made for the committee to rise, and pressed in earnest terms by Mr. A. Foster, Mr. Bayard, and Mr. Griswold, and opposed by Mr. Claiborne and Mr. Dawson. At about eleven o'clock, the question was taken, for striking out the first section of the bill, and negatived; the votes standing 31 in favour of striking out, and 60 against it. The yeas and nays will be given, and the nays often, often republished.

When all the speeches on the federal side shall be published, we dare assert, that there will not be a single candid intelligent mind that will not be convinced, both of the inexpediency and unconstitutionality of the bill. What other acts, urged by the intoxication of power, and the fury of party rage, are yet to mark this session, we cannot yet determine. One thing is however morally certain, namely, that the bill will be sufficient to open the eyes of the people, and to convert them from their late political delusion: but we fear their eyes will be opened when too late, when it will be impossible to restore the constitution.

Added to others, there is one violation of the constitution, "open, gross, palpable." The constitution says, the salaries of no judge shall be diminished, while in office. By this bill the judges of Kentucky and Tennessee are curtailed in their salaries FIVE HUNDRED DOLLARS each.

The judges will continue to hold their courts, as if the bill had not passed. 'Tis their solemn duty to do it; their country, all that is dear and valuable, call on them to do it. By the judges this bill will be declared null and void: the country will then be divided into two sects only, those who hold to the independency of the judges and to the constitution, and those who hold the sovereignty of Virginia, and the uselessness of any general constitution. We say the sovereignty of Virginia, because that state now wields the rod of empire: not the talents, the learning, the wealth, virtue, and worth of that state, but the scum that political madness has thrown on the surface; the demagogues that have stolen the people's short lived confidence.

And now we would ask the mighty victors, what is your triumph? You have wreaked your vengeance on sixteen judges, and in doing it have destroyed the best constitution that ever was formed, and one carrying with it the seeds of its own perfection. What is the triumph of the president? He has gratified his malice towards the judges, but he has drawn a tear into the eye of every thoughtful patriot....he has lost many, very many of his best friends....he has done no good, but has laid the foundation of infinite mischief.... Let us ask those who favoured the bill, to turn to their own hearts, and examine their own sensations. What are they? Are their feelings agreeable? Have they the consciousness of having acted meritoriously? Of having had no other view than the public good? Or do they not feel, as he felt, who at last gained a victory over innocence in paradise? Do they not feel the guilty pleasure of having gratified their party vengeance, and ready nobly to exclaim, what, though a constitution is destroyed, and an empire's peace and prosperity forever checked, we have gained a victory over sixteen enemies?

It has been suggested, we think with very considerable probability, that it was the determination of the party to take this step, to bring about a general dissolution of the union. Virginia, as the government now is, will not be content, without holding in hand the reins of the general government; New-England will never submit to be a colony of Virginia: the Virginian demagogues, aware of this, are not unwilling to be disconnected from the northern states. Indeed, some have gone so far as to say, that the manners, habits, customs, principles, and ways of thinking are so different in the southern and northern states, that, if an amicable dissolution could take place, it would be for the peace and general advantage of the whole. But from the moment such a dissolution takes place, may we date the rapid progress of America to a state of incivilization. In all human probability, we cannot exist as a nation, without a general government. Once divided into two, we shall soon be into twenty clashing sovereignties, continually at war with each other. Or do we imagine, that the best informed citizens of the southern states wish such disunion. They are sensible how great is their danger from their slaves, and how easy it might be for the northern people to subjugate them, by means of the slaves. Far, far distant be the day, when these injured slaves shall PRACTICE on those empty declamations of EQUAL RIGHTS, which yet exist but in theory among masters. May the time never come, when these slaves rise against their masters. But the possibility that such a time may come, ought to teach the southern states, that to them union is far more necessary than to the people of New-England; for should their ever be a spirit of general insurrection among the blacks, that spirit will rage uncontrolled in the blood of the whites, till quelled by the people of the northern states. These are not unfounded suggestions: nothing but a signal interposition of Providence prevented, about eighteen months since, the total destruction of the city of Richmond, and murder of its white inhabitants; and when the devastation and bloodshed would have ended, Heaven only knows.

The house were on Tuesday mostly engaged in attempting to make amendments to the bill, but all attempts failed; though the absolute necessity of such amendments were apparent, and were acknowledged by the democrats. Their plea was, that such amendments might be brought forward in a supplementary bill. On the proposed amendment, continuing the salaries of the judges of Kentucky and Tennessee, and, in one instance at least, save a direct infraction of the constitution, Mr. Eustis and Mr. Davis voted for the amendment, but it was lost. Thus men violate the plain dictates of their consciences and their oaths (we say not intentionally), and expect to atone in part by a supplementary bill.

The bill having passed to a third reading for Wednesday, may be considered as irrevocably past.

Should Mr. Breckenridge now bring forward a resolution to repeal the law, establishing the supreme court of the United States, we should only consider a part of the system intended to be pursued. It can as well be done, as consistently with the constitution, as what has been done. It may seem too bold for this session; but the democrats having established the principle, that there is no such thing as breaking the constitution, do what you will, we sincerely expect it will be done next session, should we have another session under the present remnant of our constitution. They can then repeal the law establishing that court, having caution not to have the repeal operate, till the new law commences: then the old judges cease of course with the old law; and still they will comply with the constitution, which says, there shall be one supreme court; to make it quite nothing, they'll perhaps have but one judge. Such is democracy.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

As I was sullenly sauntering home the other morning, between the hours of two and three, having been occupied with a certain watchfulness, in which I am well known sometimes to indulge, I met with an odd adventure, which, for pleasantness sake, I will essay to lay before my readers, in as faithful a manner as my then imperfect vision, and my still fainter recollection of objects will permit. As I passed along the shambles, between Third and Second streets, I thought I observed an uncommon appearance upon one of the stalls, and, on approaching a little nearer, I could discern that a living animal, of some description or other, had taken up its night's lodgings in that spot; the extraordinary size and singular shape of this animal attracted my curiosity to examine it, not doubting but I should readily be able to ascertain with precision, not only the name of the beast, but, if necessary, his nature and peculiar properties. To my utter astonishment and terror, the animal began to rouse, and discovered evident tokens of an intention to move. I was so apprehensive of personal injury from the creature, that I scarcely stopped to observe what course it steered, as it moved off, but I conjectured it had gone down to the Delaware, and as it possibly might be of an amphibious nature, I imagined it would disappear, and perhaps no such animal might ever be seen in these parts again, or if a discovery should be made that such a beast once existed, I had no doubt but that in a long course of years, when the river Delaware should be drained off by the Wilmington canal company, some remains of the skeleton of this animal might possibly be found. This being a subject of immense importance, and a question so interesting to the happiness of mankind, I think it might well reward the philosophic leisure, and the learned labours of the president of the United States, who is likewise president of the Philadelphia Philosophical Society. Should the persevering industry of our chief be applied and directed to this research, there can be no doubt but that, aided and assisted, as he certainly would be, by the sagacious surmises, conjectures and hypotheses of the greatest naturalists in this country, a most valuable discovery would, in all human probability, result from it; and if this wonderful animal should eventually turn out to be nothing less than the mammoth maggot, which is said to have been buried in the bowels of the mammoth cheese, why, who could be surprised? The only essential difference between the mammoth maggot, that is likely to be discovered, and the Arabian maggot is, that the former has teeth entirely enameled, which constitute it not only a carnivorous, but a cheesivorous animal, whereas the latter is not. Now, good Oliver Oldschool, I shall look for as many solutions in your subsequent numbers of the Port Folio, for this phenomenon in natural history, as I expect there will be mammoth maggots in the mammoth cheese, when it shall be cut open, sometime in the warm month of July, next ensuing.

Meantime, I am,

Your well-wisher,

IGNATIUS INQUISITIVE.

MISCELLANY.

Extract of a letter from an American gentleman in Germany to his friend in this town.

Berlin, 8th June, 1802.

Dear Sir,

YOU may have wondered at my having resided so long in this city, without saying any thing in my letters upon the subject of the Prussian army. The truth is, that all my letters to you have related either to my personal concerns, or have contained sketches of the state of public affairs in Europe, which from the present situation of the world, I thought might be more interesting than an account of the institutions of the country in which I find myself. In my first letter of a local nature, what subject has a better claim to be first considered than the famous review of Potsdam and Berlin? If the question of preference was to be decided by the laudableness of the end, those institutions which have for their object the amelioration of the lot of men, would certainly be entitled to priority: but as the science of war has become one of those which are absolutely necessary to the safety of society, as it is in this country the only honourable profession, and it is the one which has approached the nearest to perfection, it may not be amiss to mention it first:

The Reviews in this city, and at Potsdam are held twice a year.—In the provinces the troops are reviewed once in two years. About the beginning of March, the recruits and the soldiers absent on furlough join their regiments; the sergeants begin to exercise immediately after their return, when the weather permits, in public squares; and when it does not, in the royal stables, and other buildings allotted to that use. The recruits continue to be exercised in this way for about a month, when they are exercised in companies by the officers twice a day. The first of April the king goes to Potsdam to exercise his own regiment, which is garrisoned there. From this time until what are called the great manœuvres, the whole garrison, infantry as well as cavalry, go out every morning at day-break to a village called Tempelhoff, which is about three English miles from hence, and there go through their evolutions; they return about eleven, at two o'clock are again exercised in companies. The 13th of May the governor of Berlin, field-marshal Mollendorf, reviews the whole garrison in the park; this is what is called the governor's special review. The 18th the king comes from Potsdam, and reviews the garrison and the strange regiments that come here to assist at the manœuvres. In the spring there are four strange regiments of infantry, and three of cavalry that come to Berlin from the neighbouring garrisons, the furthest of which is not more than 60 English miles distant.—The cavalry is encamped at a small distance from one of the gates of the city; the infantry is quartered among those of the inhabitants who have not purchased the freedom of their houses at the time of building them. This season, there were twenty battalions of infantry and four of grenadiers, 15 squadrons of cuirassiers, five of dragoons, and five of Hussars, collected for the review; the whole of which, were the regiments complete, would amount to upwards of 30,000 men. The Hussars of Gaiking, the Hussars of the king's body guard are by far the most beautiful troops that ever I saw. Only five squadrons are in garrison here, the rest being upon the line of demarkation. Their dress consists of a red jacket which sits close to the body, ornamented before with a profusion of gold lace, which serves instead of facing—pantaloon of white leather, with boots of yellow morocco, the tops of which are bound with gold cord, and a gold tassel hanging down before; they wear likewise when on duty, a sable skin cap, which is near half a yard long, to which is attached an uncommonly long plume—from the cap is suspended a large cord and tassels of gold, which reaches almost to the horse's back.—On Gala days, the officers wear a leopard skin, decorated with a crescent, and a constellation of stars, which is thrown over the left shoulder, and curled under the right arm, this part of their uniform was a present from the empress Elizabeth of Russia. On ordinary occasions they have a blue jacket faced with gold and lined with fur, thrown over their shoulders and fastened before; this is their dress in winter. The dress of a common soldier differs only in quality from that of an officer. They are armed with a carabine, horse pistol, and a sabre, and have no camp equipage; they are mounted on Polish and Ukraine horses, which are very fleet, small and hardy. Their bridles and harness are ornamented with marine shells.

The great manœuvres last three days. The first day the cavalry and infantry act separately. The cavalry charge in a single line....the heavy part of it composes the centre, the hussars are on the flanks. The king and spectators stand on the opposite side of the plain, the cavalry advances at first but slowly; it quickens gradually its pace, until it gets within a short distance of the king, when a charge is ordered, and then the line advances, with sabres uplifted, as swift as their horses can carry them; when arrived within a rod of the king, the word halt is heard, and the whole line is as motionless, as if the horses were of stone. The light cavalry on the flank wheel in a second, and form themselves into squares; this is repeated several times, after which they all defile before the king, and then the business of the day is over.

I know of no sight more grand than a line of cavalry upon the full charge, halting in an instant, and in the action of halting raising such quantities of dust, that, for a moment, it seems that they are taken up in a cloud.

The evolutions of the infantry consist only in a simple attack in two lines; the first gets broken, and is obliged to retire; the second line then opens its ranks, and lets the first pass through; it then closes again, becomes the first, and advances to the attack: this is repeated several times, after which the infantry defiles before the king, and then the promotions take place. Now the countenance of many a new-made captain is seen to gladden, whose trifling emoluments of lieutenant scarcely kept him from starving, and who now anticipates in imagination the enjoyment of five hundred pounds a year.

The manœuvres of the second day are more varied and interesting. The cavalry is divided into two divisions, which attack each other in solid squares. Small parties are detached from each side, which advance towards the enemy's line, fire, and then march back to load their pieces again. This firing continues for some time; at length they begin to charge each other; one of the parties is worsted, and obliged to retreat, but being closely pursued, it wheels and defends itself. After repulsing the enemy, it continues its retreat, but is continually harassed. At length the enemy obtains such a decided superiority, that it is obliged to think of retreating out of its reach: to effect this, it is necessary to pass a river which lies in its rear; it therefore detaches squadrons to the other side of the river; these dismount, and form themselves on the banks of the river, near the foot of the bridge of boats, which have been thrown over to facilitate the retreat. In the mean time, the squadrons of the enemy are pouring down upon them, and annoying them in every possible way; but, notwithstanding this, the passage of the bridge is effected in the greatest order, covered by the fire of the squadrons, drawn up on foot, and by the squadrons, which, in retreating, cover each other reciprocally; until at length all have passed except a single file, which stands firm to the last, and covers, against whole squadrons, another file, which is crossing the bridge. After the cavalry has completed its retreat, the infantry advances in two lines, covered by the cavalry; but its line is thrown into confusion by the enemy's cavalry; retreats through the second line, which advances; but it appearing that the enemy is infinitely superior in cavalry, and as, from the nature of the ground, it can act in every direction, the order of battle is changed, and the infantry form themselves into squares, to prevent the enemy's cavalry from breaking their line, and enveloping them. Thus ends the second day. I am sorry I have not time to say any thing about the third, on which was represented the famous battle of Neuwied, which acquired so much glory to the Prussian arms.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

Proposals are issued by John Hoff, for publishing by subscription, Plutarch's Lives, translated from the original Greek; with notes critical and historical, and a new life of Plutarch. By John Langhorne, D. D. and William Langhorne, M. A.

The proposer would deem it vanity in the extreme, to attempt to descant on the merits of the work proposed;—yet, notwithstanding its celebrity and excellence, amidst the vortex of politics and the busy scenes of domestic life, he thinks it not superfluous, as a memento, to transcribe a critic, from the London Monthly Review, on the last English version—"There is no study which is more interesting than that of Biography; and in this walk of literature, there is no author more eminent than Plutarch. While he excites in us an admiration of the superior qualities, and of the shining actions of those great men, whose history he has recorded, he describes minutely their private behaviour and manners; and his details exhibit very ample materials by which to judge of the principles and motives of human conduct. There is no work of consequence which furnishes, to the speculative reader, a more extensive source of agreeable or profound reflection: and none that can be oftener read without disgust or fatigue.

"At length our biographer has had the good fortune to have justice done him; and we have now before us a translation of his Lives, in which the most fastidious critic will find little to censure.

"Next to the Life of Plutarch, the original matter of the greatest importance, with which our translators have enriched their work, is their notes and illustrations. In these they have displayed an extensive acquaintance with the Greek and Roman usages; and, while they elucidate the obscurities of their author, they supply the more memorable facts which he had omitted.

"The censure which has been thrown on the Greek of Plutarch, would have preserved his translator, it may be thought, from copying too closely his peculiarities, but very learned men want frequently the taste which is necessary to judge of the beauties and defects of composition.—Hence, till the publication before us, we could not boast of a version of his Lives, that deserved to be encouraged, from the skill or the merit which it discovered. Better informed, and with more liberal views than are usually to be found in the interpreters of the ancients, our translators engaged in a task for which they were fully qualified. They possessed the taste, the penetration and the ability which were requisite to unfold to them the difficulties they had to encounter, and to overcome them. They have divided the involved and embarrassing periods of their Greek original; and, while they have expressed the conceptions of their author with fidelity, they have been attentive to render him with elegance."

[Monthly Rev. vol. xlv.

After this view of the work, it only remains for the proposer, in order to ensure a generous patronage, to submit his

CONDITIONS.

- I. The Work shall be comprised in six volumes duodecimo; each volume to average 380 pages; to be elegantly and correctly printed on a superfine wove paper and new type, and ornamented with a handsome frontispiece.
- II. The price to subscribers will be one dollar twelve and a half cents per volume, neatly bound and lettered—No money will be required till publication.
- III. As soon as 300 copies are subscribed for, the work will be put to press, and a volume published monthly.
- IV. Those who procure 8 subscribers, and are responsible for the same, shall have one for their trouble.—A list of the patrons to this valuable work, shall accompany the last volume.

The annunciation of this valuable book concludes with the following liberal condition:

Should the work, on its appearance, not prove, in the estimation of the connoisseur, neatly and correctly printed, its reception shall be optional with the Subscribers.

After this complete view of the Lives, above proposed, it only remains for the editor of the Port Folio to add his warmest wishes that a book of biography, so valuable, and so elegantly translated, may become popular. Let it be remembered that THODORE BEZA was of opinion that if a general shipwreck of literature should take place, the book he should wish to preserve would be PLUTARCH; and that scarcely a solitary treatise upon education can be found in which the instructive pages of this narrative Greek are not recommended.

LITERARY NOTICE.

IN a few days will be published, the second edition of "An Essay on the propagation of the Gospel," in which there are numerous facts and arguments adduced to prove that many of the Indians in America are descended from the Ten Tribes.—By Charles Crawford, Esquire.—And the third American edition of "The Christian," a poem, in six books—by the same author.—To be sold by James Humphreys at the corner of Walnut and Dock-streets, and Benjamin Johnson, No. 39, High-street, Philadelphia.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

WE are happy to have occasion to mention, that, if credit may be given to private letters, and information not official, the vice president appears to be determined not to go all lengths with those, who are esteemed his partizans. This, it is said, is very little relished by the Virginian noblesse. Whatever may be Mr. Burr's motive, it is certain, that in at least two questions, where much responsibility rested on his decision, his vote was apparently given, utterly unbiassed by any spirit of party.

It appears, that the majority of the house of representatives have hit upon a new mode of legislating. When the federal part of the house bring forward a resolution, if it be not relished by the other party, and the arguments in support of it are unanswerable, they keep a determined silence. This political lo-k-jaw, they think, will save the nation a deal of time, and themselves much trouble in replying to "the logic and the wisdom" of the federalists. Some say, however, that it is a contrived plan of "those friends of the people," those political economists, those time savers, or time servers, to stop the garrulity of a Mr. Bacon, a member from Massachusetts, and formerly, by profession, a parson. This, it is said, is fairly gagging the parson; it is at least ringing him, so that he cannot root. The party, we learn, still think that he is not perfectly cured, and some other mode, it is said, will be devised to smoke him more effectually. [Farmer's Museum.]

How to make a climax, addressed to all beginners in the art of composition.

The beauty of this figure, like that of plants disposed in a green-house, proceeds from visible proportion. It depends, of course, upon accuracy of eye. If, therefore, after having fixed on the first term of your climax, you cannot easily find any similar expressions, proportionably longer, it remains only to write the original term at some distance forwards on the page, and to fill up the intervening space at your leisure, by words proportionably shorter, in an inverse ratio.

How to modulate a period.

To please the ear, is the last and grand effort of a highly finished style. The easiest way of attaining such excellence, will be to note down the most admired sentences of Addison, Junius, and Blair, to calculate the words in each member, the proportion of vowels to consonants, the balance of long and short syllables, till your ears be so attuned to one particular measure, that your ideas may be spontaneously absorbed in the same revolving eddy of recursive harmony.

How to write an essay.

Whenever there is any danger of sinking below your subject, your language should be proportionably swollen and sublime. A full band is a powerful supporter to a weak voice. Yet, as a continual blaze of light is oppressive, and as the cataracts of the first rivers in the world deafen those, who listen too long, a prudent essayist will render his language rather soothing than animating, and more polished than pointed. It will break on the ear like thunder so distant, that its lightnings alarm not; and when well rounded, will roll smoothly over the mind, without leaving any impression.

It will be found the safest mode, in the opening of an essay, to dwell on a few positive truths, conveyed in short and unconnected sentences. As a bird, first leaving his nest, perches, by some short and irregular hops, to look about him, before he spreads his wings. The more obvious these truths are, the better; and, if they have been already mentioned, once or twice, by different authors, it will be an additional advantage, since every body will see how cautiously you tread at first, and follow, wherever you lead them, without suspicion.

In the further advancement of an essay, your sentences must of course be long and short, as the nature of your subject requires; yet, even here, care should be taken to mix them properly. Before you venture to introduce a string of long and intricate sentences, you had better glance at what is to come, by playing off some concise apothegm; as at chess, the oblique motion of the pawn prepares us for the direct attack of the piece.

Mythological allusions, if very familiar, have an undescribable charm. They excite in us the same sensations of delight, the same soothing remembrance of our earlier hours, with which, after a long absence, we recognize a school acquaintance. When you describe a scene, which you wish should be thought pathetic, boldly pronounce it so yourself. Nothing is so convenient to the reader, as thus to be taught how he is to feel; nothing is more consistent, than thus to be at once the painter and the spectator of the piece.

It will immensely contribute to the pomp of style, that the sentence should be principally constructed of such words as boast Greek or Latin genealogy. However trivial this may seem to superficial judges, I will venture to pronounce it a rule, which admits not of a single exception. For instance, ardour should be preferred to heat, tardy to slow, sinuous to winding, and pulchritude to beauty. I should have little hope of an author, who should write "the country lying round," when he might so classically phrase it "the country circumjacent." An acquaintance of mine, a great master of languages, invariably uses fortitude to the exclusion of magnanimity, because it is nearer to the Latin, by one letter.

Thanks to our elaborate predecessors, thoughts are easily collected on any subject. All that remains for us is, to disguise the expression, yet preserve the substance; to introduce them, however unconnected, without obvious abruptness; and to join them, however little related, without obvious incongruity. To this end, it will be necessary to polish the style, till the flaws in the interior of the piece are lost in the lustre of the surface; for the radiance of ornamental expression diffuses itself over every void, and blends the motley parts in one uniform and splendid whole.

To this glare of colouring much attention is requisite. It is not produced by the free use of the pencil, but is effected by an infinity of patient and timid touches, accumulated with intense and unremitting industry; and when the rough draft is so heightened by repeated revisions, that of the original words, not more than half a score remains to constitute its identity, the writer may flatter himself that he is near the proposed perfection.

Lastly, When you wish to depress your reader, you must previously give him his cue, in such phrases as these: "It is melancholy to reflect;" "It is a painful and humiliating consideration." When, on the contrary, you wish to elevate and surprise, you must begin in this manner: "We gaze, with sensible delight, on this bright and amiable picture;" "From this gloomy catalogue, we turn, with eagerness, to a more pleasing retrospect."

How to quote learnedly.

When you wish to fortify yourself with authorities, peruse the following method:

As soon as your piece is transcribed, leave a wide marginal space in your page, and arrange by the side of your text the names of the most abstruse authors, from whom information might have been drawn. The more of these the better; and scruple not to cite books, which you have never opened. This, of all others, is the securest mode of citation. You will betray too much, if you mention the books, which you have really read.

The eloquence and sound reasoning of the minority in congress are the general themes of conversation and praise.

FROM WASHINGTON.

My predictions, you will perceive, are fully verified. The bill to repeal the judiciary law has passed the senate by a very lean majority. The stand, which the federal senators have made to preserve the constitution, has been manly and glorious. They have immortalized their names, while those of their opposers will be execrated, as the assassins of the constitution. The bill yesterday went down to the house, where a band of ministerial mutes stand ready to pass it without deliberation. These mutes are nightly drilled at the assembly-room, where all the measures of government are agreed upon in caucuses.

The measure originated in downright antifederalism, and the mouth-piece of the administration this day acknowledges, that one of the leading features of the repealing act was a "dread of what ever tends to the unnecessary aggrandizement of the powers of the general government." Let the friends of that government look to it.

The constitutionalists will exert all their energies to preserve the ark of our liberties; but the democratic phalanx is strong, and so well disciplined, that one can as well name the supporters of the bill before, as after the question is taken. Such are the men chosen to legislate for a nation! Tell it not in Gath!

Extract of a letter from a gentleman of the first respectability at Washington, to the editor of the United States Gazette, dated

"Monday, February 16, 1802.

"The public mind is highly agitated here.... The holders of city-lots seem much alarmed....not a lot has been sold for many days past; and the prospect of a dependent judiciary, and of judges, who are to be the creatures and puppets of the Virginia party, prevents the sale of landed property here. Many of the sober-minded men of Virginia are endeavouring to sell their lands and slaves, and contemplate removing to New-England. From the violation of the constitution, disunion must, they think, ensue, and when it shall, they mean to be on the safe side of the boundary.

"Mr. Jefferson and Mr. Giles say, no mischiefs are to be apprehended from having a DEPENDENT judiciary; but many of the ministerial party, especially the representatives of the small states, discover much uneasiness.

"All, however, wont do. The Virginians have denounced the judiciary, and it must be sacrificed. The equality of the states is to be preserved by the independency of the judiciary, and because the lords of the ancient dominion don't really believe the small states equal to Virginia, they have bound the judiciary, and will immolate it on the altar of ambition and resentment.

"The men, who govern, in these evil times, are full of vengeance. They were never the friends of our national constitution, and it will meet with no mercy in their hands.

"Doctor Leib, this morning, had a resolution on the table for the appointment of a committee, to inquire into the expediency of abolishing the department of the navy. As Virginia has no trade to protect, it is probable the naval department will be abolished."

Other letters from Washington state the same facts, and speak in high terms of the speech of Mr. Hemphill.

We are happy to insert the following compliment to the talents of Mr. Hemphill, as exhibited on a recent and momentous occasion.

"Mr. Hemphill very modestly prefaced his speech with saying that his object, rather than otherwise, would be to arrange the arguments already given by others; we have no wish to say this was not his object, but it appeared rather to be the introduction of new and unanswerable arguments. He spoke with much ease, yet with order, with clearness, with a full knowledge of his subject. The house was crowded with spectators; they were very attentive, and some of the demos seemed to look as if they were 'in all their wiles defeated and repulsed.'"

Every reader of miscellanies will remember the account which Dr. Johnson has given in his journey to the Western Isles of the accidental association, which induced him to describe his tour. We extract it as a piece of beautiful composition, and to allow an opportunity for the insertion of the praise bestowed on the doctor, by the critics.

"I sat down on a bank, such as a writer of romance might have delighted to feign. I had, indeed, no trees to whisper over my head, but a clear rivulet streamed at my feet. The day was calm, the air soft, and all was rudeness, silence, and solitude. Before me, and on either side, were high hills, which, by hindering the eye from ranging, forced the mind to find entertainment for itself. Whether I spent the hour well, I know not; for here I first conceived the thought of this narration."

The critical reviewers, remarking on this passage, with a spirit and expression worthy of the subject, elegantly said, "We congratulate the public on the event, which this quotation concludes, and are fully persuaded that the hour, in which the entertaining traveller conceived this narrative, will be considered, by every reader of taste, as a fortunate event in the annals of literature. To indulge ourselves in a poetical flight, we would invoke the winds of the Caledonian mountains to blow forever, with their softest breezes, on the bank where our author reclined, and request of Flora that it might be perpetually adorned with the gayest and most fragrant productions of the year."

The no less constant, than ridiculous failure of all our small, half-formed, tampering schemes to secure an energetic government, amidst political vice and weakness; and the awkward situation of every wise man, labouring to teach the mob to remain in their station, and let state affairs alone, while the very genius of our polity, and our habitual flattery of the populace serve to perpetuate the delusion that they are all equally worthy to dictate, nay to rule, remind one of certain descriptive lines in HUDIBRAS.

"So have I seen with armed heel,
A wight bestride a commonweal,
While still the more he kick'd and spur'd,
The less the sullen jude has stirr'd.

A gentleman meeting a very young and beautiful girl in the pump room at Bath, asked her why she drank the waters. "From mere wantonness, sir," replied she. "And pray Madam, said he gravely, have they cured you?"

A Lady, who is a strong advocate for the Rights of Women, being lately engaged in a dispute with a gentleman, asserted that an army of Women would be in every respect competent to take the field against an army of men, adding, Suppose I had the command of 10,000 women, each of whom had received military education; and you commanded an army of men equal in numbers, how would you get an advantage superior to what you might obtain over the same number of men?.... Madam, replied he, I would keep from a general engagement. I would make propositions of peace, and during the treaty, the male and female officers and soldiers must frequently meet to settle the conditions. The consequence would be, that at the end of eight or nine months, when all of you ought to be in the field, you would be in the straw.

A projector, amid the hurry of receiving Lauriston and dispatching Cornwallis, thinks that a new commercial treaty between England and France might be formed, in which mental qualifications should be, the subject of exchange. Thus British keenness and British perseverance might be articles as acceptable to the French as cutlery and hardware, and Britain might be benefited, could she import with Champagne and Burgundy the liveliness of French conversation, and the softness of French manners. Thus by a reciprocal interchange of good qualities, each side would get rid of bad ones. The English might grow gay; the French grave; the English might learn to talk, and the French to hold their tongues.

Nothing is more absurdly ungenerous than the invectives, levelled indiscriminately at the fair sex, without inquiring into the nature of their faults or making just allowance for the causes which lead or rather impel women astray. One of the sex has thus apologised for her sisters.

The youth of man is devoted to profitable instruction; but that of women to imitation into the paths of ruin. While boys are acquiring the general principles of knowledge, or learning some profession for the exercise, and advancement of their future lives, we are taught nothing but trifles, useless in themselves, and if not immediately criminal, yet leading indirectly to every crime, by turning the mind upon wrong pursuits, and weakening all its powers by an habit of idleness, impossible ever to be broken through; for idleness is the bane of women, let her attribute her failings to whatever other apparent cause she will.

The following will apply to the quacks, with which this city is infested—

When Dr. Lotion first began,
To practice on the frame of man,
He bore but humble sway;
Each morn his hospitable door
Was open gratis to the poor,
'Twas then, no cure no pay.

At length with cane and ponderous wig,
The Doctor struts a perfect prig,
In eminence secure,
The former system quite derang'd....
The poor forgot, the motto chang'd....
'Tis now no cure no cure.

A gentleman, informed by a bill on a window of a house, that apartments were to be let, knocked at the door, and, attended by a pretty female took a survey of the premises. Pray, my dear, said he smiling, are you to be let with these lodgings?—No, replied the Fille de Chambre with vivacity, but I am to be let alone.

A Hibernian senator speaking of suicide, coolly said the only way to stop it was to make it a capital offence, punishable with death.

A sea captain, not much accustomed with the customs of a theatre being presented with a ticket to the opera was asked, on his return to his lodgings how the performers acquitted themselves.—Upon my conscience, replied he, I have no very fine ear for music; but by the manner in which those that I suppose were judges behaved I should think the performers did very ill. One of them sung so d—d bad, that they made her sing all her songs over again.

A Welch gentleman has with much heraldic enquiry and deep research drawn up a genealogical account of his own family for upwards of twelve thousand years. In the middle of the manuscript there is a N.B. "About this time the world was created."

The editor of "The Balance" pleasantly says, that Hector Ironside, Esq. of Worcester, Massachusetts, has invented a machine, which he calls "The Ægis," and has obtained a patent from the attorney-general of the United States. This machine has been exceeded by no invention whatever. It is extremely simple in every respect, and yet it performs wonders. It is so contrived, that substances of all kinds, no matter how incongruous, may be thrown into it, all of which, in the "twinkling of an eye," will be converted into coarse fusion. This machine differs, in some respects, from all others. It requires great boys or full grown men to manage it.

During one of the jovial parties of the prince of Wales, in mid-winter, the company insensibly grew warm, the prince cried, it is as hot as in midsummer, and unbuttoning his vest, leaned back on his chair, and fell asleep. Colonel Thornton roared out never mind him, we are not all to sleep, because he dozes;....one swallow don't make a summer. Mr. Sheridan immediately took out his pencil, and wrote the following.

*'Tis monstrous cold the prince first cried,
Then touch'd his lips the rummer,
Till swallow after swallow made Him really think 'twas summer.*

The majority in congress affect to talk of watching public officers, and of the duty of the people to vigorously exercise the right of controul. This reminds one of the multiplied caution of the old woman, in the apologue. She puts a cat into the milk-house, to kill a mouse; she then sends her maid to look after the cat, lest the cat should eat up the cream!

The political taciturnity of the democrats in congress may, without any uncharitableness, be resolved into an utter inability to answer the arguments of the federalists. Like the pennyless tippler, at a tavern reckoning, when he comes to pay, the story goes, he puts his hand into his pocket, and keeps fumbling and shaking, and at last says he left his purse at home, when all the company knows that he has no money about him.

Mr. MACKENZIE, the author of the eagerly expected Travels through Canada, &c. is, we understand, brother to the celebrated Henry Mackenzie, Esq. the ingenious author of the Man of Feeling. Mr. Mackenzie has visited various parts of the United States, and is described by many, who have listened to his conversation, as a man of the most liberal and accomplished mind.

Lord Powiscount laid a wager in France, that he would ride a certain number of miles, in a certain short time. The French academicians set to work, and calculated that, from the resistance of the air, it was impossible. Lord Powiscount won his wager.

Some of our political Weathercocks should meditate upon the following remark of a grave writer. You try a man, when you give him an opportunity to change his side. If he be so weak as to change once, he will change again. Your country fellows have a way to try if a man be weak in the hams, by coming behind him, and giving him a blow unawares. If he bend once, he will bend again.

A formalist laying down indiscriminate rules for study, to a juvenile student, reminds one of the directions given by the master to the pupil in the last age.

He advises him never to sleep above six hours; to read two hours before day-light, to give the morning to theology, composition, and the ancients; to let the afternoon suffice for history, chronology, politics, news, travels, geography, and the common run of pamphlets; to amuse himself in a dull hour with books of entertainment; and to enter upon nothing but what he is determined to pursue and accomplish.

N. B. Dr. JOHNSON never regulated his reading by any of these rules.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

REFLECTIONS IN SOLITUDE.

THE blast blows bleakly thro' the mountain gap,
And whistles down the vale....The drifting snow
Beats in the face of the cold traveller,

As plodding on along th' unbeaten road,
Close muffled up, and breathing on his cold
And aching fingers, he anticipates,
In silent joy, the crackling faggot fire,
And tranquil pleasures of a country inn.
But when the blast blows bleaker, and more chill,
And all the scene looks desolate and drear,
His thoughts are joyless.....By his side he finds
No gay companion to beguile the time,
Nor friend to cheer the dull and heavy hours
Of a long winter's evening, and outlive
The dying embers on the inn's wide hearth;
His home, with all that tranquil calm delight,
Which home alone can give, then rising full
Before his fancy, saddens every thought.
Yet thoughts so keen as these lose half their pangs,
When from the tavern window, yet far off,
The bar-room candle sheds its steady light;
And when in meditation, calm and still,
Thrown backward on his chair, face upward
turn'd,

Crossing his feet upon the chimney front,
High as his head, he notes with half-shut eye
The blue smoke curling slowly from his pipe,
Then all his soul is calm; and storms that beat
Around the inn, by him unheeded howl.
The clear brook glides beneath its icy roof
Silent, save where the sloping broken earth
Impedes its tranquil stream, it murmurs down
A ruffled wave. Within the cottage yard
The farmer shovels off the drifted snow
From the barn door, to please the dairy-maid,
And thro' the gate drives in the patient cow.
High in the air, far off, I yet can mark,
Flapping his wings, the shy and slow-wing'd crow,
Bending his course towards the dark-brown wood.

As from my cottage door I turn mine eye,
Across the field towards the mountain-pines,
Or up the highway, all the country seems
A smooth extended robe of clearest white.
This scene, so dreary to the world's mad eye,
To me is pleasant....and tho' nature now
Appears to slumber, to the man, whose mind
Is utterly incapable to trace
Effect from cause, I cannot but reflect,
That as the roof from tempests shelters man,
So snow the grain from the chill winter wind.
Yet there is one, for whom my heart did bleed
Last night, as in my couch, I heard the blast
Howl round the house, and listened to the hail Patt'ring against the window of my cot.
She lives alone within the straw-roof'd hut,
Close by yon laurel-cover'd mountain's foot;
The narrow path that winds thro' yonder field,
And up the meadow leads you to her door.
She is so poor she cannot buy her food,
And ever when the morn is fine, she creeps
Along that path to beg a cup of milk,
At some kind charitable farmer's door.
Yet she is very old, and almost blind,
And crippled, and she scarce can hobble o'er
The stile....and ever as she reaches it,
She sits her down to gain a little strength,
And rests her wrinkled forehead on her crutch,
Bending her dim eye with an idle gaze
Upon the grass. She moves so slowly on,
And makes such feeble rustling in the grass,
That oft the rabbit, hopping thro' the hedge,
Crosses her path close by, nor pricks his ears
At sight of her. The farmers pass her by,
And only wonder she is yet alive,
She looks so old. Yet I can feel for her,
And when the flakes of snow fell fast last night,
I shiver'd as I thought how cold and chill
The day would be to her without her chips,
That every morn she gathers in the wood.
I pity one, who feels not for herself!
For I have talked with her about her youth,
Have heard her tell the sorrows she had known,

The disappointments she had met in life,
And she would say that she was old and feeble,
And had outliv'd her friends. Yet she would speak

As if she were to live yet many days,
And wish'd it too. And I have never seen
One transient frown upon her aged brow,
Nor heard her heave one sorrow-freighted sigh.
Oft on a summer's day, as I have lain
Upon the old oak bench beside her door,
And gaz'd intently on her palsied frame,
Bow-bent and clad in tatters, I have mused
In awful silence. I have pondered much
What gift the fatt'rer Hope could promise her,
Would be a compensation for the toil,
The pain, the trouble, and the cheerless hours,
Of this old woman's day. The poor old man,
Crippled and blind, and feeble as a babe,
More poor than Poverty, when from the womb
Of Idleness, she came upon the earth,
What expectation lifts his palsied hand,
To grasp, as 'twere, the grass on his grave-side,
That he might draw another idle breath!
This ever flies my fancy's wildest grasp....
But I can tell full well, for I have known,
What gilded visions cheer the dream of youth,
What balm is poured on his half-broken heart,
To prompt him onward thro' a desert wild....
Anticipation gilds the lover's smiles,
His morrow's dawn.....Hope leads the wand'rer on,
And Inclination, nurse of Hope, beguiles
The passing hours....embodies all their dreams,
And harsh repels the whisp'ring voice of Prodence,
That speaks of blessings scattered on his path,
And tells him to enjoy them as they pass....
He grasps an empty unsubstantial bubble,
Or if a real good, Possession steals
Its value....Disappointment turns his eye,
What place Reflection, like a true friend, shews
The joys he scorn'd, yet never makes him wiser.

WHILE flutt'ring beaux around you sigh,
And, simpering, swear their love is true;
Say of those eyes you robb'd the sky,
And from Aurora stole her hue;

And talk of snow, and flames, and darts,
Extatic bliss, and tort'ring pain,
And turtle doves, and bleeding hearts,
And charms that would make Venus vain;

I, Chloe, if I must express
My passion, to be understood,
Think you no goddess....nay, confess
I love you more as flesh and blood.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. X.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

TO that laziness which the body assumes, out of complaisance to the understanding, I shall ever pay a sincere, though it be a secret homage. I have always loved that gentleness of motion, which characterises the gentleman of refined feelings, and devout thought; I have seen nothing disgraceful in that mental abandonment of Thomson and Shenstone, which the woollen-draper of their day called indolence; but in their inactivity, as well as in your own, I discover a delicate provision of nature for an easily disturbed fancy, or a very metaphysical mind. Under these impressions, I approach you, Mr. Saunter, most respectfully; with your leave, I shall approach you frequently hereafter; my feelings make me as often the sufferer, as, by my character, I am made the subject of censure; and I revere the judgment of quiet men.

My present misfortune, sir, is a tailor, who puts me into long pantaloons and short vest, because I am too loyal to molest his dominion, and have never ordered a subtraction from the under garment, to be passed to the credit of the upper. My coat too has a strong air of the bon ton; and my boots are eminently entitled to a definition in the Columbian dictionary. Would you believe it, sir, that, because I am thus made up, the good people of the vicinage deny me even a medium of understanding, and insinuate, at times, very tauntingly, in my presence, that some people's wits are not as long as their tailor's bill? A reference upon a doubtful point of literature is never made to me, because persons of fashion are not presumed to meddle therewith. My morals are treated with unchristian contempt, because it may be, that the lateral scantiness of my coat opens a pretty extensive domain to the prince of the powers of the air. In fact, sir, Mr. Burke himself could have said no more. They imagine, that my dress is my god, the shop is my church, the counter is my altar, the pattern-book is my bible, and that I put no faith, but in my tailor.

Now, sir, as I am unwilling to wrest the shears and measure tape from their proprietors in ordinary, and yet am moved by this infatuation, let me argue with society, under the screen of your composing desk, that it is very possible for a man to dress fashionably, and yet think and do his duty with as much assiduity, as though his shoes were from the stall of Crispin, and his breeches from the wardrobe of William the conqueror.

In the course of my reading on this subject, I recollect to have met with few of the unregenerate, save Mr. Godwin, Madame Tallien, and some other admirers of the Gonoquais horde, who have stickled for absolute nudity. By reasonable folks, it has been deemed a paradisaical convenience, which answers no good purpose, among people tainted with original sin. I need not be informed, sir, that, by men of a highly devotional religion, these constraints have been thrown off, and that a sect of religionists, but a short time before the late French revolution, deeming themselves worthy of a pure, undisguised intercourse with heaven, expelled from their society both shears and lapboard. It is a case precisely in point for my position. The charity of these people was their cloak, and those, who have it not, must adopt a more sensible covering. I will grant then to my traducers, that a habit of some kind is expedient to antidote the unfortunate corruption of the human heart, at least to disguise its expressions. But, after I have conceded this, where is the canon of ethics, which confers superior value on a particular cut? Who is the moralist that has ever denounced long pantaloons or trunk hose as special instruments of Ahri-manus, the Persian devil? We have been told, it is true, in the annals of every nation, of perilous hours, which tried men's souls; but in no instance has the historian thought proper to communicate to us that, thereby, were tried their small-clothes, and a determinate value fixed on a specific costume: nay, I verily believe, that the only two articles of this description, which cross the annalist of America, are those of admiral Parker, and the legitimate sherry-vallies of general Lee, both of which, as to size and shape, are hopelessly and irrecoverably lost. If, therefore, good morals dwell not in the cape of a coat....if evil spirits are not addicted to short breeches or long, grey breeches or blue....my tailor, perhaps, has not cabbaged my piety, and I may pass to the defence of my understanding.

There are but two ways of connecting a man's understanding and his pantaloons;....he is a fool, and therefore he has bought them; or he has bought them, and therefore he is a fool. Now, the first branch of this duplicate proposition is irrelevant; I have nothing to do but with the abstract, independent, virtue or worthlessness of the pantaloons; and, if the man was a fool before he bought them, the probability is, that they did not make him a fool. The pantaloons are the effect, and the man is the cause; and it is contrary to the usage of the best logicians, to attribute any prior defects in the cause, to the subsequent operation of the effect. The man then has bought them, and therefore he is a fool. It were reasoning too curiously to reason thus. If he became a fool since he bought them, there was a time between the buying and the folly, in which the fatuity was not produced; and, therefore, it was probable, that the folly was not caused by the pantaloons, or it would have appeared sooner. If he became a fool before he bought them, the pantaloons, as I have said before, have nothing to do with his case; and if he became a fool eo instanti that he bought them, then it was the buying, and not the folly, which disturbed his intellect, because he is granted to be a fool by the purchase, though his tailor defraud him of the article, or he never afterwards wear it, and, of course, there shall be no room for the pantaloons to operate. If you doubt this reasoning, sir, I refer myself to the authority of Mr. Godwin's Political Justice, passim.

But after all, Mr. Saunter, there is sense somewhere in the world; and, if this fashionable habit annihilates it, I think we shall prove, without much difficulty, that it exists nowhere. I hate, sir, to advance so egregious a truth, as that fashion is altogether relative. I am not more fashionable in my last new apparatus, than my aunt Deborah, in her stomacher of Lewis XIV, and queen Anne's stays. The difference is simply this;....in a drawing-room of the present century, I am rather more au fait than she, but carry us back a hundred years, and she is the greatest belle alive. The very man, who abuses my cape, is much more in the ton for 1775 than I am; and, if there be folly in the case, his, perhaps, is the least pardonable, as there has been more time for the growth of his discretion.

Does this dress consume a moment that should be given to the "bettering of the mind?" Do I waste as much time in saying to my taylor, Bring me up to the present day, as sir Special does to keep in black letter?" If dress induces an unprofitable expenditure of time, probably it has this effect in the shop of the taylor, or in the drawing-room; and that fashionable dress has not this effect necessarily, in either place, is a proposition scarcely to be elucidated by argument. I will adopt the notion that fashion is definite; then there can be but one garment of a kind that is fashionable, and all other garments, of that order, to an indefinite number, are unfashionable. I say to my tradesman, make me a fashionable coat; the description is perfect, and I am at liberty. I order him to produce me an unfashionable coat: does he understand me, sir? Is the cape to be cloth or shagreen? Is it to be a trapezium, or a rhombus, or an octagon? The taylor is at fault; I must bring him to the scent, by imparting that complex idea, which I intend to represent by the expression; and, if my metaphysics are dull, or my pupil is difficult of conception, it is ten to one that the coat be an abortion! My addiction to modern dress, then, wastes none of my time over the goose. But this coat must walk to the drawing-room; and why? Because it is the only kind of coat there used. Then, sir, there has never been a pistol from the shop of the gunsmith, that has not shot its man, and that too for no other reason than that pistols are commonly used in duelling. Grant, however, that such be its inevitable effect. I know, sir, that Science holds not her vigils in the drawing-room, nor can Avarice there settle the rate of his usury. I know that, within the fashionable circles, cards are more frequently unfolded than Polybius, and the mysteries of whist more devoutly revered than the cube root. But "dulce est dissipere in loco;" it is well to animate the mass of dry knowledge, that grows at midnight, with a little of that oil of joy, which gladdens and lubricates the evening association. It is well to supply the deficiencies of our book-wise heads, by some experience in the philosophy of life; to hu-manize the heart in intervals of relaxation from the culture of the mind; to acquire sagacity, as well as wisdom; and to act with courtesy, as well as to reason with force. It is not true, Mr. Saunter, that the elegance of polished life is either baneful or frivolous; the vice is in the excess, not in the moderate indulgence; and, if we recollect that, from long quiescence, a passion frequently dies, and always loses its tone; that, from controuling our temper, for the moment, which we call politeness, the transition is not difficult to the habit of permanent controul, which we call philosophy; that, by frequently expressing benevolence, we at last come to feel, and then to prove it, the drawing-room, where this quiescence, this controul, and this expression are necessary, may be allowed the high merit of schooling the human heart. If my fashionable coat carries me thither, per force, I would recommend it as a very good cure to my simple, officious, and unfashionable coarsers.

I am, dear sir,

With much fidelity,

Your friend,

SPENCER.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LORD CHESTERFIELD, in describing to his son the fate of a new drama, says: "All the women cried, and all the men were moved." I will not pretend to doubt, that theatrical representations have had such an effect, but I certainly should doubt part of it, were I to found my opinion on the conduct and innocability of the female portion of a Philadelphia audience.

Without assuming to myself any extraordinary share of sensibility, I trust that I shall be excused for censuring that stoical apathy, with which I have seen the most interesting pictures of distress gazed upon by my fair countrywomen. Heaven alone knows, whence they could have drawn the abominable faculty of steeling their hearts against feelings, which dignify men, and, without which, female beauty loses half its charms.

Who, that frequents the theatre, has not often seen men, inured to danger and distress, give themselves up to the scenic delusion, and big tears course speedily down their sun-burnt cheeks; whilst females, whose countenance bespoke gentleness and soft compassion, sat staring at the exhibition, with eyes unmoistened with a tear, or engaged with the nonsensical tittle-tattle of a coxcomb, whose only claim to notice is the impertinent arrogance with which he strives to prevent others from hearing what he cannot understand? Who has not heard the loud laugh, bespeaking vacancy of mind, break the silence with which the exquisite tones of distress of a justly favourite actress had enthralled the generality of the audience, and seen those features, which, with a tear, would be embellished beyond the power of art, moulded into a kind of stupid admiration of the undescribable follies of a fop?

It has been said, that women are greater adepts in the art of dissimulation than men. Their indifference may, of course, be affected; they may feel the sorrows of a Desdemona, or a Belvidera, or a Bertha, forcibly feel them at the heart, and yet refuse to testify it, by the tribute of a tear. This may be the case, but it is almost incredible. Do they refuse attention, because the sorrows represented may overpower them? It would then be best to call in the aid of affectation, when some impression was visible: then it would be a virtue—now it is a disgrace.

If the ladies have any regard for the opinion of men of sense, they will despise this affectation. Which, I assure them, no men approve, but fools and coxcombs. The eye of beauty shines with tenfold radiance through the pearly tear; it adds to it an irresistible lustre; and, let men differ as they will about the colour of the eye, they all agree, that the dew of compassion becomes it best, whatever its colour be; and there is nothing that they prize more highly, than a heart which can feel, and not fear to shew it.

DRYDEN.

TURNING over, the other day, some manuscripts belonging to the Griffin family, I accidentally cast my eyes on a parchment roll, carefully sealed, and inscribed "The Pedigree." Not having before considered that I was entitled to any ancestry, I began to feel an increased consequence, as I opened this sacred testimony of my being a son of Adam; and was elated or depressed, according to the titles or occupations of my grandfathers, from time immemorial.

I will not, courteous reader, detain thee with the honourable mention made of my family, by bards of old; how, for instance, one of them being inspector of the gardens to a foreign potentate, was overdosed by one Hercules, who, in the mean while, robbed an orchard of certain golden-pippins: ...how, afterwards, upon my ancestor's waking, he claimed them by right of discovery, and, in farther proof of such right, most valiantly did beat his brains about his ears. How, another being appointed guardian of a woollen manufactory, was lulled to sleep by a certain adventurer, from across the seas, who, by that means, stole his golden fleece (no impeachment on the sagacity or vigilance of my ancestor), the same spark having previously imposed on a wild and fiery bull, who kept a mighty coil, and, by putting a yoke on his neck, subjected him to his own convenience. These, reader, I say, I will not detain thee with; but, as I propose to make my after reflections on this parchment the subject of this paper, shall proceed to them without farther preamble.

Pride, says the old Castilian, is that principle, which, from a consciousness of inborn superiority, sets a man above the weaknesses of human nature; in prosperity enables him to preserve that dignity, which his situation demands; and prevents him, in adversity, from consenting to any thing, which might be derogatory to the principles of a man of honour. These, probably, or nearly these, are the ideas, not of a patriotic, but provincial bigot; but this is far from being a true definition of pride: and not only theoretical supposition, but practical observation, will daily enable us, in some measure, to controvert this reasoning. In order to reduce our inquiry as near the truth as possible, let us, by placing the arguments of opposite prejudice in equal balances, suppose, as is generally the case, that a fair and candid decision will lay in the midway between them.

Pride, says the more polished, and of consequence less prejudiced, man of the world, who has not had the honour to have been born on the other side of the Pyrenees, is a false principle of honour, seeking its gratification in the abject submission of others, and refining to extravagant punctilio and constrained resentment, that, which should only proceed from the genuine and lively emotions of the soul. It is a deformity of the mind, which subjects its possessor not only to the ridicule of all around him, but to infinite mortification on the failure of that respect, which he considers as due to his superior merit; a mortification, which, as few others view him in the same light, he must be frequently subjected to.

Though these principles are, in all respects, diametrically opposite, each of them have a specious appearance of truth. By tempering, therefore, each with the other, we are most likely to prove, whether pride is a principle to be cherished in the human heart or no. That pride, for instance, which, when moderately indulged, fires a man with a just and noble resentment for wrongs received, when carried farther degenerates into punctilio. That, which prevents a man from condescending to any thing unworthy himself, is a laudable principle; but, when any thing a degree below his expectations or wishes is interpreted into an unworthy occupation, it becomes a folly. As to the mortifications a man draws on himself, by an intemperate indulgence of this failing, it must be allowed, that the poison is, in that respect, its own antidote; and a mind so impregnated, is at least equal to supporting the ridicule which is levelled against it. Pride, in short, is of two kinds, defensive and offensive. While only defensive, it is far from being offensive, and serves as a sword in the scabbard, which, though harmless at the moment, protects the wearer from insult; when offensive, it is an attack on the rest of mankind, which calls for every one's exertions to repel it.

But I seem to be straying from my motto, which, as I am more particularly on the subject of family pride, calls on me to prove the descent of all our noble houses from shepherds, or what, as the poet sings, "I am ashamed to say." As, in a former paper, I invited my readers to a melancholy prospect in the terra incognita of probabilities, so will I now present them with a full as unflattering a retrospect in the terra firma of history.

Mankind are obliged to the so much talked of golden age, in no other respect than for the quantity of harmonious ditties it has produced, and the pretty allusions concerning hanging woods, purling streams, the social intercourse of man and sheep, the great convenience which swains of those days used to experience, in their extraordinary powers of abstinence, &c. &c. which it has from time immemorial, and still continues to furnish to Arcadian garratteers. So far indeed was any age from being pre-existent to the iron, that the first crime committed by man was a violation of the express law of God; the second of that of God and nature. From that time forward, particular facts, which prove, that antediluvian is no word to be applied to any thing over religious, are too numerous to dwell on. Suffice it to say, that the history of our right worshipful grandsires, both before and since the flood, does not at all tend to strengthen the opinion of the poet.

Ætas parentum pejor avis tulit
Nos nequiores, mox daturos
Progeniem vitiosiore

More vicious than their father's age
Our sires begot the present race
Of actions impious, bold and base;
And yet with crimes to us unknown,
Our sons shall make the coming age their own.

FRANCIS.

The conquest, wealth, luxury, and from thence the decline of commonwealths, have, in all ages, been the theme as well of the moralist as the historian; these therefore let us pass by, and by looking back so far only as to the first population of this island, consider whether the motto is not as applicable to the family pride of a true born Briton, as that of a Roman citizen.

Notwithstanding the comfortable exertions of those ingenious gentlemen, who wish to derive us from the illustrious race of Troy, our vicinity to the continent pleads hard for our being neither more nor less than the descendants of a few shipwrecked fishermen; or what is worse, some light footed heroes, who preferred the chance of escaping by sea, to the certainty of hanging on shore. Nor has this stock been much mended by the exotic shoots, which have from time to time been engrafted on it: such as the Romans, our first invaders, from whom, I believe, many genealogists of the present day pretend to derive their origin; though it scarce seems probable, that a people, who had more pride of birth than any other, would have consented to forego their country and friends, in order to settle among a race of barbarians; unless, perhaps, some few, who were not in the censor's list, and therefore, in fact, no Romans, or some chance deserters, who took refuge among the natives to avoid military discipline. The Danes, a wretched band of adventurers, whose ferocity was their only distinguishing characteristic; whose only motive for forsaking their own country was poverty, and whose only view in invading Britain was plunder. The Saxons, in themselves a brave and ancient nation, but happily at that time delivered of their own ruffians, in the persons of our conquerors. Last of all the Normans, under the command of a bastard, put a finishing blow to the contentions of foreign powers, for the possession of this unhappy island; and completed a mixture of braves, differing in their manners and interests, each, as not being attached to one head by any principles of loyalty and affection, naturally endeavouring to advance his own partizans; and smothering that jealousy from constraint, which only waited for an opportunity to burst into a flame.

From this engaging portrait of our forefathers, a Chinese philosopher would be led to suppose, that the antiquity of a British family was its greatest stain. But so far is this from being the case, that even in this miniature picture of mankind, family pride is no inconsiderable feature; and some there are, who, though their only merit lies in a crowded vault, from that single distinction consider themselves as infinitely superior to those men of yesterday, whose meritorious exertions evince them to be rather ambitious of founding, than boasting a noble family. But from a probable supposition, that this extravagant principle can only have taken root in the minds of those, from whom it is impossible to eradicate it, let us proceed to that family pride, which has at first a more specious appearance, and if engrafted on notions naturally virtuous, is more likely to produce good effects; that, I mean, which boasts not so much the antiquity as eminence of its family. Even this, however, though to a noble mind it is an additional incentive to great and glorious actions, if it happens to be cherished by a wicked, or even a passive disposition, will be found to be equally ridiculous with the other.

If the good qualities of mankind were like those of cattle, hereditary, a virtuous ancestry would be the most desirable possession a man could receive from inheritance; but if experience teaches us that they so seldom are, if from the adulation, with which men of family and fortune are generally from their infancy surrounded, it is very improbable that they should be oftener virtuous, what does a man derive from a noble family; unless that by the profusion of light in the back-ground, the shade in front is more effectually exposed. To those few therefore, to those chosen few, who consider that a noble family reflects either honour or disgrace, only according to the use made of it by themselves; who reflect, that it is nothing more than a splendid burden, an additional tax on them, to add one more to the distinguished list, to them may a degree of family pride be considered as an advantage. And among those, our little world may boast of having ushered no inconsiderable share into the larger theatre of life; who have since distinguished themselves as good and great men. Nor in any other respect does a public education so much evince its superiority, as in the equitable treatment our citizens receive from each other, and which, says Dr. Moore, "often serves as an antidote against the childish, sophistical notions, with which weak or designing men endeavour to inspire them in after life."

LEVITY.

FROM THE WASHINGTON FEDERALIST.

THE 4th of March being the anniversary of Mr. Jefferson's accession to the government, a number of patriots agreed to have a dinner at Stelle's dancing-room, New-Jersey Avenue.

To this we were specially induced, by a dinner the feds had at Stelle's hotel, on the 22d of February, the birth-day of Washington.

We imitated them, or tried to, in every thing, but in one point we got the better of them; they had no chaplain, and we procured parson Austin to officiate. This sounds well in the publication, but a deal of trouble he gave us; being a crazy man, nothing would pacify him, unless he might make a set of toasts.

Giles, Randolph, and a few of us keen fellows made some too, but the parson flounced and bounced at such a rate, about his, that ours were rejected, and his delirious vapid things received, and be curst to 'em.

We met a few evenings after, to settle our reckoning (as Stelle would not provide us a dinner, but upon conditions we would club for beau Dawson, and a number of our loungers, who always forget to pay for themselves, and likewise the arrears of grog at former caucuses), so we proposed to have our toasts printed, in room of the parson's; and citizen Davis of Kentucky, who reads remarkably well, read them off, with about one hundred and fifty additional 'ands,' but all would not do, the eastern democrats said, they were too bold, 'twould not do to come out so yet. And, by a vote of one majority, the parson's toasts were carried, though I thought then, that Hana of Pennsylvania, and old Smith of Massachusetts did not understand the question, it being a little latish in the evening.

Now you know we republicans like publicity, so we intend our toasts shall be published, and let the sovereign people judge of them, and see if they are too bold; and, as Smith printed the parson's things, we send ours to you.

Yours, &c.

REVIEW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LETTERS CONCERNING THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

(CONCLUDED.)

"YOU know what importance ought to be attached to these denominations of political parties; and, like me, you are convinced, that they characterise neither their principles nor their conduct. The Americans are more attached to persons than to principles. They have always their saint or god of the day, as General Lee was wont to say; and each party has (if I may thus express myself) its central individual. The federalists, or aristocrats, esteem Mr. Jay, who negotiated the treaty with England, as their chief; and Mr. Jefferson, known by a work against Buffon, is at the head of the democrats. The most active member of the aristocratic party is, indisputably, Mr. Hamilton, late minister of finance. He resigned this office from motives of policy, to give greater weight to his influence, which is still in vigour. The members of government are all aristocrats, except Washington alone, who has certainly in view nothing but his country's good, without attaching himself to either party; but who also is the only man of this description in America."

It is more particularly in his twelfth letter, that Mr. Bulow eulogises general Washington. He consecrates it entirely to the American hero, and describes him in a single line, by saying, that no other passion than the public good possesses his bosom.

Mr. Bulow observes, that all the rich, that is to say all the owners of property, are opposed to French democracy, which is advocated by all such as have nothing to lose. In the subsequent letters, he gives a description, as just as it is deplorable, of the corruption which reigns in the United States. He speaks of the luxury of that country, in the same style as the greater part of recent travellers have spoken of it; "but," says he, "it is not the luxury of the fine arts." All that he says on this subject, the description of manners, of customs, in a word, of society in general, such as he witnessed at Philadelphia, are delightful consolations to us Europeans, who, judging from other relations, have sometimes regretted, that we could not go and take up our abode in the country of the Washingtons and the Franklins.

Let us speak more properly. The letters of Mr. Bulow do not afford consolation; on the contrary, they are calculated deeply to afflict every friend of humanity. We said before, that he treated the Americans with great severity; but, on a second perusal of his last letters, we find this epithet too lenient, and we are disposed to think, that Mr. Bulow has not always been equitable. He reproaches, not only the government with flagrant vices, and ascribes great misconduct to those who administer it, but he imputes manners to the governed, sometimes base, at other times atrocious. His fourteenth letter, in particular, is full of passages, of whose authenticity we would wish to doubt; at the simple perusal of which, every honest mind revolts, and is inspired with a kind of horror for the country, of which Mr. Bulow has drawn the picture.

What nation is there, it is true, among whom similar traits of character are not, unhappily, to be found, in making a compilation of their newspapers, and collecting all the traditions which keep alive the remembrance of every species of extravagance and crime? But how cruel, how painful the task! And how could Mr. Bulow find the heart to undertake it, in regard to America? It is hard to suppose, that his letters, when compiled in a volume, will not make a very powerful impression; and it is still more difficult for us to believe, that the Americans will suffer them to go unanswered.

The ingenious and sensible author of the above review, it will be observed, concludes his remarks upon this itinerant epistler, by anticipating a reply from some spirited American, little imagining, it is presumed, that not a single copy of the work has hitherto fallen into American hands; or if, by chance, it should have reached the American shore, that the circumstance of its being written in a foreign language, should effectually lock up its contents from the public eye.

To pass sentence upon the merit or demerit of these letters, from a perusal of only a few detached sentences, which have been selected, for the sake of comment, by the editor of a literary European journal, might be doing injustice to the author. Yet, when we find the reviewer of Mr. Bulow's letters asserting, on his own judgment, that the writer has indulged himself in great severity towards the Americans, there is nothing short of christian meekness that would enjoin delicacy or forbearance towards him, on our part.

Some apology may be made for the saturnine complexion of mind, which engendered the strictures upon men, manners, and things, contained in these letters, from a reference to the particular period chosen by this traveller, for a visit to the United States. It was during the years 1795-6, which, of all other epochs in the annals of our country, was the most unfavourable to its reputation. Let us state the case fairly and impartially, and we shall thereby vindicate our national character from unmerited reproach, at the same time, that all proper weight will be given to just crimination. A season of domestic turbulence exhibits, to the eye of a disinterested spectator, all the darkest shades of the human character; but it would be both disingenuous and deceptive, to paint an entire picture of society, from viewing it in a single light. As well might an occasional jangle, between husband and wife, be taken as a faithful portrait of wedded life.

Mr. Bulow, a German gentleman, and a scholar, having been enamoured of the fairy tales which have been written, by some travellers, respecting the United States of America, and having studied our geography by the map, finally persuades himself to pay us a visit, and form his opinion of the country, from the testimony of his own senses. He takes passage from Hamburg for Philadelphia, and arrives here in the Autumn of 1795. He remains, we know not exactly how long, but quite long enough, by his own account, to become disgusted with his enterprise; to acquaint his friends in Europe that he shall speedily return to them; and be better satisfied with his own country, from contrasting it with America; and, before any body here knows, that we have been honoured with a visit from such a personage, on such an errand, Mr. Bulow is welcomed home again to his native land.

Whether this gentleman extended his travels beyond the limits of the state of Pennsylvania, is not to be inferred from any passage, selected by the reviewer of his letters, but as Pennsylvania, New-York, or Virginia, are sometimes used generically for the United States by foreigners, we will not undertake to affirm that Mr. Bulow, did not visit some other states in the union.

Three topics have attracted the particular animadversion of this traveller; viz. 1st. The state of political party. 2d. The rage for speculation in wild lands, which was then in its highest paroxysm, all over the continent; and thirdly, The luxury of living, and the extravagance of expense, which prevailed among all ranks and classes in the community, more especially among the merchants.

It must be acknowledged that these, by turns, have been our vulnerable points, and the stranger, who knew little of our history, might be pardoned for drawing inferences from the above causes, unfavourable to our national and individual characters. These extravagances must be ascribed to their true cause; viz. the neutrality of our country, while all Europe was enveloped in a blaze of war, and when the flood-gates and sluices of wealth were scarce wide enough to admit the streams that continually flowed into the United States. This inundation it was, which turned the brains of so many among us, and overwhelmed in its progress some of our most substantial capitalists. It is of the essence of gold possessed, to increase desire for its own likeness, and our monied people waded far beyond their depth in the channel of speculation, for the sake of magnifying their heaps already in store. To many the experiment was fatal. To depict a state of tumult, confusion and turbulence, in the political history of our country, we should of all others select the period when the treaty negotiated by Mr. Jay was the theme of every tongue. Unfortunately Mr. Bulow was here at that time, and he left the country some time before the violence of party animosity had subsided, on that account. No wonder we were degraded in his esteem, if he assumed the rashness and intemperance of that moment, as the standard of his general opinion.

But Mr. Bulow was, from his own confession, a disappointed man, and consequently looked at all objects with a jaundiced eye. With whom did he associate here? To whom was he addressed, and from what sources did he collect his information, with respect to public men and public measures? The conjecture might not differ very widely from truth, should we venture to say that he got his opinions and his facts from foreigners like himself, or from natives tainted with foreign partialities. There can be no scruple in affirming that both are incorrect.

The prostration of morals, both public and private, on which he dwells with great acrimony; the degeneracy of manners and the corruption of heart, which he so liberally ascribes to the people of the United States, would be sufficient, if true, to make an American blush for his country; and while we own, with shame, that some portion of the enormities imputed to us, are too often found in the catalogue of our crimes, we repel, with scorn and indignation, the general application of such illiberal remarks.

Our unexampled prosperity as a nation, during the last ten years, the rapid increase of wealth and population, and the successful course of a commerce that knows no limits, may have made us giddy for a season; but we would fain hope and believe, that it has not made us vicious beyond the ordinary lot of nations, in an infant age. The fervour of youth will abate, and to it, we trust, will succeed the sedateness of maturer years.

Some may be ready to ask, for what purpose has the Editor of the Port Folio hunted up these letters, and rescued them from oblivion? To such he may answer, that as a literary article, connected with the history and character of the United States, it is peculiarly entitled to notice, and the object of inserting it in an American journal, that it may be seen and known in what estimation our country is held abroad, and through what impure channels the streams of information relative to it, are occasionally destined to flow.

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

No. XIV.

IN the course of the debate in the senate, much verbal criticism has been indulged; many important inferences have been attempted to be drawn from distinctions between the words shall and may. This species of discussion will not be imitated, because it is seldom very instructive or satisfactory. These terms, in particular cases, are frequently synonymous, and are imperative or permissive, directing or enabling, according to the relations, in which they stand to other words. It is, however, certain, that the arguments even from this source, greatly preponderate against the right of congress to abolish the judges.

But there has been one argument, rather of a verbal nature, upon which some stress has been laid, which shall be analyzed; principally to furnish a specimen of the wretched expedients to which the supporters of the repeal are driven. It is this, "The tenure of an office is not synonymous with its existence. Though congress may not annul the tenure of a judicial office, while the office itself continues, yet it does not follow that they may not destroy its existence."

The constituent parts of an office are its authorities, duties, and duration. These may be denominated the elements, of which it is composed. Together they form its essence or *existence. It is impossible to separate, even in idea, the duration from the existence: The office must cease to exist, when it ceases to have duration. Let it be observed, that the word tenure is not used in the constitution, and that in the debate it has been substituted for duration. The words "The judges shall hold their offices during good behaviour," are equivalent to these other words; The offices of the judges shall endure or last so long as they behave well.

The conclusions from these principles are, that existence is a whole, which includes tenure or duration as a part; that it is impossible to annul the existence of an office, without destroying its tenure; and, consequently, that a prohibition to destroy the tenure is virtually and substantially a prohibition to abolish the office. How contemptible, then, the sophism that congress may not destroy the tenure, but may annihilate the office!

It has now been seen, that this power of annihilation is not reconcileable with the language of the constitutional instrument, and that no rule of constitutional law, which has been relied upon, will afford it support. Can it be better defended by any principle of constitutional policy?

To establish the affirmative of this question, it has been argued, that if the judges hold their offices by a title absolutely independent of the legislative will, the judicial department becomes a colossal and overbearing power, capable of degenerating into a permanent tyranny; at liberty, if audacious and corrupt enough, to render the authority of the legislature nugatory, by expounding away the laws, and to assume a despotic controul over the rights of person and property.

To this argument, which supposes the case of a palpable abuse of power, a plain and conclusive answer is, that the constitution has provided a complete safeguard in the authority of the house of representatives to impeach, of the senate to condemn. The judges are in this way amenable to the public justice for misconduct; and, upon conviction, removeable from office. In the hands of the legislature itself is placed the weapon, by which they may be put down, and the other branches of the government protected. The pretended danger, therefore, is evidently imaginary.....the security perfect!

Reverse the medal. Concede to the legislature a legal discretion to abolish the judges; where is the defence? where the security for the judicial department? There is absolutely none. This most valuable member of the government, when rightly constituted, the surest guardian of person and property, of which stability is a prime characteristic; losing at once its most essential attributes, and doomed to fluctuate with the variable tide of faction, degenerates into a disgusting mirror of all the various, malignant, and turbulent humours of party-spirit.

Let us not be deceived. The real danger is on the side of that foul and fatal doctrine, which emboldens its votaries, with daring front and unhalloved step, to enter the holy temple of justice, and pluck from their seats the venerable personages, who, under the solemn sanction of the constitution, are commissioned to officiate there; to guard that sacred compact with jealous vigilance; to dispense the laws with a steady and impartial hand; unmoved by the storms of faction, unawed by its powers, unseduced by its favours; shielding right and innocence from every attack; resisting and repressing violence from every quarter. 'Tis from the triumph of that execrable doctrine that we may have to date the downfall of our government; and with it, of the whole fabric of republican liberty. Who will have the folly to deny that the definition of despotism is the concentration of all the powers of government in one person or in one body? Who is so blind as not to see that the right of the legislature to abolish the judges at pleasure, destroys the independence of the judicial department, and swallows it up in the impetuous vortex of legislative influence? Who is so weak as to hope that the executive, deprived of so powerful an auxiliary, will long survive? What dispassionate man can withstand the conviction, that the boundaries between the departments will be thenceforth nominal; that there will be no longer more than one active and efficient department?

It is a fundamental maxim of free government, that the three great departments of power, legislative, executive, and judiciary, shall be essentially distinct and independent the one of the other. This principle, very influential in most of our state constitutions, has been particularly attended to in the constitution of the United States; which, in order to give effect to it, has adopted a precaution peculiar to itself, in the provisions that forbid the legislature to vary in any way the compensation of the president, to diminish that of a judge.

It is a principle equally sound, that though in a government like that of Great Britain, having an hereditary chief with vast prerogatives, the danger to liberty, by the predominance of one department over the other, is on the side of the executive; yet in popular forms of government, this danger is chiefly to be apprehended from the legislative branch.

The power of legislation is, in its own nature, the most comprehensive and potent of the three great subdivisions of sovereignty. It is the will of the government; it prescribes universally the rule of action, and the sanctions which are to enforce it. It creates and regulates the public force, and it commands the public purse. If deposited in an elective representative of the people, it has, in most cases, the body of the nation for its auxiliary, and generally acts with all the momentum of popular favour. In every such government, it is consequently an organ of immense strength. But when there is an hereditary chief magistrate, clothed with dazzling prerogatives and a great patronage, there is a powerful counterpoise; which, in most cases, is sufficient to preserve the equilibrium of the government; in some cases to incline the scale too much to its own side.

In governments wholly popular or representative, there is no adequate counterpoise. Confidence in the most numerous, or legislative department, and jealousy of the executive chief, form the genius of every such government. That jealousy, operating in the constitution of the executive, causes this organ to be intrinsically feeble; and withholding in the course of administration necessary means of force and influence, is, for the most part, vigilant to continue it in a state of impotence. The result is, that the legislative body, in this species of government, possesses additional resources of power and weight: while the executive is rendered much too weak for competition; almost too weak for self-defence.

A third principle, not less well founded than the other two, is that the judiciary department is naturally the weakest of the three. The sources of strength to the legislative branches have been briefly delineated. The executive, by means of its several active powers; of the dispensation of honours and emoluments, and of the direction of the public force, is evidently the second in strength. The judiciary, on the other hand, can ordain nothing. It commands neither the press nor the sword. It has scarcely any patronage. Its functions are not active but deliberative. Its main province is to declare the meaning of the laws; and in extraordinary cases it must even look up to the executive aid for the execution of its decisions. Its chief strength is in the veneration, which it is able to inspire, by the wisdom and rectitude of its judgments.

This character of the judiciary clearly indicates that it is not only the weakest of the three departments of power, but also, as it regards the security and preservation of civil liberty, by far the safest. In a conflict with the other departments, it will be happy if it can defend itself....to annoy them is beyond its power. In vain would it singly attempt enterprises against the rights of the citizen. The other departments could quickly arrest its arm, and punish its temerity. It can only then become an effectual instrument of oppression, when it is combined with one of the more active and powerful organs; and against a combination of this sort, the true and best guard is a complete independence on each and both of them. Its dependence on either will imply and involve a subserviency to the views of the department, on which it shall depend. Its independence of both will render it a powerful check upon the others, and a precious shield to the rights of person and property. Safety, liberty, are, therefore, inseparably connected with the real and substantial independence of the courts and judges.

It is plainly to be inferred from the instrument itself, that these were governing principles in the formation of our constitution: that they were in fact so, will hereafter be proved by the cotemporary exposition of persons, who must be supposed to have understood the views, with which it was framed, having been themselves members of the body that framed it. Those principles suggest the highest motives of constitutional policy against that construction, which places the existence of the judges at the mercy of the legislature. They instruct us, that to prevent a concentration of powers, the essence of despotism, it is essential that the departments, among which they shall be distributed, should be effectually independent of each other; and that it being impossible to reconcile this independence with a right in any one or two of them to annihilate, at discretion, the organs of the other, it is contrary to all just reasoning to imply or infer such a right. So far from its being correct, that an express interdiction is requisite to deprive the legislature of the power to abolish the judges, that the very reverse is the true position. It would require a most express provision, susceptible of no other interpretation, to confer on that branch of the government an authority so dangerous to the others, in opposition to the strong presumptions, which arise from the care taken in the constitution, in conformity with the fundamental maxims of free government, to establish and preserve the reciprocal and complete independence of the respective branches, first by a separate organization of the departments, next by a precise definition of the powers of each, lastly by precautions to secure to each a permanent support.

No. XV.

IT is generally understood, that the essays, under the title of the Federalist, which were published at New-York, while the plan of our federal constitution was under the consideration of the people, were principally written by two persons*, who had been members of the convention which devised that plan, and whose names are subscribed to the instrument containing it. In these essays†, the principles advanced in the last number of this examination are particularly stated, and strongly relied upon, in defence of the proposed constitution; from which it is a natural inference, that they had influenced the views with which the plan was digested. The full force of this observation will be best perceived, by a reference to the work itself; but it will appear clearly enough from the following detached passages:

"One of the principal objections inculcated by the more respectable adversaries to the constitution is, its supposed violation of the political maxim, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments ought to be separate and distinct." "No political truth is certainly of greater intrinsic value, or is stamped with the authority of more enlightened patrons of liberty, than that on which the objection is founded. The accumulation of all power, legislative, executive, and judiciary, in the same hands, whether of one, a few, or many; whether hereditary, self appointed, or elective, may be justly pronounced the very definition of tyranny." "Neither of the three departments ought to possess, directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over the others, in the administration of their respective powers." But the most difficult task is to provide some practical security for each, against the invasion of the others." "Experience assures us, that the efficacy of parchment barriers has been greatly overrated, and that some more adequate defence is indispensably necessary for the more feeble, against the more powerful members of the government. The legislative department is every where extending the sphere of its activity, and drawing all power into its impetuous vortex." "In a representative republic, where the executive magistracy is carefully limited, both in the extent and the duration of its power, and where the legislative power is exercised by an assembly, which is inspired by a supposed influence over the people, with an intrepid confidence in its own strength, which is sufficiently numerous to feel all the passions which actuate a multitude, yet not so numerous as to be incapable of pursuing the objects of its passions, by means which reason prescribes, it is against the enterprising ambition of this department, that the people ought to indulge all their jealousy, and exhaust all their precautions." Again, "The tendency of republican governments is to an aggrandizement of the legislative, at the expense of the other departments."

These passages recognize, as a fundamental maxim of free government, that the three governments of power, ought to be separate and distinct; consequently that neither of them ought to be able to exercise, either directly or indirectly, an overruling influence over any other. They also recognize as a truth, indicated by the nature of the system, and verified by experience, that, in a representative republic, the legislative department is the "Aaron's rod" most likely to swallow up the rest, and therefore to be guarded against, with particular care and caution. And they inculcate, that parchment barriers (or the formal provisions of a constitution, designating the respective boundaries of authority) having been found ineffectual for protecting the more feeble against the more powerful members of the government, some more adequate defence, some practical security is necessary. What this was intended to be, will appear from subsequent passages:

"To what expedient shall we finally resort, for maintaining in practice the necessary partition of power among the several departments, as laid down in the constitution?" "As all exterior provisions are found to be inadequate, the defect must be supplied, by so contriving the interior structure of the government, as that its several constituent departments may, by their mutual relations, be the means of keeping each other in their proper places."

These passages intimate the "practical security" which ought to be adopted, for the preservation of the weaker against the stronger members of the government. It is so to contrive its interior structure, that the constituent organs may be able to keep each other in their proper places; an idea essentially incompatible with that of making the existence of one dependent on the will of another. It will be seen afterwards, how this structure is to be so contrived.

"In order to lay a foundation for that separate and distinct exercise of the different powers of government, which, to a certain extent, is admitted on all hands, to be essential to the preservation of liberty, it is evident, that each department should have a will of its own; and consequently should be so constituted, that the members of each should have as little agency as possible, in the appointment of the members of the others. This principle, rigorously adhered to, would require that all the appointments, for the several departments, should be drawn from the same fountain of authority, the people." But, "In the constitution of the judiciary department, it might be inexpedient to insist rigorously on the principle; first, because peculiar qualifications being essential in the members, the primary consideration ought to be to select that mode of choice, which best secures these qualifications; secondly, because the permanent tenure by which the appointments are held in that department, must soon destroy all sense of dependence on the authority conferring them."

"It is equally evident, that the members of each department should be as little dependent as possible on those of the others, for the emoluments annexed to their offices. Were the executive magistrate or the judges not independent of the legislature, in this particular, their independence in every other would be merely nominal." "The great security against a concentration of the several powers, in the same department, consists in giving to those, who administer each department, the necessary constitutional means and personal motives, to resist the encroachments of the others." "But it is not possible to give to each department an equal power of self-defence. In republican governments, the legislative authority necessarily predominates."

The means held out as proper to be employed, for enabling the several departments to keep each other in their proper places, are: 1. To give to each such an organization as will render them essentially independent of one another. 2. To secure to each a support, which shall not be at the discretionary disposal of any other. 3. To establish between them such mutual relations of authority as will make one a check upon another, and enable them reciprocally to resist encroachments, and confine one another within their proper spheres.

To accomplish the first end, it is deemed material that they should have as little agency as possible in the appointment of one another, and should all emanate directly from the same fountain of authority....the people: And that it being expedient to relax the principle, in respect to the judiciary department, with a view to a more select choice of its organs; this defect in the creation ought to be remedied by a permanent tenure of office; which certainly becomes nominal and nugatory, if the existence of the office rests on the pleasure of the legislature. The principle that the several organs should have as little agency as possible in the appointment of each other, is directly opposed to the claim in favour of one of a discretionary agency to destroy another. The second of the proposed ends, is designed to be effected by the provisions for fixing the compensations of the executive and judicial departments. The third, by the qualified negative of the executive, or the acts of the two houses of congress; by the right of one of these houses to accuse; of the other to try and punish the executive and judicial officers; and lastly, by the right of the judges, as interpreters of the laws, to pronounce unconstitutional acts void.

These are the means contemplated by the constitution, for maintaining the limits assigned to itself, and for enabling the respective organs of the government to keep each other in their proper places, so that they may not have it in their power to domineer the one over the other, and thereby, in effect, though not in form, to concentrate the powers in one department, overturn the government, and establish a tyranny. Unfortunate if these powerful precautions shall prove insufficient to accomplish the end, and to stem the torrent of the impostor....INNOVATION disguised in the specious garb of Patriotism!

The views, which prevailed in the formation of the constitution, are further illustrated by these additional comments from the same source*.

"As liberty can have nothing to fear from the judiciary alone, but would have every thing to fear from its union with either of the other departments; that as all the effects of such an union must ensue from a dependence of the former on the latter, notwithstanding a nominal and apparent separation; that as from the natural feebleness of the judiciary, it is in continual jeopardy of being overpowered, awed, or influenced by its co-ordinate branches; and that as nothing can contribute so much to its firmness and independence, as permanency in office, this quality may therefore be justly regarded as an indispensable ingredient in its constitution; and in a great measure as the citadel of the public justice, and the public security.

"The complete independence of the courts of justice is peculiarly essential in a limited constitution. Limitations can be preserved in practice no other way, than through the medium of the courts of justice to declare all acts contrary to the manifest tenor of the constitution void."

* James Madison, now secretary of state. Alexander Hamilton, formerly secretary of the treasury.

† Particularly Nos. XLVII to LI inclusive, and Nos. LXVIII to LXXXII inclusive.

‡ No. XLVII.

* No. LI.

* No. LXXVIII.

Then follows a particular discussion of the position, that it is the right and duty of the courts to exercise such an authority; to repeat which, would swell this number to an improper size.

The essence of the argument is, that every act of a delegated authority, contrary to the tenor of the commission, under which it is exercised, is void; consequently that no legislative act, inconsistent with the constitution, can be valid. That it is not a natural presumption, that the constitution intended to make the legislative body the final and exclusive judges of their own powers; but more rational to suppose that the courts were designed to be an intermediate body between the people and the legislature, in order, among other things, to keep the latter within the bounds assigned to its authority. That the interpretation of the laws being the peculiar province of the courts, and a constitution being in fact a fundamental law, superior in obligation to a statute, if the constitution and the statute are at variance, the former ought to prevail against the latter; the will of the people against the will of the agents; and the judges ought, in their quality of interpreters of the laws, to pronounce and adjudge the truth, namely, that the unauthorized statute is a nullity.

"Nor (continues the commentator) does this conclusion by any means suppose a superiority of the judicial to the legislative power. It only supposes that the power of the people is superior to both; and that where the will of the legislature, declared in its statute, stands in opposition to that of the people, declared in the constitution, the judges ought to be governed by the latter, rather than by the former. They ought to regulate their decisions by the fundamental laws, rather than by those, which are not fundamental.

"If then the courts of justice are to be considered as the bulwarks of a limited constitution, against legislative encroachments, this consideration will afford a strong argument for the permanent tenure of judicial offices."

But no proposition can be more manifest, than that this permanency of tenure must be nominal, if made defeasible at the pleasure of the legislature, and that it is ridiculous to consider it as an obstacle to encroachments of the legislative department, if this department has a discretion to vacate or abolish it directly or indirectly."

In recurring to the comments, which have been cited, it is not meant to consider them as evidence of any thing but of the views, with which the constitution was framed. After all, the instrument must speak for itself. Yet to candid minds, the co-temporary explanation of it, by men, who had had a perfect opportunity of knowing the views of its framers, must operate as a weighty collateral reason for believing the construction agreeing with this explanation to be right, rather than the opposite one. It is too cardinal a point, to admit readily the supposition, that there was misapprehension; and whatever motives may have subsequently occurred to bias the impressions of the one or the other of the purposes alluded to, the situation, in which they wrote, exempts both of an intention to misrepresent in this particular. Indeed a course of argument more accommodating to the objections of the adversaries of the constitution would probably have been preferred as most politic, if the truth, as conceived at the time, would have permitted a modification. Much trouble would have been avoided by saying, "The legislature will have a complete controul over the judges, by the discretionary power of reducing the number of those of the supreme court, and of abolishing the existing judges of the inferior courts, by the abolition of the courts themselves." But this pretension is a novelty reserved for the crooked ingenuity of after discoveries.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

WHEN the celebrated GEORGE COLMAN was once told, that a man, whose own character was not very immaculate, had grossly abused him, he pointedly remarked, that the evil report of some persons was like fuller's earth, it daubs your coat for a little time, but when it is rubbed off, your coat is so much the cleaner.

MILTON's third wife had an unhappy temper, but so fine a complexion, that a French gentleman who once paid him a visit said, Monsieur Milton, your lady is like the rose. It may be, replied the bard with a sigh, but I am so unhappy as to be blind, and alas! have never found any thing but the thorns.

A certain fribble, well known in all the polite circles, was asked by the margravine of Anspach, if he had read a new publication, of which the company were talking. No, replied he; what with the avocations of dressing and visiting, I can hardly ever find time to look into a book. I believe you, sir, said the accomplished margravine, and, taking out her pencil, instantly wrote the following lines:

Like the high Alps, the head of Clodio shows,
Tho' odd, perhaps, the simile may sound,
Without as white as its eternal snows,
Within as barren as its rocky ground.

The Chinese are not remarkable for their taste, but in imitation they are unrivalled. As there is some difficulty in getting silk of a peculiar quality out of that country, in the piece, an Englishman, who wished to have a silk coat, requested a friend, who was going to Canton, to procure one made there; and, as a pattern for fashion and size, sent an old garment that fitted him; to which the Chinese taylor adhered so correctly, that he inserted a patch on one of the elbows, because the old coat had one!

The following is a new definition. A gentleman, not much versed in literary affairs, once asked a friend, what was the meaning of posthumous works. Z.....ds! exclaimed he, don't you know that? why they are books which a man writes after he is dead, to be sure.

A flimsy novelist, having scribbled a volume of "Tales" for the instruction of the Fair sex, asked a late theatrical performer with whom he was acquainted to look over his manuscript, and give him a motto from Shakespeare that would be put to the purpose. It was returned with the following, written in the title page:

....."Tales, told by an idiot, full of sound and fury, signifying nothing"

A judge asked a man what age he was—I am eight and four-score, my lord, said he. And why not four-score and eight, says the judge? Because I was eight before I was four-score.

Mr. Jefferson drives like Jehu. The navy is to be suppressed, and our defence is to be abandoned to the French, according to the sage counsel of citizen Monroe, of Virginia. When the French are in possession of New-Orleans, they will be ready to come at a call, to assist Mr. Jefferson in amending our constitution, and introducing liberty and equality, as Buonaparte has done in France.

It seems, if that great historian Mr. Duane is to be trusted, we are soon to have a grand deistical chapel in this city. We suppose Thomas Paine will be the first incumbent, and that his sermons will be as much listened to as those of Dr. Priestley. But the deists will soon become weary of hearing sermons. Williams's deistical meeting in London, notwithstanding Dr. Franklin's recommendation, lasted only two years; the preacher having become as weary of preaching, as his congregation was of hearing.

We anticipate the dissolution of the federal union, as it is already virtually abolished, by the late proceedings on the judiciary bill. What is to be the fate of this wretched, this abused country, God alone knows; but the present aspect of its politics is malign and portentous.

The ratification of Dawson's French treaty passes without observation, and our merchants must now be content to put up with the loss of their property in favour of the great nation.

Our readers will see, that the Constitution, having met with a dreadful storm, on the "tempestuous sea," has at length gone ashore.

Politicians are greatly divided with respect to the use that is to be made of the mammoth cheese; whether it is to be sent as a present to Buonaparte, and on earnest of tribute from the United States, or to be divided among the state sovereignties, or to be devoured by Duane and Gallatin at the president's table, or preserved to posterity as a glorious monument of republicanism. It has already been the subject of several poems, and we wonder that the Rev. Mr. Leland did not preach a sermon, on occasion of its presentment. The mammoth turbot, that was taken at Ancona, and presented to the emperor Domitian, has been celebrated by JUVENAL, who tells us, that the Roman senate was assembled to deliberate on the mode of dressing it: and some wag at Washington has composed, by anticipation, a message or address to both houses of congress, which is much better than the real address and answer that have been published.

It does not appear that Buonaparte is to send any ambassador here, agreeably to the French plan, which is, as the reader may remember, to treat all nations in the same manner as they suffer themselves to be treated by the English! Otto, the Swiss, has been talked of, as being a confidant of the consul. Fayette will not be trusted, and the Corsican chief seems to be studious to keep all Frenchmen at a distance.

It is said, that judge Doddridge having once complained, that the sheriff of Huntingdon had summoned a grand jury, who were not men of rank, the officer at the next assizes took the hint, and presented the judge with the following high sounding pannel:

Maximilian, King of Toseland,
Henry, Prince of Godmanchester,
George, Duke of Somersham,
William, Marquis of Stukely,
Edmond, Earl of Hartford,
Richard, Baron of Bythorn,
Stephen, Pope of Newton,
Stephen, Cardinal of Kimbolton,
Humphrey, Bishop of Bugden,
Robert, Lord of Waresley,
Robert, Knight of Warwick,
William, Abbot of Stukely,
William, Dean of Old Weston,
John, Archdeacon of Paxton,
Peter, Squire of Easton,
Edward, Friar of Ellington,

REFLECTIONS OF MR. JEFFERSON,
OVER THE MAMMOTH CHEESE.

YE men of Cheshire, little did ye know,
When urg'd by love, this ponderous gift you sent,

That on this heart you struck a sick'ning blow,
And gave a thousand damning feelings vent.

In this great cheese I see myself pourtray'd,
My life and fortunes in this useless mass,
I curse the hands, by which the thing was made,
To them a cheese, to me a looking-glass.

Once I was pure.....Alas! that happy hour,
E'en as the milk, from which this monster came,

Till turn'd, by philosophic rennet, sour,
I barter'd virtue for an empty name.

Then press'd by doctrines from the Gallic school,
A harden'd mass of nameless stuff I stood,
Where crude confusion mingles without rule,
And countless seeds of foul corruption bud.

E'en the round form this work of art displays,
Marks the uncertain, endless path I tread,
Where truth is lost in falsehood's dreary maze,
And vice in circles whirls the giddy head.

Delusive view! where light is cast aside,
And principles surrender'd for mere words,
Ah me! how lost to just and noble pride,
I am indeed become a man of cards.

Like to this cheese, my outside, smooth and
sound,

Presents an aspect kind and lasting too;
When nought but rottenness within is found,
And all my seeming rests on nothing true.

Fair to the view, I catch admiring eyes,
The nation wonders, and the world applaud,
When spread beyond my just and nat'ral size,
I seem to them an earthly demigod.

But midst this shew of greatness and of ease,
Ten thousand vermin gnaw this wretched heart,
Just as they feed upon this mammoth cheese,
And I and they can never, never part.

Go, hated Mentor, blast no more my sight,
I would forget myself, and heaven defy,
Inur'd to darkness, I detest the light,
Would be a suicide, but dare not die.

SELECTED POETRY.

[In a London magazine we find the following original poem, replete with good sense, and recommended by a graceful ease of expression. The author was a rational epicurean, and his system of life nearly resembles that of busy indolence in "The Spleen." This ballad is very old, but its independent spirit is "ever fair and ever young." The propriety of the sixth stanza, the spirit of the seventh, and the lofty dignity of the last but one, will excite every generous bosom.]

CARELESS CONTENT.

I AM content, I do not care,
Wag as it will the world for me;
When fuss and fret was all my fare,
I got no ground as I could see;
So, when away my caring went,
I counted cost and was content.

With more of thanks, and less of thought,
I strive to make my matters meet;
To seek what ancient sages sought,
Physic and food, in sour and sweet;
To take what passes in good part;
And keep the hiccups from the heart.

With good and gentle-humour'd hearts,
I choose to chat where'er I come;
Whate'er the subject be that starts;
But if I get among the glum,
I hold my tongue, to tell the troth,
And keep my breath to cool my broth.

For chance or change of peace or pain;
For Fortune's favour or her frown;
For lack or glut, for loss or gain,
I never dodge, nor up nor down:
But swing what way the ship shall swim,
Or tack about with equal trim.

I suit not where I shall not speed,
Nor trace the turn of every tide;
If simple sense will not succeed,
I make no bustling but abide:
For shining wealth, or scaring woe,
I force no friend, I fear no foe.

Of ups and downs, of ins and outs,
Of they're i' the wrong, and we're i' the right,
I shun the rancours and the routs;
And wishing well to every wight,
Whatever turn the matter takes,
I deem it all but ducks and drakes.

With whom I feast I do not fawn,
Nor, if the folks should flout me, faint;
If wanted welcome be withdrawn,
I cook no kind of a complaint:
With none dispos'd to disagree,
But like them best, who best like me.

Not that I rate myself the rule
How all my betters should behave;
But fame shall find me no man's fool,
Nor to a set of men a slave;
I love a friendship free and frank,
And hate to hang upon a hank.

Fond of a true and trusty tie,
I never lose where'er I link;
Tho' if a business budes by,
I talk thereon just as I think:
My word, my work, my HEART, my HAND,
Still on a side together stand.

If names or notions make a noise,
Whatever hap the question hath,
The point impartially I poise,
And read and write, but without wrath;
For should I burn and break my brains,
Pray, who will pay me for my pains?

I love my neighbour as myself,
Myself like him too, by his leave;
Nor to his pleasure, power, or pelf,
Came I to crouch, as I conceive:
Dame Nature doubtless has design'd
A man the monarch of his mind.

Now taste and try this temper, sirs,
Mood it and brood it in your breast;
Or if ye ween, for wordly stirs,
That man does right to mar his rest,
Let me be deft and debonnaire,
I am content, I do not care.

[The following is a satire against European indecency, and is republished here merely to show our comparative purity.]

Says the Frenchman, who writes upon dresses, I know
Ever since mother Eve had a fall,
Our grandmothers always left something to shew,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

In beauty there's something to hide and reveal,
There's a thing that we decency call;
The ladies of London may shew a great deal,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

The taste of the men we all know to be such,
That exposing will appetites pall;
Low tuckers, I think, is displaying too much,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

Dear girls, while your faces enrapture each heart,
Complain not your power's too small;
In contemplating graces we're charm'd with a part,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

My Chloe was worshipp'd wherever she came,
Her shape was so tastefully small;
Her ANKLE has set all my blood in a flame,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

The tip of the elbow, below the white cuff,
Has made my heart dance at a ball;
To shew us a few things is pleasant enough,
But the ladies of Paris shew all!

If you wish to enchant us, this lesson should strike,
All the black, brown, and fair, short or tall,
Be contented with shewing us all that we like,
But for God's sake, my dears, don't shew all.

NEMO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

If some of our public characters would peruse attentively the following mode of catching gulls, so facetiously described by Peter Pindar, I am inclined to believe they might derive from it a very good hint.

Yours, &c.

Philadelphia, January 29th, 1802.

READER, do'st know the mode of catching gulls?
If not, I will inform thee.....Take a board,
And place a fish upon it for the fools,
A sprat, or any fish by gulls ador'd:

Those birds, who love a lofty flight,
And sometimes bid the sun good night,
Spying the glittering bait that floats below,
Sans ceremonie, down they rush,
(For gulls have got no manners) down they push,
And what's the pretty consequence I trow?
They strike their gentle jobbernowls of lead
Plump on the board.....then lie like boobies
dead.

Reader thou need'st not beat thy brains about,
To make so plain an application out:
There's many an acting puppy, take my word,
Who knocks his silly head against a board,
That might have help'd the state.....made a good jailor
A nightman, or a tolerable tailor.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XI.

AS a shining specimen of my impartiality, I publish the ensuing letters, by which it will be instantly discerned, that, though I am a careless loungeur, I am, at the same time, an upright judge. The ladies would do their friend, Saunter, the utmost injustice, and totally mistake the habits of his life, and the emotions of his heart, were it supposed that he is a woman hater, or that he repairs to toilets and drawing-rooms, merely to gather materials of wrath. He delights to discriminate, with a piercing eye, and a chastised judgment, and to honour all, who honour themselves.

MR. SAUNTER,

SIR,

It is with some pain, that we are obliged to address you in this way, owing to the unwillingness of our male friends to interfere, on a subject that only calls forth our resentment. It is unnecessary to apologise to you for this liberty, for we assure you, if the custom of the country, or our own sense of propriety would allow it, we would not be thus considerate, but we would wait on you, and demand in person what cause we have given you, thus incessantly to vent your spleen against us. Have our coquettes or prudes offended against you? These you are at liberty to reproach and expose to the world; but, in this, do not charge even them with crimes and artifices, which we all alike disdain.

You must know, we consider ourselves the most fashionable circle of young females in this city, and, therefore as having an indisputable right to give the ton to the manners of the place. We, therefore, with all possible deference, think, that, in your most excellent paper, when you would describe the society of Philadelphia, all inferior classes should be included in the general character (this we freely consent to), and that character should undoubtedly be drawn from the most enlightened and genteel circle. Or you should make a note, that those, to whom your satire could apply, were only the imitators of higher life, as the world will certainly imagine it is some of us, to whom you direct correction.

Now, our little friend (for we all know you), it is time you should forbear; for we do all declare, that no other than the art of pleasing, which nature and good education bestowed, is employed by any one of us, to attract admiration. No cosmetics, rouge, or lotions ever are on our toilets, to the truth of which we all subscribe.

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

MR. SAUNTER,

I hope you will not refuse me the liberty of making a few remarks upon a very ungenteel, I was almost going to say indelicate fashion, that is universally adopted by those vile creatures, men. I allude to the practice of stuffing their hands into the pockets of their small-clothes or pantaloons, before ladies. This fashion, as handy as it may be to them, is extremely offensive to the ladies; especially where a gentleman presents a lady with an apple, or hands her into a carriage. I know a gentleman, who always makes it a point to enter a ball-room, with his hands in his small-clothes pockets; but, however, he is in a degree excusable, for he is so awkward, that he does not know what else to do with them.

I hope my remarks will be attended to, at least by every gentleman; and how can it be otherwise, when they consider, that this practice is adopted by the very lowest class of people?

I am, with esteem,

Your humble servant,

KITTY DELICATE.

TO THE AMERICAN LOUNGER.

SIR,

I am a young woman, in a retired part of New-Jersey, whose travels have never extended beyond the bounds of the parish, in which I live; I am, as you may naturally suppose, an entire stranger to the modes of the fashionable world. My surprise and indignation were great, on reading the letter of Modestia, in your third number. Can it be possible, sir, that the ladies of your city have so far forgotten the "bashful modesty" of their sex, as to expose themselves publicly to the "lawless gaze" of every wanton eye? I have read that the American Indians, the natives of the South Sea Islands, and many of the Africans went naked, or nearly so, but I have not heard till lately that any civilized country had, in this particular, adopted the custom of savages. Strange, indeed! that the ladies of Philadelphia should receive their fashions from their copper-coloured neighbours, or from the daughters of Otaheite!

I hope, sir, you will exert all your authority to put a stop to a custom so indecent and so inimical to virtue, and effectually prevent its finding its way to the innocent retreats of the country.

Permit me to recommend to your fair readers the injunction of St. Paul, "that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shamefacedness and sobriety."

I am, Sir,
Yours, &c.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

DURING the suspension of our theatrical labours, one or two novelties have been produced, which claim our notice. "Folly as it Flies," the last effort, if we be rightly informed, of the prolific pen of Reynolds, has been two or three times represented. In this drama, the author has shown himself no bad marksman. He has made several palpable hits at the reigning follies of the day. We hope that the portrait of dissipation will be found rather too highly coloured, for its likeness to be known in this country; but, if we may credit the papers, we have among us several representatives of Dr. Infallible, for advertisements of medicines, whose wonderful virtues cure "toutes les maladies et plusieurs autres" (to adopt the language of a French Charlatan), meet our eyes in every paper.

In all the dramas of this author, we meet with events, which are scarcely consistent with probability, and that under review is, by no means, exempt from this defect. It contains several humorous situations, and some that are truly pathetic. Considered as compositions, his plays are, in general, feebly written; in the present piece, his language is improved. It was well acted. We know not whether to admire Mrs. Merry more in the full career of levity, or in the bitter agonies of repentance; both situations were portrayed with her usual perfection. Mr. Wignel and Mr. Wood displayed, with much effect, the infatuation of the parent, and the manly duty of the son. The simplicity of Shenkin, the cupidity of Peter Post-Obit, and the eccentricities of Tom Tick, were ably delineated by Blissett, Warren, and Bernard; and Miss Westray sustained the part allotted to her, with much simplicity and correctness.

We should not notice the representation of Obi, were we not actuated by a wish to pay the tribute of our applause to the gentleman who personated Three-Fingered Jack. We own ourselves partial to a story, well told in action; and we wish that this amateur may favour the public with a display of his talents, on many future occasions of the same kind. His action was spirited, appropriate, and energetic, in the highest degree; and his desperate conflict with his pursuers, was sustained with such truth and nature, that it almost excited sensations of horror in the spectator.

Mrs. Merry's benefit attracted an audience highly fashionable and splendid. She selected for their entertainment the popular play of Pizarro. The character of Elvira, her excellence in which has frequently called forth our applause, was, on this occasion, assigned to, and ably supported by, Mrs. Whitlock. She appeared herself in the more humble, though we think not less interesting, part of Cora. Her expression of the agitated feelings of the wife and mother, excited its usual powerful sway over the audience. Another change, of considerable importance in the cast of the characters, took place on that evening. Mr. Wood undertook the difficult part of Rolla. His success far exceeded the expectations of those, who were the most partial admirers of his rising talents. His conception of the character was excellent, his action perfectly just, and the applause of the spectators was no less justly than liberally bestowed. The only deficiency which the critic could notice, was an occasional want of power in his voice. "Though least not last in our dear love," we must notice the charming behaviour of the infant, who appeared as the child of Cora and Alonzo. Its innocent, and often appropriate gestures powerfully interested the feelings.

The afterpiece was new to the American stage. It is called the Blind Girl, and contains a melange of humorous and pathetic incidents. The entertainments of the evening were, however, protracted to so late an hour, that this piece lost much of its interest, from the weariness of the spectators. We think that it is a well constructed drama, and possesses a considerable portion of merit.

The regular march of the benefits was, for a while, suspended, on account of the return of Mr. Green, to his former station on the Philadelphia boards. He has since appeared in a variety of characters. In the Cure for the Heart-ach, he gave a spirited representation of Young Rapid. In his tragic efforts, he is less successful. In Osmond, the difficulties which he had to encounter, in following the finished excellence of Cooper in that character, were immense. He would, perhaps, have given more general satisfaction, had his predecessor been less distinctly remembered. His conception of the character seemed just, but his voice frequently failed him. Whether it be, that he has been accustomed to a smaller stage, and has not yet acquired the pitch necessary for the Philadelphia theatre, we know not, but we often lose the concluding words of his sentences. If this fault was corrected, which we trust that a few efforts will enable him to do, we think that he might prove an useful acquisition to our present theatrical corps.

Mr. Bernard selected for his benefit a sprightly prelude, called the Manager in Distress. It went off with much spirit, and the audience appeared to be highly amused with the novelty of persons speaking from the pit and side boxes. The Dramatist succeeded this trifle, and was excellently performed. Bernard's Vapid was, throughout, animated and correct. Mrs. Merry appeared in her original character of Miss Courtney: and, although the part seems beneath her powers, she imparted to it interest and importance. Miss Westray was particularly successful in Marianne: we do not hesitate to pronounce it the best delineation of that character, that we have ever witnessed. Her excellence in the fainting scene, in the fifth act, cannot be too highly applauded. Mr. Warren gave a spirited representation of the impetuous peer, and Wood was highly respectable in Eunui. Mr. Green was less successful in Florville's first appearance, than in the drunken scene. Mrs. Francis gave us less satisfaction than usual. We have often admired her excellence in the prim old maid, and the flippant domestic. In the character under review, she occasionally seemed to forget that lady Waitfort was a modern woman of fashion, and dropt some of those low courtesies, which are better adapted to the character of the antiquated country vestal. Her passionate expostulation with Vapid was, however, very happy.

The afterpiece of the Wags of Windsor, or the Man of all Trades, contains much broad humour. He must, indeed, have the muscles of a Cynic, who could preserve the gravity of his countenance, during its representation. Bernard's Caleb Quotem was admirable; and his song, and his journal of the multifarious employments of a day, were equally irresistible. Miss Arnold personated a fair quaker, and looked and sang sweetly; but we do not notice, in her action, that improvement, which we had anticipated from her early essays.

Mrs. Oldmixon's bill contained the attraction of a play and farce, both equally new to the Philadelphia stage. But the inclemency of the weather prevented the assemblage of such an audience as was due to her merit. The play of Reparation contains some spirited sketches of character, but it is posset of very little interest. The part, which she herself sustained, was delineated with her usual comic effect. In the fourth act, after a highly humorous scene, sustained with equal spirit by her and Mr. Francis, she was suddenly taken ill. An apology was therefore made to the audience, for a change of the afterpiece, to the great disappointment of those, who had expected a rich treat from her acknowledged vocal excellence, in a musical afterpiece. Three Weeks after Marriage was the substitute; in which Bernard and Miss Westray were as spirited as usual, in Sir Charles and Lady Racket.

The indefatigable and meritorious Warren selected, for his benefit, a Masonic Prelude, the Widow of Malabar, and Falstaff's Wedding. The former was a grave composition, which, though short, we cannot say was sweet. The tragedy seems, in many places, feebly written. The burden of the two principal characters was admirably supported by Mrs. Merry and Mr. Wood; but the others appeared to have little of importance, either to do or to say. The stage decorations, in the last scene, were not so happily arranged as usual; the pile was brought too far forward, to deceive for an instant. Falstaff's Wedding was reduced to three acts; and the Falstaff of Kenrick was as excellently represented by Warren, as the Falstaff of Shakspeare. The other characters were well cast, and ably performed; but the piece is too long for an entertainment. We think it would have answered very well as a first piece. The house was respectably filled, but not so filled as it ought to have been, for the benefit of one, to whom the frequenters of the theatre are every night so largely indebted, for the entertainment which they receive.

MUSICAL INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE Harmonic Society, under the presidency of the Reverend Mr. Law, convened on Thursday evening, the 18th instant, at Dr. Green's church, in Arch-street, when a number of elegant tunes, composed by Mr. Law, were sung, by a numerous company of ladies and gentlemen, members of the society; in which the charms of melody were accompanied by the no less delightful charms of conspicuous beauty. A pertinent and elegant oration, on the science of music, was delivered by Mr. James A. Neal, principal of the Young Ladies' Academy, of which the orator very happily took a retrospective view, from the earliest ages of antiquity; and, after dwelling, with much ingenuity, on the beauty, sublimity, and importance of sacred harmony, concluded by a very urbane and impressive address to the fair part of the creation, soliciting their aid in promoting the laudable art of vocal music. On the whole, perhaps, those who attended, have seldom tasted a more agreeable mental repast.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

A WRITER, who exhibits a delicacy of moral feeling, unhappily too rare in the present corrupt age, hath, in one of the evening papers of this city, made some animadversions, equally mild and judicious, upon the introduction of a new dance, called the waltz, into the circles of fashion. I am happy to observe, sir, that you are so alarmed upon this occasion, that you have inserted the observations of Lyttelton, with an introductory notice from your own pen. You have thus adopted them, and have given a more extensive circulation to this warning against danger, which, perhaps, had it not been for the sagacity of Lyttelton, might have escaped our notice. Yes, sir, we might have seen our manners daily degenerating, the waltz becoming more and more prevalent, and might have been entirely ignorant, that the deplorable state of our morals was attributable to the corrupt and corrupting influence of this portentous dance.

I cannot forbear, sir, from bestowing that commendation, which I think due to the disinterestedness of the writer, before I proceed further. He professes himself to have neither daughter nor sisters, yet his allusions are as keen and as indignant, as if he stood in each of these relations, and were contemplating the dishonour of both.

In one instance only, has he abandoned the course of that morality, which he so ably defends. I mean, in that unfortunate paragraph, where he acknowledges the innocence of the dances usually practised. I can easily perceive, from the tenor of his letter, that he is an enemy to dancing in general. He would have proscribed it, in toto, had he followed the dictates of his own heart, but, alas! here his virtuous courage failed him.

That part of his duty, which he has left unperformed, I shall endeavour, in my feeble measure, to supply; and this I shall be able to accomplish the more easily, as I shall borrow and adopt many of his own expressions, which, I am confident, will be found to be as applicable to dancing in general, as to the unseemly waltz.

The following is his description of this new-fangled dance:

"It is marked by a familiarity of person, a voluptuousness of movement, a lasciviousness of look, and a destitution of reserve, which must be obnoxious to that correct taste, which essentially differs both from mad licentiousness, and from prudish austerity. It should be further noted, that the revolutions are constant and giddy, that the feet of the dancers are in close and intimate union, that the male supports the female, by gentle pressure of the waist, that the female, with skill, occasionally acquiesces in the softness of the scene, and then again repels her partner, and that the eye, intent upon the eye, speaks love and pleasure. Let me add to the description, that the measures of the music are soft and Syrenian, and what sense so blunt, as not to perceive the tendency?"

All this is wonderfully exact; not in the least overcharged. Yet I am surprised, that it did not strike the ingenious author, that almost every syllable of this animated description is equally applicable to various parts of the figure of a country-dance or cotillion. Let us first advert to that figure, which is called leading down the middle. The feet of the dancers here certainly approximate to "a close and intimate union;" the extended arms bring the whole frame into juxta-position; and "the eye, intent upon the eye, speaks love and pleasure.".... Some persons indeed, instead of looking at their partners, modestly look down at their shoes, and mark the motions of their own feet; but this custom is not very general, and, I believe, is not much applauded. Indeed, the eye speaks less love and pleasure in the waltz, than in any other dance. In order to prevent vertigo, they are, for the most part, immovably fixed upon one point, and this gives to the countenance an uniform expression of gravity. "The revolutions are constant and giddy," in many of the most usual figures of cotillions and country-dances. The zeal of the author has, however, misled him in a small degree, or he would not have found fault with this effect. Giddiness from pleasure has no resemblance, except in name, to giddiness from rapid revolution. The former is a metaphorical expression, the latter, wherever it exists, is apt to be attended with some slight degree of sickness; a sensation very incompatible with that tribe of voluptuous feelings, which he so warmly describes. If, from habit, these revolutions have ceased to produce this effect, the whole train of dangers connected with them, of course, ceases. There is not much difference between the familiarity of person in a waltz, and in an allemande or promenade. In the one instance, if I might be allowed to attempt at a faint imitation of Lyttelton's style, the arms are amorously entwined behind, and, in the other, before of the dancers.

I too am a "lover of the invaluable Spectator," and have read, with much pleasure, the complaints of the honest citizen, with respect to the obnoxious figures of some of the dances of his day. But why should I here be again compelled to trace a deficiency of virtuous courage in my estimable moralist? Why has he suppress the definition, given in the letter to which he alludes, of "setting," that figure, common both to country-dances and cotillions? The honest man describes it, as a "most impudent and lascivious step," of which he cannot convey a better idea, than by observing, that it is "the very reverse of back to back."

Why did he suppress the comment of the Spectator, in which he so happily enlarges on the dangerous consequences which may result, from the great familiarities between the two sexes, in the country-dance, unless he were afraid that some of the remarks might appear ironical, and that he might prove more than he wished to do?

Permit me then, Mr. Oldschool, to advance a step or two further than Lyttelton, in the cause of morality. Permit me to propose, that the "lascivious steps and melting music" of the cotillion and country-dance may be banished, together with the waltz, to the east, in order "to preserve alive, by frolic, attitude, and gesture, the glimmering flame, in the bosom of a pampered Achmet."..... Henceforth, let no dance be witnessed in our festive circles, except the solemn minuet; and to preserve, as far as possible, the inflammatory consequences which naturally follow the joining of hands, let masters of ceremonies, of advanced age and approved discretion, be appointed, who shall see that the hands, both of the gentleman and his partner, are covered with, at least, two pair of substantial leather gloves.

I would fain, sir, explode dancing altogether, for every modification of it retains more or less of those voluptuous features, which Lyttelton has sketched, with such truth and correctness; but I despair of introducing a change, so beneficial to the morals of the rising generation, and therefore must sigh and submit; but I will not despair; I will call upon Lyttelton to assist me. I trust, that I have clearly proved, that the same objections apply to the cotillion and country-dance, as to the waltz; and I therefore now call upon him, with confidence, either to withdraw, forthwith, his objections to the waltz, or to unite with me, in condemning every species of dancing, as utterly subversive of morality, and highly pernicious to the best interests of society.

I am, sir,

Yours, &c.

MISCELLANY.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

As the young olive in some sylvan scene,
Crown'd by fresh fountains with eternal green,
Lifts the gay head, in snowy flowrets fair,
And plays and dances to the gentle air;
When lo! a whirlwind from high heaven invades
The tender plant, and withers all its shades;
It lays uprooted in its genial bed,
A lovely ruin, now defac'd and dead.

POPE.

IT is an observation, founded on a general survey of mankind, and which, I am afraid, a closer inspection would not controvert, that one half of the world knows not how the other exists. This, however, might, in part, be attributed to the insufficiency of human nature, were it not a melancholy truth, that their negligence in this point is equal to their ignorance. Nursed in the lap of luxury, the son of fortune, whose budding hopes have never been nipped by the blast of adversity, turns his eyes, with contemptuous disgust, from the cheerless scenes of penury and distress, to the dazzling glare, which, under pretence of lulling sorrow, stares reflection out of countenance, and convicts reason of cynicism, by the specious appearance of indulging harmless gaiety. The listless apathist, becalmed in his own insensibility, looks with a vacant eye on the terrors of conflicting passion; or, as the utmost exertion of his pity, endeavours to allay the storm of a weak but generous mind, with the dictatorial precepts of a closetted philosopher.

Those, of the above description, I warn to proceed no farther in this paper. To the feeling, and in this community I should hope the major part of my readers, the authenticity of the following story will carry with it a sufficient apology.

The father of Frederic having, from an early pique, secluded himself from mankind, devoted an ample fortune to his family, his stables, and his cellar, in the extremity of Somersetshire. He was naturally of a morose, saturnine temper, which a considerable quantity of port, regularly discussed after dinner, for a continuance of thirty years, had not a little contributed to heighten. The usual companion of his leisure hours was the parish attorney, a supple knave, who, as occasion served, could rail at the times, praise the wine, take snuff, or ring for another bottle. Argument, it is natural to suppose, would not have beguiled many hours with such a duumvirate; but the squire was too distrustful of any thing human, to be circumvented in the common way, and his Achates too much a master of arts to attempt it.

By a feint, therefore, at first of opposition, and at every convenient opportunity of conviction, he frequently flattered this petty tyrant more agreeably, and sometimes allured him to his own opinion. The subject of his eldest son's education was long on the tapis; the squire being too much of a misanthrope to relish the idea of a public school, and the lawyer too jealous of the boy's growing influence, not to wish so powerful an obstacle removed. At length, however, by a more than usual exertion of artifice, he wheedled the old gentleman out of his prejudices, and, at ten years of age, Frederic was sent to Eton. Even at this early period, the natural warmth of his disposition had begun to display itself. Open, candid, and generous, his heart was the constant companion of his hand, and his tongue the artless index of his mind. As his ideas expanded, his virtues seemed to have acquired a larger scope; and the unsuspecting generosity which had before induced him heedlessly to deposit his joys and griefs with every stranger, to have been matured into a warm philanthropic benevolence for human nature, and a romantic attachment to the few, who were the more immediate objects of his affections. Exposed alike to the attacks of all the generous passions, the impetuous sallies of his temper were as easily suppressed as excited. Jealous in the extreme of obligations, and keenly sensitive, in any point which appealed to his honour or compassion, he was always a stranger to the calm serenity of a virtuous mind, and ultimately overwhelmed by those feelings, which are so often the pleasing curse of a luxuriant imagination.

To these qualifications of the heart, Frederic added the endowments of an elegant fancy; often indeed too impatient of the necessary restrictions of art, but naturally corrected by so pure a taste, as to enable him to discern, with admirable perspicuity, the limits of true and false beauty; and those of his classical compositions, which peculiarly struck his ideas, united that vivid, energetic glow of thought, which true genius alone can conceive, to a simple chastity of expression, which only correct judgment can define. As an agreeable polish to so much intrinsic merit, his countenance was lively and animated, his figure genteel, and his manners engaging.

In human, as in inanimate nature, similar qualities will have a mutual attraction. By directing our thoughts to the same objects; by viewing each other's ideas with a sympathetic benevolence; nay, even by those friendly contests, which, in the most perfect unanimity of opinion, the digressive sallies of enthusiasm sometimes give rise to, but which tend only to diversify the calm of universal concurrence, we insensibly glide into that intimate harmony, without which society is but a state of armed neutrality, little superior to the open warfare of savage nature. By each of these ties, was a romantic friendship cemented between Frederic and Edmond; their sentiments and inclinations mutually led them to a tender regard for each other's virtues. And, as they were equally blessed with all external contingencies towards happiness in future, they looked forward, with satisfaction, to the scene of active life, which seemed to invite them to the honourable exertion of their abilities.

But, alas! so fair a morning was overcast in its dawn. Frederic's virtues, which, though they could not have prolonged his existence, might at least have entitled him to a calm resignation of his breath, and the sublime satisfaction of a tranquil mind, in the awful moment of dissolution, were blasted by the artful insinuations of a villain. The worthy perpetrator of this precious piece of villainy, had, by magnifying puerile foibles into the premeditated depravities of a black heart, at length so estranged the affections of his father, as to prevail on him to make a will, entirely in his own favour; and the first notice of his displeasure was conveyed to Frederic by the executor, some days after his death.

Melancholy, to a soft and lively mind is at first an unwelcome stranger; the propensity to indulge its sensations is strongly engrafted in our natures, and we feel our own weakness, though we cannot overcome it. It was in vain that Frederic called to mind every consolatory precept, which philosophy can so well suggest, but human nature so ill practice on these occasions; he began to lose his relish for society, and even to avoid the company of a friend, to whom he could now look on his attachment in no other light than as a burthen. The quick jealousy of Edmond did not let this alteration pass unobserved. He endeavoured, by an increased attention, to dispel the cloud he perceived lowering on his friend's spirits; but in vain. Resolved, therefore, by one effort, to request that confidence, which his esteem taught him he was entitled to, he took the opportunity of communicating one day his observations, and complaining of that reserve, which had before been a stranger to their intercourse. Frederic felt this reproach, and resolved to sacrifice his own feelings to those of his friend. "Edmond," said he, "hitherto we have lived together in the most uninterrupted union; that we might have died as we have lived, was the fondest hope my imagination ever cherished: that hope is blasted. Whatever may have dictated this letter, I am guiltless of having given the most trivial occasion for it."

Edmond read the letter with that mixed emotion, which a good mind feels at the calamity of a friend, and the prospect of relieving it. "My friend," he replied, "what delicacy would otherwise have prevented me from pressing, your candour has forced from me; need I tell you, that Providence has furnished me with ample means for our mutual happiness; despise, while I have a hand to serve you, the frowns of fortune, and, if that should fail, let us encounter poverty together, and die as we have lived, united."

"No, Edmond, my pride forbids me to live a dependent, even on your generosity; my misery shall never be a burden to you. The wide world is before me; my life has not been so blackened with guilt, but I shall somewhere find an asylum, however wretched, to exchange a miserable existence for a tranquil dissolution; you may run that race of glory which is denied to me; and may the recollection of your lost friend sometimes diffuse a pleasing melancholy over the moment of reflection; but never, never embitter that uninterrupted felicity, which your virtues are so amply entitled to."

Edmond had scarce strength to urge his request, till Frederic, foreseeing that the execution of his gloomy purpose might be prevented by the jealous vigilance of his friend, appeared by degrees to soften into compliance, and relieved his present anxiety by a momentary affectation of tranquillity. He was scarce however retired to his chamber, when, having directed a small note to Edmond, he threw himself into a chaise, and arrived late in the evening in the metropolis. Regardless of the objects around him, and solely enveloped in the contemplation of the scene he had just quitted, he threw himself on a bed in the inn, at which he alighted; and with partial dozes, which only served to render his situation more horrible, he reflected on his miseries till morning. As soon as it was light, he determined to hire a lodging in some obscure part of the town, where he might elude the prying generosity of his friend, and endeavour to protract a miserable existence, which an enthusiastic sense of religion alone prevented him from sacrificing to his despair. For this purpose he fixed on a miserable garret, in those gloomy regions, at sight of which even adversity recoils; here, with the assistance of a few books, which he had brought with him for the purpose, he endeavoured to beguile that hollow misery, which continually preyed on his vitals. And that no neglect of religious duty might embitter his reflections, determined to apply himself to some means of supporting life. Still therefore cherishing the idea of independence, however wretched, he determined to enlist himself among a tribe of translators, employed by an eminent bookseller; vainly hoping, that while he earned his miserable pittance, by a return of labour, the obligation would be considered as mutual. But he soon found that there is not so abject a slave as a hireling scribbler, nor so tyrannical a despot as an illiterate churl, who pays for learning and potatoes with the same remorseless stupidity. The imperious arrogance of this bashaw, and the gross adulation and vulgar merriment of his fellow servants, was little suited to the proud sensibility of Frederic. He endured, however, the insults of the one, and jests of the others, till a fever, brought on by his continual agitation of spirits, actually deprived him of this means of earning a subsistence, and stretched him on his truckle bed, amidst all the horrors of famine, indigence, disease, and despair.

In the mean time, Edmond, whose violent affliction for the departure of his friend, had for some time reduced his life to a precarious situation: as soon as he found his health in some degree re-established, determined to abandon a spot, which only presented to his mind a gloomy recollection of the days that were gone, and to follow the fortunes of his friend. Having accordingly laid the circumstances before his father, he obtained a full permission to gratify his inclination. He repaired to London, as supposing Frederic would abscond in some obscure spot of a labyrinth, in which he was most likely to be effectually concealed.

After a fortnight's fruitless search, when a settled gloom had begun to throw a damp on all his hopes of success, happening one day to enter the shop of Frederic's late employer, he overheard the literary monarch enforcing his daily rebuke with sundry oaths and ejaculations; and among other particulars, bitterly complaining of the absence of the pale dismal young man, who had lately enlisted in his service. This description immediately figured to his imagination his dejected friend; tremblingly alive with this idea, he eagerly inquired his lodging, determining immediately to satisfy the fearful curiosity, which his late absence had inspired. His first emotions a little subsided, he resolved previously to apply for medical assistance; that in case of any urgent necessity, it might be at hand. For this purpose he visited the late Dr. —, and it was by his advice that he determined to spare his friend's weak and exhausted spirits the agitation of a sudden interview.

It was not without considerable emotion that Edmond entered a dreary hut, whose very appearance was calculated to inspire misery; it was from the hag, who owned this mansion, that he learned, that her lodger had for some time kept his bed; and was so reduced, by three days almost total abstinence, as to be frequently deprived of understanding. Shocked as he was at this information, he saw the propriety of the physician's advice sufficiently, to take his stand at the door of the apartment, in order to watch the most favourable opportunity for an interview.

Frederic's strength had been that evening so far exhausted by a preceding delirium, as to afford him, for a short time, the wretched possession of his faculties. He was kneeling, with great apparent agony, before a bible, and grasping with a convulsive gripe the foot of his bed, as if by the exertion of his nerves, to awaken his fainting soul from the torpor, which seemed to be gathering on it, at every interval of empassioned phrensy. There is in solitary misery, a comfortless horror in brooding over misfortunes, which far exceeds even the cutting pangs we feel when those we love are involved in our calamities. In the latter situation we have a pleasing object to rest the external sense on; and the very gratification of our feelings on such an occasion, diffuses a tranquil luxury over our sorrows; in the former, all is dark and comfortless, and a knowing horror perpetually suggests ideas, which the gangrened imagination, while it trembles to nourish, is unable to resist the indulgence of. Such was the situation of Frederic, when the recollection of the past, the horror of the present, and the prospect of the future, drew from the bottom of his soul "Oh! that I had the wings of a dove, then would I fly away and be at rest." Edmond could at this eja-ulation no longer contain himself, but rushing into the room, and hanging over his fainting friend, "All may yet be well," said he, "we may yet live to renew our pleasures; to pursue those fond projects, which your too delicate generosity has so cruelly interrupted!" The well-known voice sounded on Frederic's dying senses, and recalled a momentary exertion of his languid spirit; "Never, never, it is past! Oh! Edmond, it is past!" then darting a look of despairing agony to Heaven, he exclaimed, in a trembling voice, "My God! My God! why hast thou forsaken me?" and sinking into the arms of his friend, groaned out his soul, and expired.

POLITICS.

FROM THE NEW-YORK EVENING POST.

MESSAGE, CONTINUED.

No. XVI.

THE president, as a politician, is in one sense particularly unfortunate. He furnishes frequent opportunities of arraying him against himself....of combating his opinions at one period by his opinions at another. Without doubt a wise and good man may, on proper grounds, relinquish an opinion which he has once entertained, and the change may even serve as a proof of candour and integrity. But with such a man, especially in matters of high public importance, changes of this sort must be rare. The contrary is always a mark either of a weak and versatile mind, or of an artificial and designing character, which, accommodating its creed to circumstances, takes up or lays down an article of faith, just as may suit a present convenience.

The question in agitation respecting the judiciary department, calls up another instance of opposition between the former ideas of Mr. Jefferson, and his recent conduct. The leading positions, which have been advanced as explanatory of the policy of the constitution, in the structure of the different departments, and as proper to direct the interpretation of the provisions, which were contrived to secure the independence and firmness of the judges, are to be seen in a very emphatical and distinct form in the Notes on Virginia. The passage, in which they appear, deserves to be cited at length, as well for its intrinsic merit, as by way of comment upon the true character of its author; presenting an interesting contrast between the maxims, which experience had taught him while governor of Virginia, and those, which now guide him as the official head of a great party in the United States.

It is in these words....

"All the powers of government, legislative, executive, and judiciary, result to the legislative body. The concentrating these in the same hands is precisely the definition of despotic government. It will be no alleviation that these powers will be exercised by a plurality of hands, and not by a single one. One hundred and seventy-three despots would surely be as oppressive as one. Let those, who doubt it, turn their eyes on the republic of Venice. As little will it avail us that they are chosen by ourselves. An elective despotism was not the government we fought for; but one, which should not only be founded on free principles, but in which the powers of government should be so divided and balanced among several bodies of magistracy, as that no one could transcend their legal limits, without being effectually checked and restrained by the others. For this reason that convention, which passed the ordinance of government, laid its foundation on this basis, that the legislative, executive, and judiciary departments should be separate and distinct, so that no person should exercise the powers of more than one of them at the same time. But no barrier was provided between these several powers. The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislative for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it. If, therefore, the legislative assumes executive and judiciary powers, no opposition is likely to be made: nor if made, can be effectual; because, in that case, they may put their proceedings into the form of an act of assembly, which will render them obligatory on the other branches. They have accordingly in many instances decided rights, which should have been left to judicial controversy; and the direction of the executive, during the whole time of their session, is becoming habitual and familiar.

This passage fully recognizes these several important truths: that the tendency of our governments is towards a concentration of the powers of the different departments in the legislative body; that such a concentration is precisely the definition of despotism, and that an effectual barrier between the respective departments ought to exist. It also, by a strong implication, admits that offices during good behaviour are independent of the legislature for their continuance in office. This implication seems to be contained in the following sentence: "The judiciary and executive members were left dependent on the legislature for their subsistence in office, and some of them for their continuance in it." The word 'some' implies that others were not left thus dependent; and to what description of officers can the exception be better applied, than to the judges, the tenure of whose offices was during good behaviour?

The sentiments of the president, delivered at a period when he can be supposed to have been under no improper bias, must be regarded by all those, who respect his judgment, as no light evidence of the truth of the doctrine, for which we contend. Let us, however, resume and pursue the subject on its merits, without relying upon the aid of so variable and fallible an authority.

At an early part of the discussion in this examination, a construction of the constitution was suggested, to which it may not be amiss to return. It amounts to this, that congress have power to new-model, or even to abrogate an inferior court, but not to abolish the office or emoluments of a judge of such court previously appointed. In the congressional debates, some of the speakers against the repealing law appear to have taken it for granted, that the abrogation of the court must draw with it the abolition of the judges, and, therefore, have denied in totality, the power of abrogation. In the course of these papers too, it has been admitted, that if the preservation of the judges cannot be reconciled with the power to annul the court, then the existence of this power is rightly denied. But in an affair of such vast magnitude, it is all-important to survey with the utmost caution the ground to be taken, and then to take and maintain it with inflexible fortitude and perseverance. Truth will be most likely to prevail, when the arguments, which support it stop at a temperate mean, consistent with practical convenience. Excess is always error. There is hardly any theoretic hypothesis, which, carried to a certain extreme, does not become practically false. In construing a constitution, it is wise as far as possible to pursue a course, which will reconcile essential principles with convenient modifications. If guided by this spirit, in the great question, which seems destined to decide the fate of our government, it is believed that the result will accord with the construction, that congress have a right to change or abolish inferior courts, but not to abolish the actual judges.

Towards the support of this construction, it has been shewn in another place, that the courts and the judges are distinct legal entities, which, in contemplation of law, may exist independently the one of the other....mutually related, but not inseparable. The act proposed to be repealed exemplifies this idea in practice. It abolishes the district courts of Tennessee and Kentucky, and transfers their judges to one of the circuit courts. Though the authorities and jurisdiction of those courts are vested in the circuit court, to which the judges are transferred; yet the identity of the courts cease. It cannot be maintained that courts so different in their organization and jurisdiction are the same; nor could a legislative transfer of the judges have been constitutional, but upon the hypothesis, that the office of a judge may survive the court, of which he is a member: A new appointment by the executive, of two additional judges for the circuit court would otherwise have been necessary.

This precedent in all its points is correct, and exhibits a rational operation of the construction, which regards the office of the judge as distinct from the court, as one of the elements or constituent parts, of which it is composed; not as a mere incident, that must perish with its principal.

It will not be disputed, that the constitution might have provided in terms, and with effect, that an inferior court, which had been established by law, might by law be abolished; nevertheless, that the judges of such court should retain the offices of judges of the United States, with the emoluments before attached to their offices. The operation of such a provision would be, that when the court was abolished, all the functions to be executed in that court would be suspended, and the judge could only continue to exert the authorities and perform the duties, which might before have been performed, without reference to causes pending in court; but he would have the capacity to be annexed to another court, without the intervention of a new appointment, and by that annexation, simply to renew the exercise of the authorities and duties, which had been suspended.

If this might have been the effect of positive and explicit provision, why may it not likewise be the result of provisions, which, presenting opposite considerations, point to the same conclusion, as a compromise calculated to reconcile those considerations with each other, and to unite different objects of public utility? Surely the affirmative infringes no principle of legal construction, transgresses no rule of good sense.

Let us then enquire, whether there are not in this case opposite and conflicting considerations, demanding a compromise of this nature? On the one hand, it is evident that if an inferior court once instituted, though found inconvenient, cannot be abolished, this is to entail upon the community the mischief, be it more or less, of a first error in the administration of the government. On the other hand, it is no less evident, that if the judges hold their offices at the discretion of the legislature, they cease to be a co-ordinate, and become a dependent branch of the government; from which dependence mischiefs infinitely greater are to be expected.

All these mischiefs, the lesser as well as the greater, are avoided by saying, "Congress may abolish the courts, but the judges shall retain their offices, with the appurtenant emoluments." The only remaining inconvenience then, will be one too insignificant to weigh in a national scale, that is, the expence of the compensations of the incumbents during their lives. The future and permanent expence will be done away.

But will this construction secure the benefits proposed by the constitution from the independent tenure of judicial office? Substantially it will..... The main object is to preserve the judges from being influenced by an apprehension of the loss of the advantages of office. As this loss could not be incurred, that influence would not exist. Their firmness could not be assailed by the danger of being superseded, and perhaps consigned to want. Let it be added, that when it was understood not to be in the power of the legislature to deprive the judges of their offices and emoluments, it would be a great restraint upon the factious motives, which might induce the abolition of a court. This would be much less likely to happen, unless for genuine reasons of public utility; and of course there would be a much better prospect of the stability of judiciary establishments.

No. XVII.

IT was intended to have concluded the argument respecting the judiciary department with the last number. But a speech lately delivered* in the house of representatives, having since appeared, which brings forward one new position, and reiterates some others in a form well calculated to excite prejudice, it may not be useless to devote some further attention to the subject.

The new position is, that the clause of the constitution enabling the judges to hold their offices during good behaviour, ought to be understood to have reference to the executive only, because all offices are holden of the president!

This is the second example of a doctrine, contrary to every republican idea, broached in the course of this debate, by the advocates of the repealing law†. Had a federalist uttered the sentiment, the cry of monarchy would have resounded from one extremity of the United States to the other. It would have been loudly proclaimed that the mask was thrown aside, by a glaring attempt to transform the servants of the people into the supple tools of presidential ambition. But now, to justify a plain resolution of the constitution, and serve a party purpose, this bold and dangerous position is avowed, without hesitation or scruple, from a quarter remarkable for the noisy promulgation of popular tenets.

The position is not correct; and it is of a nature to demand the indignant reprobation of every real republican. In the theory of all the American constitutions, offices are holden of the government, in other words, of the people through the government. The appointment is indeed confined to a particular organ, and in instances, in which it is not otherwise provided by the constitution or the laws, the removal of the officer is left to the pleasure or discretion of that organ. But both these acts suppose merely an instrumentality of the organ; from the necessity or expediency of the people's acting in such cases by an agent. They do not suppose the substitution of the agent to the people, as the object of the fealty or allegiance of the officer.

It is said that the word holden is a technical form, denoting tenure, and implying that there is one who holds, another of whom the thing is holden. This assertion is indeed agreeable to the common use of the word in our law books. But it is hardly to be presumed that it was employed in the constitution in so artificial a sense. It is more likely that it was designed to be the equivalent of the words possess, enjoy. Yet let the assertion be supposed correct. In this case, it must also be remembered that the term in this technical sense includes two things: the quantity of interest in the subject holden, and the meritorious consideration, upon which the grant is made; which, in many cases, includes service or rent, in all fealty; this last forming emphatically the link or tie between the lord and the tenant, the sovereign and the officer. Will any one dare to say that fealty or allegiance, as applied to the government of the United States, is due from the officer to the president?.... Certainly it is not. It is due to the people in their political capacity. If so, it will follow that the office is holden not of the president, but of the nation, government, or state.

It is remarkable that the constitution has every where used the language "officers of the United States," as if to denote the relation between the officer and the sovereignty; as if to exclude the dangerous pretension that he is the mere creature of the executive; accordingly, he is to take an oath "to support the constitution," that is, an oath of fidelity to the government; but no oath of any kind to the president.

In the theory of the British government, it is entirely different. There the majesty of the nation is understood to reside in the prince. He is deemed the real sovereign. He is, emphatically, the fountain of honour. Allegiance is due to him; and, consequently, public offices are, in the true notion of tenure, holden of him. But in our constitution, the president is not the sovereign; the sovereignty is vested in the government, collectively; and it is of the sovereignty, strictly and technically speaking, that a public officer holds his office.

If this view of the matter be just, the basis of the argument, in point of fact, fails; and the principle of it suggests an opposite conclusion, namely, that the condition of good behaviour is obligatory on the whole government, and ought to operate as a barrier against any authority, by which the displacement of the judges from their offices may be, directly or indirectly, effected.

In the same speech, much stress has been laid on the words "during their continuance in office," as implying that the compensation of the judge was liable to cease by a legislative discontinuance of the office. If the words had been during the continuance of the office, the argument would have been pertinent; but as they stand, a different inference, if any, is to be drawn from them. They seem rather to relate to the continuance of the officer, than to that of the office. But in truth, an inference either way, is a pitiful subtlety. The clause is neutral; its plain and simple meaning being, that the compensation shall not be diminished while the judge retains the office. It throws no light whatever on the question how he may lawfully cease to possess it.

Another point is pressed with great earnestness, and with greater plausibility. It is this, that the constitution must have intended to attach recompense to service, and cannot be supposed to have meant to bestow compensation, where, in the opinion of the legislature, no service was necessary. Without doubt, the constitution does contemplate service as the ground of compensation; but it likewise takes it for granted, that the legislature will be circumspect in the institution of offices; and especially, that it will be careful to establish none of a permanent nature, which will not be permanently useful. And with this general presumption, the constitution anticipates no material inconvenience from the permanency of judicial offices, connected with permanent emoluments. And though it should have foreseen that cases might happen, in which the service was not needed, yet there is no difficulty whatever in the supposition, that it was willing to encounter the trivial contingent evil of having to maintain a few superfluous officers, in order to obtain the immense good of establishing and securing the independence of the courts of justice. A readiness of the officer to render service to the will of the government, is the consideration as to him for continuing the compensation. But the essential inducement is the public utility incident to the independency of the judicial character. As to the supposition of an enormous abuse of power, by creating a long list of sinecures, and a numerous host of pensioners; whenever such a thing shall happen, it will constitute one of those extreme cases, which, on the principle of necessity, may authorise extra-constitutional remedies. But these are cases, which can never be appealed to, for the interpretation of any constitution, which, in meting out the power of the government, must be supposed to adjust them on the presumption of a fair execution.

A further topic of argument is that our doctrine would equally restrain the legislature from abolishing offices held during pleasure. But this is not true. The two things stand on different ground. First, the executive has such an agency in the enacting of laws, that as a general rule, the displacement cannot happen against his pleasure. Second, the pleasure of the president, in all cases not particularly excepted, is understood to be subject to the direction of the law. Third, an officer during pleasure, having merely a revocable interest, the abolition of his office is no infringement of his right. In substance he is a tenant at the will of the government, liable to be discontinued by the executive organ, in the form of a removal; by the legislative in the form of an abolition of the office. These different considerations reconcile the legislative authority to abolish, with the prerogative of the chief magistrate to remove, and with the temporary right of individual, to hold. And, therefore, there is no reason against the exercise of such an authority; nothing to form an exception to the general competency of the legislative power to provide for the public welfare. Very different is the case as to the judges. The most persuasive motives of public policy, the safety of liberty itself, require that the judges shall be independent of the legislative body; in order to maintain effectually the separation between the several departments. The provision that their compensation shall not be diminished, is a clear constitutional indication, that their independence was intended to be guarded against the legislature. The express declaration that they shall hold their offices during good behaviour, that is, upon a condition dependent on themselves, is repugnant to the hypothesis, that they shall hold at the mere pleasure of others. Provisions, which profess to confer rights upon individuals, are always entitled to a liberal interpretation in support of the rights, and ought not, without necessity, to receive an interpretation subversive of them. Provisions, which respect the organization of a co-ordinate branch of the government, ought to be construed in such a manner, as to procure for it stability and efficiency, rather than in such a manner as render it weak, precarious, and dependent. These various and weighty reasons serve to establish strong lines of discrimination between judicial and other officers; and to prove that no inference can be drawn from the power of the legislature as to the latter, which will be applicable to the former.

One more defence of this FORMIDABLE CLAIM, is attempted to be drawn from the example of the judiciary establishment of Great Britain. It is observed that this establishment, the theme of copious eulogy on account of the independence of the judges, places those officers upon a footing far less firm than will be that of the judges of the United States, even admitting the right of congress to abolish their offices, by abolishing the courts, of which they are members: And as one proof of the assertion it is mentioned; that the English judges are removable by the king, on the address of the two houses of parliament.

All this might be very true, and yet prove nothing as to what is or ought to be the construction of our constitution on this point. It is plain from the provision respecting compensation, that the framers of that constitution intended to prop the independence of our judges beyond the precautions, which have been adopted in England, in respect to the judges of that country; and the intention apparent in this particular, is an argument that the same spirit may have governed other provisions. Cogent reasons have been assigned, applicable to our system, and not applicable to the British system, for securing the independence of our judges against the legislative, as well as against the executive power.

It is alleged that the statute of Great Britain of the 13 of William III was the model, from which the framers of our constitution copied the provisions for the independence of our judiciary. It is certainly true, that the idea of the tenure of office during good behaviour, found in several of our constitutions, is borrowed from that source. But it is evident that the framers of our federal system did not mean to confine themselves to that model. Hence the restraint of the legislative discretion, as to compensation; hence the omission of the provision for the removal of the judges by the executive, on the application of the two branches of the legislature; a provision which has been imitated in some of the state governments.

This very omission affords no light inference that it was the intention to depart from the principle of making the judges removable from office, by the co-operation or interposition of the legislative body. Why else was this qualification of the permanent tenure of the office, which forms a conspicuous feature in the British statute, and in some of the state constitutions, dropped in the plan of the federal government?

The insertion of it in the British statute may also be supposed to have been dictated by the opinion, that without a special reservation, the words during good behaviour would have imported an irrevocable tenure. If so, the precaution will serve to fortify our construction.

But however it may seem in theory, in fact, the difference in the genius of the two governments would tend to render the independence of the judges more secure under the provision of the British statute, than it would be in this country upon the construction, which allows to congress the right to abolish them. The reason is this....From the constitution of the British monarchy, the thing chiefly to be apprehended is, an overbearing influence of the crown upon the judges. The jealousy of executive influence resting upon more powerful motives in that country, than in this, it may be expected to operate as a stronger obstacle there, than here; to an improper combination between the executive and legislative departments to invade the judiciary. Moreover, the British executive has greater means of resisting parliamentary controul, than an American executive has of resisting the controul of an American legislature; consequently the former would be in less danger than the latter, of being driven to a concurrence in measures hostile to the independence of the judges: And in both these ways, there would be greater security for the British than for the American judges.

Thus it is manifest that in every attitude, in which the subject has been placed, the argument is victorious against the power of congress to abolish the judges. But what, alas! avails the demonstration of this important truth? The fatal blow has been struck! It is no longer possible to arrest the rash and daring arm of power! Can the proof that it has acted without right, without warrant....can this heal the wound? Can it renovate the perishing constitution?....Yes, let us hope that this will be the case. Let us trust that the monitory voice of true patriotism will at length reach the ears of a considerate people, and will rouse them to a united and vigorous exertion for the restoration of their VIOLATED CHARTER; not by means either disorderly or guilty, but by means, which the constitution will sanction and reason approve. Surely this will be so....A people, who, describing tyranny at a distance, and guided only by the light of just principles, before they had yet felt the scourge of oppression, could nobly hazard all in the defence of their rights ;....a people, who sacrificing their prejudices on the altar of experience, and spurning the artifices of insidious demagogues, could, as a deliberate act of national reason, adopt and establish for themselves a constitution, which bid fair to immortalize their glory and their happiness, such a people, though misled for a period, will not be the final victims of a delusion, alike inauspicious to their reputation and to their welfare. They will not long forget the fame they have so justly merited, nor give the world occasion to ascribe to accident, what has hitherto been imputed to wisdom. They will disdain to herd with the too long list of degraded nations, who have bowed their necks to unworthy idols of their own creating....who, immolating their best friends at the shrine of falsehood, have sunk under the yoke of sycophants and betrayers. They will open their eyes, and see the precipice on which they stand! They will look around, and select from among the throng, the men, who have heretofore established a claim to their confidence ; the solid basis of able and faithful service ; and they will, with indignation and scorn, banish from their favour the wretched impostors, who, with honeyed lips and guilty hearts, are luring them to destruction! Admonished by the past, and listening again to the counsels of real friends, they will make a timely retreat from the danger, which threatens....they will once more arrange themselves under the banners of the constitution ; with anxious care will repair the breaches that have been made, and will raise new mounds against the future assaults of open or secret enemies!

LUCIUS CRASSUS.

The following is preserved as a map of the folly and madness of the times. It is a record of republican puerility. Extract of a letter from a gentleman at Washington, to the editor of the Gazette of the United States.

"THE ministerialists here are in a most distressed situation. Mr. Giles and Mr. Mason have both gone home, each, it is said, with the patriotic intention of becoming governor of Virginia. Unless they speedily return, it is believed that the president's sect in the house of representatives will be obliged to relinquish the goodly work of reform, for want of sufficient acquaintance with business to mature their plans, and carry them into execution. They complain bitterly, that the gentlemen in the minority only point out their absurdities, without helping to correct them. Mr. Randolph, the chairman of the committee of ways and means, complained so piteously of this want of assistance, upon the bill which he reported for repealing the internal taxes, that Mr. Goddard of Connecticut was induced to bring forward an amendment, which Mr. Randolph voted for, in the place of one which he himself had introduced, and which he acknowledged incompetent to the purpose.

"The scene exhibited on the 21st, upon the amendments offered by Mr. Dennis, was diverting beyond description. The federal republicans resolved to use every effort in their power, to make part of the contemplated reduction of revenue fall upon those articles of necessity, which are exclusively used by the labouring part of the community ; the president's sect labouring with equal assiduity, to prevent these efforts from appearing in the proceedings of the house. For this purpose, they voted against an express rule of the house, and against the decision of their own speaker, to divide the motion of Mr. Dennis, for striking out the words "sales at auction," and inserting, in place of them, the word coffee. After rejecting the motion for striking out, they were thrown into a most ludicrous perplexity, on the question of inserting. They maintained that no vote could be taken, inasmuch as no place was designated for the insertion. The speaker said, that a vote must be taken upon both parts of a motion which had been divided ; and the federal republicans told them, that, if they had reduced the subject to nonsense and absurdity, it was their own handy work, and that as they insisted upon cutting up the motion, they were now at liberty to dispose of the parts according to their own taste.

"Mr. Nicholson, in great agitation, insisted that he had a right to be informed, either by the speaker or the clerk, what should be done with coffee, and where he must put it.

"The speaker again replied, that the question upon inserting coffee in the first section must be put.

"Some gentleman proposed to insert it between the words pleasurable and carriages, so as to read, pleasurable coffee carriages. The perplexity every moment increased, when Mr. Dennis rose and said, if the motion for inserting the word were carried, it would then be in order to bring up another motion, by which the place of insertion might be settled.

"One of the gentlemen who voted for a division of the question, then rose and declared, that he found himself in so great embarrassment in consequence of the division, that he thought it impossible to proceed, and moved a reconsideration of the vote.

"It was very evident, by this time, that the ministerial sect were acting without their instructions, and knew not what to do. Their ultimate expedient was to call for an adjournment. The motion was lost, only 35 rising in favour of it.

"The motion for reconsidering then recurred. It was asked by Mr. Bayard, whether that was a question of order, and of course one which could not be debated. The speaker asked for time to look at the rules before making a decision. An adjournment was again called for, and carried."

LITERARY NOTICE.

BIOGRAPHY OF WASHINGTON.

IT is for the interest of literature, and for the honour of our country, that none but an authentic and correctly written biography of Washington, should receive the patronage of Americans. Such a biography is now in the work-shop of an artist, eminent for his erudition, and possessed of the materials which were collected by Washington himself. The public are therefore requested to defer subscriptions to the daily proposals for lives of this great man, as the editor has authority to state, that an accurate and elegant performance on this subject will very shortly be presented to the world.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A WAG, lately describing an elephant, remarked, that this sagacious animal took care never to be robbed, for he always carried his trunk before him.

A gentleman, distinguished for his skill in painting, was t'other day applied to for his opinion of a dashing sign of Mr. Jefferson, just exhibited at the door of a miserable pot house, kept in the suburbs, by one of the lowest of the people. The connoisseur immediately answered, that the painter might do signs, but he would never do wonders.

Our political time-servers, who are curious to investigate the history of their family, will do well to meditate the following passage:

The duke of Savoy, one of the ancestors of the present duke, took, indifferently, sometimes the part of France, and sometimes that of Spain. For this purpose, he had a juste au corps, or close coat, white on one side, and scarlet on the other ; so that when he meant to declare himself for France, he wore the white outside ; and when for Spain, he turned it, and wore the red. This is the origin of the proverb, Tourner cassaque, or turn your coat.

The following faithful descriptions will give our countrymen some idea of what is meant by the term hoax, so liberally employed in all the modern countries :

The trade of swindling was never at a higher pitch in London than it is at present. Almost every part of the town is beset by these harpica.

A FEW SPECIMENS OF SWINDLING.

MONEY LENT.

"Persons in want of money, may have the same to any amount, on bond, note, or by way of annuity, at an hour's notice."....The parties are not to expect more than one twentieth part of the value of their deposit ; and, in certain cases, may probably be plundered of the whole.

PARTNER WANTED.

"Any person having four or five thousand pounds at his disposal, will be taken into partnership, in a very lucrative business, where he may, with very little trouble, make 20 per cent. of his capital."....The advertiser, when he procures the new partner's money, becomes a bankrupt ; and, by fictitious books, and fictitious creditors, get his certificate, and sets up in business on the credulity of the deluded man who sought for 20 per cent.

A WIFE.

"A gentleman of property may be introduced to a young lady, with a capital fortune at her own disposal. A handsome premium is expected, by way of bond to the advertiser, payable on the day of marriage."....The young lady to be married is a jilt, not worth sixpence, at a boarding-school, where she passes for an immense fortune. The ceremony takes place, and the bridegroom is made to pay perhaps 1000l. for a wife not worth a groat. Such things are.

FIVE THOUSAND POUNDS WANTED,

"On landed property, in a registered county. None but principals will be treated with." The estate is mortgaged for the sum, and the money paid ; but when application is made for the interest, it is discovered that the party who borrowed was not the owner of the estate ; that the whole was a fraud ; and that the swindler and money are gone to America.

MARRIED,

At Beverley, Mr. John Thistle, aged 18, to Miss Mehitable Clarke, aged 38. Had old Ben. Franklin recorded this marriage in his journal, he would have probably immortalized this curious connection, by some such descriptive doggerel as the following :

Experience will soon tell this tender THISTLE,
That he has paid too dearly for his whistle.

[Farmer's Museum.

A curious bet has been lately made, of who is the most gallant man of fashion in London, each party engaging to name the man. A certain person was named on the one side ; on the other an exiled prince. Every one in company stared that his highness should be named ; but as it could not be denied that he sleeps with every fine woman, with whom he gets into company, the wager was decided accordingly.

As the practice of stealing letters and firing houses begins to abound, we cannot doubt that this is the most brilliant period of the history of the United States, and that our citizens are improving and perfecting their republican institutions, as our worthy governor told the legislature long since. Nay, it appears that the perfectibility of man is in the way of being carried as high as the new philosophy itself admits. The late fires, forgeries, &c. afford proof that our republican citizens are very active in exercising the rights of man.

We are quite dull in Philadelphia, since we have been deprived of the company of Mr. Duane; although since his preferment as the national stationer, he entertains us with his publications at Washington, and his extracts from stolen letters, whenever Mr. Cheat'em is successful in his operations.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO JAMES A. NEAL,

PRINCIPAL OF THE YOUNG LADIES' ACADEMY, ON HIS ORATION ON MUSIC, DELIVERED BEFORE THE HARMONIC SOCIETY, ON THURSDAY EVENING, THE 18TH INSTANT.

HAIL, friend of Science! friend of Virtue, hail!
Whose pow'rs o'er prejudice and age prevail,
Music, thro' time's long-winding tracks to trace;
To lead her forth in her celestial grace;
To show what angel charms in her combine;
To prove her, like her origin, divine;
To bring her from Idolatry's abode,
And dedicate her to THE LIVING GOD.

I view, pourtray'd by thee, the heavenly maid,
In more than Fancy's richest robes array'd;....
An ever-blooming wreath adorns her head;
Innum'rous beauties o'er her person spread;
Immortal glories round her beam serene;
Divine expression animates her mien;
Love, joy, and rapture triumph in her eyes,
Whose radiance gilds the circumambient skies;
While thousand forms ethereal near her play,
Enchanted by her soul-subduing lay;
And all around breathes more than Eden's blooms,
Its sweet delightfulness and rich perfumes.

Well hast thou shewn....all nature owns her sway;
That all the elements her power obey;
That all inanimate creation join
To sound the Maker's praise in notes divine:
Well hast thou shewn, that her dominion vast Shall still o'er animated matter last,
Long as th'informing principle remains
To feel and to repeat th'inspiring strains.
But when thy warm description holds to view
The hymns, the anthems of God's chosen few,
Music in majesty divine appears,
And fills with melody the list'ning spheres:
Snatch'd back to the primæval years of Time,
We glow with feelings and with thoughts sublime;
In fond idea catch th'enraptur'd song,
That lifts from earth to join th'angelic throng,
And chaunt with them the sweet symphonious lay,
That "wakes to ecstasy" the realms of day,

Such, such, indeed, is Music's form divine,
Her pow'r, her force, by Heaven's all-wise design,
As one sweet link of that blest chain, which binds
Man to his Maker, souls t'etherial minds;
Which by Religion brightened, worlds shall see,
Close and more close shall draw, to all eternity,

Then, friend of science, friend of virtue hail!
May noble efforts, such as thine, prevail,
The love of SACRED MUSIC to inspire,
And rouse the slumb'ring spirit of the lyre;....
That pure devotion may with knowledge join
In adoration to THE NAME DIVINE:
In hymns and anthems, symphonies and lays,
And all the sweet variety of praise.

THE TIPLING PHILOSOPHERS.

BY JAMES H. BEATTIE,

Father Hodge* had his pipe and his dram,
And at night, his cloy'd thirst to awaken,
He was serv'd with a rasher of ham,
Which procur'd him the surname of Bacon.
He has shown, that, though logical science,
And dry theory oft prove unhandy,
Honest truth will ne'er set at defiance
Experiment aided by brandy.

Des Cartes bore a musket, they tell us,
Ere he wish'd or was able to write,
And was noted among the brave fellows,
Who are bolder to tittle than fight.
Of his system, the cause and design,
We no more can be posed to explain:
The materies subtilis was wine,
And the vortices whirl'd in his brain.

Old Hobbes, as his name plainly shews,
At at hob nob was frequently tried;
That all virtue from selfishness rose
He believ'd, and all laughter from pride†.
The truth of his creed he would brag on,
Smoko his pipe, murder Homer, and quaff‡,
Then starting, as drunk as a dragon,
In the pride of his heart he would laugh.

Sir Isaac discovered, it seems,
The nature of colour and light,
In remarking the tremulous beams
That swam on his wandering sight.
Ever sapient, sober tho' seldom,
From experience attraction he found,
By observing, when no one upheld him,
That his wise head fell souse on the ground.

As to Berkely's philosophy....he has Left his poor pupils nought to inherit
But a swarm of deceitful ideas
Kept, like other monsters, in spirit||.
For drinkers can't think what's the matter,
That their health does not mend but decline,
Why they take but some wine to their water,
He took but some water to wine.

One Mandeville once, or Man-devil,
(Either name you may give as you please)
By a brain ever brooding on evil,
Hatch'd a monster call'd Fable of Bees.
Vice, said he, aggrandizes a people,
By this let my conduct be view'd;
I swagger, swear, guzzle, and tittle,
And h— ye, 'tis all for your good.

‡ Hobbes was a great smoker, and wrote what some have been pleased to call a translation of Homer.

 Private vices public benefits.

D— H— ate a swinging great dinner,
And grew every day fatter and fatter;
And yet this huge bulk of a sinner
Said there was neither spirit nor matter.
Now there's no sober man in the nation,
Who such nonsense could write, speak or think.
It follows, by fair demonstration,
That he philosophized in his drink.

As a smuggler even P— could sin;
Who in hopes the poor guager of frightening,
While he fill'd the case bottle with gin,
Swore he fill'd them with thunder and lightning*.
In his cups, when Locke's laid on the shelf,
Could he speak, he would frankly confess it
t'ye,
That unable to manage himself,
He put his whole trust in necessity.

If the young in rash folly engage,
How closely continues the evil!
Old Franklin retain'd as a sage,
The thirst he acquir'd when a devil†.
That charging drives fire from a phial,
It was natural for him to think,
After finding from many a trial,
That drought may be kindled by drink.

A certain high priest could explain‡,
How the soul is but nerve at the most,
And how Milton had glands in his brain,
That secreted Paradise Lost.
And sure it is what they deserve,
Of such theories if I aver it,
They are not even dictates of nerve,
But mere suggestions of claret.

Our Holland philosophers say gin
Is the true philosophical drink,
As it made Dr. H—y imagine
That to shake is the same as to think||.
For while drunkenness throb'd in his brain,
The sturdy materialist chose (O fye!)
To believe its vibrations not pain,
But wisdom and downright philosophy.

Ye sages, who shine in my verse,
On my labours with gratitude think,
Which condemn not the faults they rehearse,
But impute all your sin to your drink.
In drink, poets, philosophers, mob, err,
Then excuse if my satire e'er nips ye,
When I praise think me prudent and sober,
If I blame be assur'd I am tipsy.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XII.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

I APPROACH you with the veneration and respect due to the tutor and to the sage. I seek consolation from your advice. I implore you to be the mediator between the ladies and myself; to reinstate me in their good opinion, by persuading them, that the traits in my character, which they have uncharitably termed coquetry, and fickleness, and whim, if they be not legitimate shoots of the tree of sensibility....if they be not virtues, are at least the honest errors of a warm and feeling heart. From the sketches which I shall give to you, my character may, with ease, be pourtrayed. I presume the ladies will forgive me, if, in reciting some of the events of my life, I avoid the mention of real names.

It is certain, that, from the want of proper regulation, and continued reflection, the virtues of the heart may be the parents of innumerable ills. Hospitality may cherish the adder in her mansion....Economy may wear the garb of Avarice....Prudence may create a dangerous timidity....Charity may profusely and ruinously squander her stores....and the warm and affectionate heart, in its intercourse with female society, may assume the manners of fickleness and levity, and its possessor reproachingly be termed a coquette. If this consideration lead the world to form their opinions on the merits or demerits of actions, from an investigation of their sources, the ladies, as well as I, may benefit be it.

With due respect for the opinions of Helvetius, Nature made me as I am. She gave me an ardent disposition, and a warm heart, which led me into female society, long before I understood my Latin grammar. I do not recollect the period when I was not in love, nor the time when I was out of it. I well remember, that, at the age of eight or nine years, my heart was stolen by a neighbour's child, about my own age. The ardent declarations of attachment as frequently warmed my lips, and the sanguine anticipations of the joys of wedlock were as frequently indulged by me at that time, as at any later period. My "sweetheart," however, removed to a distant street, and I found absence to be a cure for love. But I was not formed to be out of love. I was again enslaved, and again the removal to another street broke my fetters.

Thus I continued till the age of seventeen, ever living on the smiles of some neighbouring angel. Love had its bliss and its agony, its jealousy and its cares. If the preference of my charmer for another occasionally racked my soul, yet I have felt what lovers alone feel, when permitted to walk by her side, in our juvenile rambles; when my rose-bud was accepted in preference of another; or when, in our infant sports, to redeem her pawn, I was selected to be kissed.

'Till this period, however, I had made to no one an offer of marriage, nor can I say, with certainty, that it had ever been expected. But, at this time, a charming girl soon came to reside in our neighbourhood, and soon formed an acquaintance with the girls of her own age. Her flowing locks and soft blue eyes enslaved my susceptible heart, before I had spoken to her. I teased one of my female acquaintances to introduce me to her, and on a fine evening in July, I sat by her, for the first time, on the steps of her father's door. The hours passed rapidly, and, when my introducer rose to go home, I suffered some one else to wait on her, and remained behind. This, of course, was called fickle and impolite; but it made no impression on me, as what I had lost in the esteem of one, I had gained in that of the other. I was now happy. Each day I walked by the house of my charmer, and each evening stopped at her door, if she was sitting there, for I did not dare to knock and ask for her. A year flew on rapidly, and I was ever in her presence. I watched her when she went to school in the morning, and her return at noon. When she visited at night, if I was not invited, I walked up and down before the house for hours, that I might go home with her.

She became acquainted with a young stranger, and I began to grow jealous. I soon perceived that he was a dangerous rival. In his father's garden were roses, and every morning and evening some were plucked for her. I, alas! had none to offer, and I saw, with torment, that his company was anxiously expected....that he was welcomed with smiles, and I had lost my charms. My feelings and my impetuosity were foes to suspense. I watched one evening when my rival had gone to a ball; I went to Maria, and declared my attachment, in unqualified terms; I felt what I said, and vehemently swore her rejection of me would be my death. But she was deaf to my love; the roses of my rival had won her heart; she hinted that her father wished to lock up the house; I departed, and, for a few days, was miserable.

A fortnight afterwards, a new face stole my heart, and Maria was forgotten. I wondered what I had seen in her to admire; I thought her proud and homely, foolish and fickle. Novelty gave me strong recommendations to my new acquaintance, and her old beaux were deserted for me. But, as novelty decked me with charms, so those charms vanished with the flight of novelty. A new face destroyed the impression I had made, and, determined to subject myself no more to the mortification of a refusal, I left her house in a pet, and was called a coquette by the ladies.

Four or five years have passed since; but the events of those years have been nearly similar. The same disposition still remains to tease and torment me. I am captivated with a new face, and rashly believe it to be the lovely index of the mind. The first interviews are subject to the influence of this impression; I become immediately a daily visiter. But I am soon abandoned to the female rage for novelty, or I discover faults and follies I had not expected, and cease my visits. The ladies believe and term me a coquette, fickle as the wind.

My dear Mr. Saunter, I wish and beseech you to explain to the ladies the motives of my actions; I wish you to persuade them, that I am not a coquette, but am too easily and suddenly captivated by their charms, and that, if my acquaintance with them is short, it is my misfortune, and not my fault; I wish you to tell them, that my disposition will not suffer me to share their smiles with any one, and that if I do not possess their whole affections, I cannot visit them at all. Tell them that I would rather be hated, than treated indifferently. The latter is a source of continual mortification, while the former, though it may for a moment grieve me, yet carries with it its own antidote,

"For grief is proud, and makes the owner stout."

Tell them, I pray you, that my friendship is mistaken for love. The frequency of my visits, the ardour of my conversation, and the particularity of my manners, where I am pleased, though resulting solely from friendship, are mistaken by the ladies for love, and offers of marriage are anxiously expected. If they be not made, I am treated with indifference, my visits are discontinued, and I am called a coquette; while there are others, who visit at the same house for years, and are ever treated with civility. I beseech you, Mr. Saunter, to advise me under what regimen I must place my disposition, so as to be on terms of intimacy and friendship with the ladies, without raising false expectations, or subjecting myself and my pecuniary situation to the busy and malicious scrutiny of aunts and sisters, and all the old maids in the neighbourhood.

Yours, &c.

SENSITIVE.

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Mr. OLDSCHOOL,

I was really amused, and I hope instructed, in perusing the profound observations of your correspondent Leander, in number 11 of the Port Folio, upon the insensibility of the ladies of Philadelphia. He appears so admirably calculated, from his nervous and energetic style, to call forth all our sex's tender sensibilities, that I ardently wish he will continue his literary productions for our special benefit. I perfectly agree with the sensitive Leander, that the exquisite performance of Mr. Green and others ought not to pass unnoticed, and hope, in paying so close an attention to discover whether the dear little ladies are properly affected, Leander does not forget his own tear of manly sensibility, so justly due to the shrine of merit.

By the bye, dear Mr. Oldschool, we ladies did expect now and then to see something else besides our faults pourtray'd in your paper, and did hope to have found in you somewhat of a champion, as well as monitor. But alas! you permit us to be essay'd, riddled, rebused, and epigrammatized; ridiculed by dull wits, and snarled at by sullen ones, without once taking up our cause and defending our venial follies. To be sure, your Lounger now and then gives a lash to the fashionable and current absurdities of the other sex, but still I perceive an evident partiality to the beaux. As the lion said to the man, let us be the carvers, and we will make the woman superior to the man. One would imagine you to be a rusty, musty old bachelor, that have in your time experienced the effects of some cruel beauty's inconstancy, and are secretly enjoying all the malignant spleen of your Leanders, &c. &c.

But I know you to be the opposite of this character, and that you look kindly on us; I therefore live in anxious expectation of seeing these imperitents taken down for their insolent temerity.

I have half a mind, Mr. Oldschool, to invite you myself to one of those ridiculous entertainments, called tea parties, where you can judge for yourself on which side the deficiency of entertainment lies. We are sometimes told that we chatter like magpies, without knowing the meaning of a word we utter. Then some wit amuses himself by comparing us to a number of pretty images set round a toy-shop. Now, pray whose fault is this? I appeal to you, as a man of candour, in the name of all the fair sex.

An evening party generally consists of a pretty equal number of both sexes, the ladies, as has been said, sitting, in prim order, round the room, whilst the young gentlemen are amusing themselves in picking their teeth, running their fingers through their hair, to give it a fashionable déangement, or lolling back in a chair, both legs extended at full length, with the hands most gracefully disposed in the pockets of their pantaloons, and the shoulders thrust up to the ears.

What a "curst bore" it would be called by those pretty boys, to have their meditations interrupted. If a young lady should happen to accost one of these elegant figures, it is a considerable time ere she can be answered, as the young gentleman must first dispose of the mouthful of delicious juice he has been busily extracting, from a deposit secreted in one of the cheeks. The young lounge then, with a vacant stare, commences, what he calls conversation. "Speak to me, ma'am? Beg your pardon, ma'am....feel so devilish stupid...hav'nt heard a good thing to-night...." "Except what you have said yourself," replies the fair immoveable. The young gentleman, with a he, he, he, readily answers, "Thank you, good ma'am, I owe you one."

After this brilliant exertion of colloquial wit, he hides himself in the knot which is generally made by the gentlemen in the middle of the room, or before the fire, where they form so strong a phalanx, that none but an amazon would dare to pass through them, which she must absolutely do, to get a peep at the fire. I sometimes pay attention to the eloquent debates of this formidable body, in hopes of hearing something instructive. But Lord help us! it is all a confusion of abusive politics, absurd wagers, and impertinent observations on the female part of the company, and it generally ends in an adjournment to Hardie's, to eat oysters, crack a bottle, play loo, and bully the waiter. Such is the majority of the young gentlemen of the present day, and no exaggerated picture.

I am, Mr. Oldschool, no disappointed spinster, or neglected widow, that presumes thus to arraign the lords of the creation, but am one of those little immoveables, who, you find, has not been altogether idle in observation, and who has, although rather awkwardly I fear, taken upon her the defence of her "fair countrymen."

I am aware that my observations rather reply to strictures on our sex, which have at former times appeared in your paper, than to the piece which has immediately excited them,—I shall, perhaps, at a future opportunity take the liberty of bringing to your notice, the conduct of our beaux at the Theatre, where they are not indeed immoveable, but constantly rambling about the house and are to be seen in box, pit, and gallery, during the same evening,....at one time laying on the benches of the stage box; then smoking in the lobby, then in the pit, with their backs to the performers, staring round the house,....and finally thumping with their huge sticks either in the gallery or upper row of boxes,....This for a hint of what may come.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF JOHN CARTERET.

JOHN CARTERET, earl Granville, an eminent English statesman, born in 1690, was the eldest son of George lord Carteret, whose death left him heir to his title before he was five years old. He was educated at Westminster school, and Christ-church college, Oxford; and through his attention and abilities brought away an uncommon share of the classical knowledge for which those seats of learning are celebrated. High principles in government, and a fondness for convivial pleasures, are also said to have accompanied him thence, and to have characterised him through life. He was introduced into the House of Peers, in 1711, and immediately distinguished himself by zeal for the Hanover succession, which acquired him the notice of George I, by whom he was successively raised to various posts of honour. He was a forcible and eloquent public speaker, and supported all the measures of administration during that reign. In 1719, he went ambassador-extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the queen of Sweden, and mediated the peace between that crown and Denmark, which put an end to the troubles of the north of Europe. In 1721, he became Mr. Craggs's successor as secretary of state, and proved an able parliamentary support to the conduct of the ministry, defending with vigour their boldest measures. He accompanied the king to Hanover, in 1723, and on his return joined in various conferences on matters of importance at the Hague. In the next year he was appointed to the high and arduous post of lord-lieutenant of Ireland, which kingdom was then in a state of great discontent, not a little fomented by Swift's famous Drapier's Letters. Swift, who esteemed lord Carteret for his manners and learning, expostulated with him on his prosecution of the printer of those letters. Lord Carteret ingenuously replied by a line of Virgil (which perhaps may serve for a sound apology for many of the measures of that whole reign) "Regni novitas me talia cogit Moliri.".... "The unconfirmed state of the throne compels me to make use of these means." After an administration which upon the whole proved satisfactory to the nation, he returned to England, in 1726, and continued an eminent supporter of the government. Soon after the accession of George II, in 1727, he was again appointed to the viceroyalty of Ireland, where, with the interval of a visit to England, he conducted the affairs of government till 1730, with great success, employing his social talents to conciliate parties, and maintaining a good correspondence with several of the tory party. On this occasion, Swift wrote an humorous Vindication of Lord Carteret from the Charge of favouring none but Tories, High-churchmen, and Jacobites. From the time of his return, for reasons of which we are not informed, lord Carteret became a violent opposer of the administration conducted by sir Robert Walpole; and in the course of his many speeches in the parliamentary contest, he was led to maintain maxims and hold language very different from his own whilst a member of government. He opened, in the House of Peers, the famous motion of February, 1741, for an address to remove Walpole from the king's presence and councils, and exerted all his eloquence on the occasion. When, in 1742, the dismissal of this minister was effected, lord Carteret again became a secretary of state, and again supported measures similar to those he had lately been censuring. In 1744, on the death of his mother, he succeeded to the titles of viscount Carteret and earl Granville. It is unnecessary to follow him through all the subsequent political changes of his life, in which he was sometimes high in the favour of his sovereign, and sometimes was obliged to give way to more powerful interests. He died on January 2, 1763, in the seventy-third year of his age. The natural talents and acquirements of earl Granville appear to have been sufficient to place him very high among political characters, but his ardent, enterprising, and overbearing temper, fitted him rather for being the minister of an absolute monarch, than of a limited sovereign. He was ambitious and fond of sway, but neither mercenary nor vindictive; his genius was lofty and fertile, and his confidence and presumption were equal to it. It has been said of him, that he never doubted, His own literary abilities made him an encourager of learned men; and he was the particular patron of Dr. Taylor the celebrated Grecian, and of Dr. Bentley. In social life he was pleasant, good-humoured, frank, and bacchanalian.

TO THE PUBLIC.

Princeton, March 18th, 1807.

The burning of the college edifice in this place on the sixth instant, has been announced in all the public papers. This melancholy occurrence having occasioned a meeting of the trustees of the college of New-Jersey, they have found it to be an indispensable obligation arising out of the trust confided to them, to make a representation to the public, in behalf of the institution committed to their care. In doing this they are deeply sensible that every consideration, both of duty and interest, dictates, that they should exercise a peculiar caution not to depart from the simplicity of truth.

The college of New-Jersey was originally founded with a leading view to cherish the principles and extend the influence of evangelical piety. At the same time it was hoped and expected, that as the spirit of genuine religion is ever favourable to the interests of civil society, many warm and able advocates of these interests would be nurtured in the bosom of this institution. We trust it may be asserted, without arrogance or vanity, that these views and hopes have not proved fallacious or extravagant. Whoever will look through the several departments of public life at present, or review the eventful scenes which our country has witnessed for half a century past, may be convinced that this college counts among those who have been most distinguished in sacred and in secular office, a number of her sons which she need not blush to compare with those of any sister institution.

One principal cause of the usefulness of this seminary, has been its complete independence on legislative influence and controul, and its dependance, as complete, on the benevolence and favour of an impartial public; which could alone be secured by its intrinsic merit, and its constant and vigorous efforts to render itself worthy of voluntary individual patronage....Previously to the American revolution it was, to say the least, commonly no object of favour with the government of the province. By the depreciation of the continental money, and other events which took place during the revolution, the funds of the corporation, always inconsiderable, were nearly annihilated; while the buildings in their possession, by being alternately occupied by the contending armies, were reduced almost to a state of ruin. Since the revolution, the legislature of New-Jersey have made a grant of eighteen hundred pounds, appropriated by law to the repairing of the buildings, to the increase of the library, and to the provision of a philosophical apparatus....This is all the legislative aid that we ever have received; perhaps that we ever shall obtain.

Under every discouragement and difficulty, however, the institution has not only been supported and continued, but has been able in some measure to retrieve its losses. By the exertion of its friends and the small public bounty which was conferred, the buildings were put in tenable repair, the library and philosophical apparatus became respectable, the faculty were comfortably provided for, the number of students was greatly increased, and all the future prospects of the college began to brighten. But alas! in one fatal day they were all clouded with the darkest gloom. The fair edifice, erected by the liberality and consecrated by the prayers of our pious and public spirited predecessors, was totally consumed, and three thousand volumes of valuable books, with much private property of the students, perished in the flames. Under this inauspicious and afflictive event, which the providence of a holy God has permitted to take place, we are humbled and mourn.* But can we, ought we, so far to despond, as to suffer the establishment to become extinct? No, we are rather resolved, relying on that aid which has always hitherto been extended to us in the time of distress, to meet with increasing efforts the increasing billows of adversity. Our funds are indeed small;....they are as nothing when compared with our present necessities. But we are confident we have friends: And when we recollect how much more numerous, as well as how much more wealthy, the individuals are who are likely to patronize the college now, than those were who established it at first;....when

*The circumstances which attended the burning of the college were such as to leave little doubt that it was the effect of design; but though every effort has been used for that purpose, we have not yet been able to ascertain the incendiary.

We recollect, above all, the pure designs, the ardent vows, the unshaken faith of those who laid its foundations, and call to mind that it has in fact been eminently blessed as a nursery both for church and state, we cannot distrust the event of our efforts. We cannot but hope that this temporary calamity is even to be over-ruled for a lasting benefit. Entertaining these sentiments, we have determined to recall the scattered students, to set about the rebuilding of the college without delay, and to cast ourselves on the care of divine providence, and on the public liberality, to bear us through.

But realizing for ourselves, and begging our friends to realize likewise, that confidence of success in an arduous undertaking without the most active and vigorous exertions to secure it, is rather weakness and presumption than any commendable or virtuous quality, we feel the necessity of using our utmost endeavours to obtain benefactions for the college. We have accordingly taken measures to open subscriptions for this purpose; and we beg for a candid indulgence while we address a few words

I....TO THE FRIENDS OF RELIGION.

To those who are comprehended in this description, our college owed its original establishment; and we trust that the friends of religion now, will not be found less munificent than those who possessed this character fifty years ago. Your means of promoting laudable designs are greatly increased....Far from us be the injurious supposition that your disposition to do good is diminished. On you, we avow it explicitly, is our principal reliance. We have always endeavoured to make the institution for which we solicit, a fountain of those principles which to you are the dearest and the most sacred; and these endeavours we mean to continue even with increased zeal. We proposed to recommence the instructions of the college with new regulations, calculated to secure more effectually than ever, the moral and religious conduct of the youth entrusted to our care. We aim to make this institution an assylum for pious youth, so that in this day of general and lamentable depravity, parents may send their children to it with every reasonable expectation of safety and advantage. This we know will create us some enemies; but your patronage and prayers will, in every view, be more than a compensation for their hostility. We never indeed, have been so attached to the dogmas of any religious sect, as to impose them on our pupils....To all past experience we appeal as evidence, that religious intolerance has never existed here. But religious principle always has been, and we hope always will be, cherished and guarded with care and vigilance. To the friends of religion, then, we look, to enable us to erect a bulwark against the assaults of impiety and in defence of the pure gospel of Jesus Christ.

II....TO THE FRIENDS OF SCIENCE.

Among those who merit this appellation we hope to find many of our warmest advocates and valuable patrons: For to all the friends of science, wherever educated, all her interests we know must be dear. In whatever sect, or in whatever religion, science prospers, men of science always rejoice. Rendered liberal by their own attainments, they can even abstract from the characters of others what is offensive to themselves, and still prize and esteem intelligence, talents and learning, wherever they are found. From you, gentlemen, we ask some pecuniary assistance to enable us to cultivate the sciences, in an institution which has not been the least distinguished in our country, either for zeal or success in fostering them. Freed from sordid views and feelings by your education and habits of thinking, you will afford us cheerfully the assistance which may be proper....To press the subject on you would be impertinent.

III....TO THE FRIENDS OF CIVIL LIBERTY.

Of those who are eminently entitled to this designation, many have received their education with us, and many more have always regarded us with kindness. In an hour of peculiar necessity we now solicit your benevolent interposition in our favour. A report we are informed, has gone forth, that this institution is chargeable with political intolerance. The justness of this charge we absolutely deny. So far as the demands of religion can be supposed by any to interfere with those of a political nature, we must indeed admit, nay we are forward to declare, that we shall sacredly regard the former, however they may be imagined to militate with the latter. But this declaration we are confident will be considered by good men of all parties as perfectly consistent with an unqualified denial of political intolerance. No pupil with us has ever been questioned on the subject of his political creed, nor withheld from a full and free avowal of his sentiments, nor received any censure or disapprobation for making known his opinions either in speech or writing. We trust, therefore, that neither this unfounded rumour, nor the insinuations of any individuals hostile to the college, will be permitted to operate to its disadvantage at this critical and necessitous juncture of its concerns. It fears no scrutiny on this topic. It makes some pretensions to services rendered to the social and political interests of the United States, and it now asks for the means of rendering more.

IV....TO THE ALUMNI OF THE COLLEGE.

We esteem it as a precious proof, both of our own fidelity, and of the benefit which you have received in this institution, that your zealous attachment to the place of your education is acknowledged by all, and thought by many to be singular. Our expectations from you on this occasion are sanguine. We know that you cannot contemplate Nassau-hall as a heap of ruins without a deep excitement of your sensibility, and a ready exertion of all your faculties to restore your alma mater to her former respectability. It will be much in your power to do this. Occupying stations of honour and distinction, possessing wealth or influence, scattered through all the populous cities, towns and districts of the union....what cannot you effect? It is surely not too much for us to say that we calculate on your taking the lead in promoting subscriptions wherever you are, and on your care to forward the amount whenever it shall be collected. Never did the college need your zeal and services so much as now, and we will not believe, that when it is in your power to render us essential assistance, your disposition will not be equal to your ability. If we were even reduced to the necessity of depending on you alone to restore our affairs, such is our reliance on the former children of our care, that we should hold it criminal to resign our hopes. But when we have only to ask that you should be examples to others, and lead and prompt the general benevolence, our hope rises into assurance of success.

V....TO THE WEALTHY AND BENEVOLENT OF EVERY DESCRIPTION.

We are not insensible that numerous donations are solicited from you for various charitable purposes within the smaller circles of society in which you are included, or by institutions with which you are immediately connected. But allow us likewise to remark or rather to repeat, that our college has no patronage but yours. It is your institution....you founded it; you have hitherto supported it; and when you withdraw your countenances it cannot exist. We wish not to be unduly importunate, and we feel that to solicit with earnestness and yet without meanness, is no easy task. But may we not say that among all the objects which demand your special regard, this college is almost on a footing with any other, and therefore that others ought not to claim your favours to the exclusion of this....Let us at least divide your liberality with them.

As our subscriptions are to be extensively circulated, we most of all deprecate the influence of an idea naturally suggested by such a circumstance; namely....That as many are to give, large sums of money will certainly be collected, and therefore, that each need give but a little, and indeed that it can be of no great importance if a number shall refuse to give at all....It is not obvious that in this way the very expectation that much will be received may prevent its reception? Let it be remembered, then, that between all speculative calculations about money, and the actual receipts, the difference is usually very great. Let it be remembered that this difference is commonly the greatest of all, when the basis of calculation is voluntary contribution. Let it be remembered that it is really a large sum that is necessary to repair our losses....Forty thousand dollars, will, we fear, fall considerably short of placing us on the same standing that we occupied before the late distressing conflagration of our property; and even then we were greatly embarrassed for want of funds. Many items are necessary to rise to the requisite amount....But we forbear. May that God who hath the hearts of all men in his hand dispose you to give, and then reward you for the gift with the richest of his blessings.

Signed by order, and in behalf of the board of trustees, by

JOSEPH BLOOMFIELD,
Governor of New-Jersey, and President, ex officio, of the Corporation.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

Their appetite for unusual pleasure, was in proportion to their former ferocity.

THERE are many ideas, which, as I have hinted in a former paper, we are apt, merely on poetical authority, to adopt as data, and to substitute the pleasing, but extravagant exuberance of a luxuriant fancy, for the convincing solidity of Historical demonstration. Among these, none perhaps recurs more frequently to our imagination, or strikes it more forcibly, than the primæval innocence of man. We inwardly reproach ourselves with degeneracy; and are chagrined, when, after having contemplated the beauties of so highly finished a picture, we cast our eyes on an imperfect sketch which suffers so much by the comparison.

A state of nature, however, when divested of its poetical ornaments, will be found to be by no means a state of innocence; and we shall perceive upon a more accurate inspection, that civilization, far from being prejudicial to the virtues of mankind, is in reality that fine polish which displays his exalted endowments to advantage; and effects the grand distinction between brute and human nature. The soul of man is so intimately blended with his passions, that Apathy is almost nonexistence! and even in the most sluggish and insensible, we discover some ruling appetite, some main spring, which seems to actuate the few ideas of his listless vacancy. To reduce these therefore from our tyrants to our assistants, and to convert to the purposes of an agreeable variety, what was originally the cause of a flagitious sameness in our actions is surely beneficial to the community. The vices of Nature are concentrated, but violent; those of civilization diffuse, but gentle. According therefore to the established political maxim, Divide and conquer, those of the latter being individually less powerful, are more easily subdued. To this it may be objected, that if the vices of the natural man are more violent, his virtues are at least of a superior nature; that obsequious insincerity is but a bad substitute for disinterested honesty; and that where courage and friendship are exchanged for policy and civility, however it may advance the abilities of mankind, it argues that their hearts are proportionably corrupted.

Specious as the names of these virtues are, that boasted honesty while it extended its influence to the immediate circle in which it moved, narrowed the heart against a general intercourse with mankind, and precluded the idea of philanthropic benevolence; on the contrary, a general attention to the duties of Society, while like the sun it diffuses its light and heat, loses nothing of its central fire. Courage, when restricted by laws, is a desirable attribute; but when it becomes its own legislator, is too much the child of chance to be depended upon as the arbiter of the happiness or misery of mankind.

Civilized policy is by no means so infernal an agent to ambition as it has been generally represented. The time is at length arrived in the more enlightened parts of Europe, when the statesman has ceased to adopt the dagger and the bowl, as necessary pieces of furniture in his cabinet; and in the present age, the school of Machiavel is not considered as the only road to greatness: so far has the refined spirit of the times contributed to humanize even the love of power.

Having thus endeavoured to prove, that a closer union of the bonds of society is by no means derogatory to the dignity, or even prejudicial to the interests of mankind; my next endeavour shall be to investigate, what in all ages has been the most effectual method of reducing barbarous ferocity; of softening the vices of human nature into foibles; and of refining its good qualities into virtues. And no principle we may observe has been more conducive to these effects than the love of pleasure. We may exemplify this by the authority of the most consummate politicians; the revolutions of the most powerful empires; and the errors of the most experienced commanders, the world ever produced. Cæsar, in accounting for the superior ferocity of the Germans to the Gauls, mentions, as the principal cause, the effeminacy which a frequent intercourse with merchants had introduced among the latter; but which, among the former, was hitherto but little known. Nay, so adapted to the support of this idea are the words of Tacitus, in relating Agricola's method of reducing the savage independence of the Britons, that I will trespass on the reader's patience by transcribing them.

Ut homines dispersi et rudes, eoque bello faciles, quieti et otio per voluptates assuescerent; hortari privatum, adjuvare publice, ut templa, fora, domus exstruerent, laudando promptos, et castigando segnes. Jam vero principium filios liberalibus artibus erudire. Inde etiam habitus nostri honor, et frequens toga. Paulatimque discessum ad delinimenta vitiorum, porticus et balnea, et conviviorum elegantiam. Idque apud imperitos humanitas vocabatur, cum pars servitutis esset.

"That this nation, dispersed and uncultivated, and on that account more prone to war, might, by indulgencies become more accustomed to ease and quiet, he began privately to encourage, and publickly to assist them in building temples, courts of judicature, and habitations; by commending the ready, and chastising the idle; and at the same time, to instruct the sons of their chieftains in the liberal arts. From hence arose their respect for us, and their frequent assumption of the Roman habit; so that by degrees they were brought over to the allurements of luxury, porticos and baths, and elegant entertainments; their ignorance giving the name of refinement, to what was in reality to conduce to their slavery."

A convincing proof, that this politic measure was approved of by this great pattern of provincial government; a measure, which, when we reflect on its salutary consequences, naturally brings to our mind the opposite conduct of the first invaders of America, whose progress was marked with such carnage, merely perhaps from their ignorance or neglect of this founded principle.

To proceed, however, in illustrating what I have advanced, and to prove that the love of pleasure has often been instrumental to subverting the constitutions of empires founded on military law, by lulling to sleep this ferocious insolence where it was a constituent part of the government; I need only recur to the well known instances of Sparta and Rome. The decline of the former, may, with great reason be dated from the abrogation of those wise sumptuary laws instituted by the political penetration of Lycurgus. That celebrated legislator, from having long studied the genius of his countrymen, judged, that a military government was most peculiarly adapted to it; and that the very principle of refinement, which, from their innate pride supported the Athenians, would tend to enervate the haughty severity of the Spartans; and subvert that warlike disposition by which alone they existed as a commonwealth. The alteration produced in the manners, and shortly after in the government of the latter, from similar causes, (a period of about one hundred and thirty years

† This position may seem a little extraordinary, but as the opposite events tend chiefly to the aggrandizement of individuals, it is to subsequent effects we are to look for the advantageous or destructive tendency of these.

having elapsed from the introduction of the Corinthian and Syracusan luxuries, to the perpetual dictatorship of Sylla,) is too well known to need discussion here. Suffice it to say, that during this interval, and even after the subversion of the commonwealth, the great and elegant geniuses, who, from the introduction of the liberal arts, were enabled to add cultivation to a rich and luxuriant soil, have so far obscured the rugged and unformed virtues of their predecessors, that though the mind may rest with a momentary satisfaction on a Cincinnatus or a Fabricius, it is to the refined voluptuousness of a Lucullus, the unbounded soul of a Cæsar, and the inexhaustible genius of a Cicero, that we look for the character of this extraordinary people.

Lastly, to exemplify this idea in the defeats or dissolution of the most powerful and veteran armies, which have entirely originated in a deviation from the simple abstinence necessary to their unity, let us take a short review of the conduct of Hannibal, from his entrance into Italy, to the defection of Capua. This astonishing commander, having through the most barbarous countries in the midst of the united attacks of war, famine, and tempest, cemented the jarring interests of an army made up of the flower of some nations, and the scum of others; having personally surmounted the most incredible difficulties, and in all his enterprizes united the characters of soldier and general; having gained four decisive victories over the Romans in the very heart of Italy; neither himself nor his army could resist the soft climate and luxurious effeminacy of Campania, "Adeo ut vere dictum sit," says Florus, "Capuam Hannibali Cannas fuisse." "So it was with justice said, that Capua was Hannibal's Cannæ." I might farther enforce this maxim, by Cæsar's description of Pompey's camp, when he accounts for his victory in Thessaly; and afterwards by the effect of Egyptian luxury on the veteran legions of Antony; were I not hastening to a period, with which, as I presume, some of my fellow-citizens are unwillingly familiar, I purpose concluding this winter's tale.

The sudden alteration in the genius of the English on the restoration, an epocha which has now a double hold on immortal celebrity, from the assistance of history and poetry, has been to some a matter of surprise; and the immediate transition from the cold suspicious policy of Cromwell, and the fanatic hypocrisy of the commonwealth, to the general spirit of dissipation, and the sudden revival of sprightly wit, and genius in all its levity, which characterized the reign of Charles, has been considered as a striking instance of fickleness in the human understanding.

But it was probably this principle, so inherent in our natures, which gave rise to so general a variation. The mind of man, after having been harassed by the usurpation of the more violent passions, seizes with avidity, the first object which offers itself, as a relaxation from care, and a gratification of the unsatisfied appetites. This was at the accession of Charles, the state of England; at one time distracted by internal discord, at another enslaved by its pretended deliverer, it easily concurred with the more voluptuous disposition of its new master, in exchanging political for poetical ribaldry; and converting the intrigues of the cabinet into those of the chamber. In the one case, the angry collision of two thunder clouds, struck forth mutual flashes, whose progress was only known by the subsequent destruction; in the other, the returning sun, doubly prolific after the storm, nurtured those flowers of wit and genius, which form no inconsiderable figure in the annals of English literature.

The same effects from the same causes may be observed to have taken place in the latter years of William's reign, and more particularly during that of Queen Anne, (deservedly esteemed the Augustan age of Great-Britain;) and from that period, though perhaps the same day has not seen the united excellencies of so many distinguished men, our visible refinements in luxury will be sufficient evidence of our progress in civilization. Innumerable are the conveniencies, nay, superfluities of life in this opulent kingdom, which in the beginning of this century were totally unknown; and which, though they may feed Cynical spleen, or offend the severity of a Stoic, if they tend to add one more link to the chain of society, to awaken one more liberal emotion in the heart, or to humanize into a citizen of the world one more malecontent, (as from their tendency we have every reason to suppose they do,) the temporal evil is by no means equivalent to the lasting good; and the man who advances civilization to its highest polish, is the most beneficial member of the community.

EGYPT.

DESCRIPTION OF DAMIETTA AND ITS ENVIRONS.

Damietta is larger, and not less agreeable than Rosetta; it forms a semi-circle on the eastern shore of the Nile, two leagues and a half from its mouth. It contains about 80,000 inhabitants. The houses especially near the river are very high; most of them have pleasant saloons, built on the terraces, in which charming places, open to every wind, the Turk, indolently seated on his sofa, passes his life in smoking, viewing the sea on one side and the Nile on the other. Various grand mosques with high minarets, ornament the city.

Multitudes of boats and small vessels incessantly fill the port of Damietta. There is a great trade between this city and Syria, Cyprus and Marseilles. The Christians of Aleppo and Damascus, for many ages established here, carry on the principal trade; they are suffered to grow rich by Turkish indolence, which contents itself with occasional extortions.

What is most disadvantageous to the trade of Damietta is its defective harbour; the road where vessels lie being totally exposed, every gale that rises the captains are obliged to slip their cables, and take refuge at Cyprus, or keep the open sea. By cutting a canal of half a league only, it would be easy to give ships a free entrance into the Nile, which is deep; and this small expence would render Damietta a fine harbour.

The slip of land where Damietta is built, shut in on one side by the river, and on the other by the lake Manzala, is only from two to six miles wide, east and west. Rivulets intersect it in every direction, and render it the most fruitful part of Egypt. The rice in common yields, 80 bushels for one, and other products are in the same proportion. Here nature, eminently and profusely displaying her riches and her pomp, presents the year round fruits, flowers and harvests! She withers not in winter; she fades not in summer! She is neither scorched nor frozen! Verdure is no where so fresh as here; trees no where so loaded with fruit!

There are many villages round Damietta; most of them have manufactories, where the finest Egyptian cloth is made, particularly napkins, much in request, at the end of which is silk fringe: they are brought to table, especially on visits of ceremony: the slave presents one to wipe the mouth after drinking sherbet. Round these villages usually are small woods, where the trees planted promiscuously, have an uncommon and picturesque effect. Besides the sycamore and gloomy tamarind, the elegant capia grows, with clustering yellow flowers, resembling those of the cythus! the top of the date, loaded with clusters, lords it above the bower; and near its shade the citron and orange rise, or over the peasant's cottage extend their golden fruit. long-leaved banana, the scarlet flowered pomegranate, and the sweet fruited fig, scatter charming variety. Often straying among their meandering paths, shaded on one side by trees, and on the other by clustering reeds, impervious to sight, I have unexpectedly found myself on the banks of the great lake Manzala. Here a different prospect arose; thousands of boats were employed in fishing or spreading nets for the innumerable birds which hither come in search of abundant food, and a temperate climate. I wish to paint nature such as I have seen her a thousand times round Damietta; but I feel myself unequal to the task. Imagine all the delights that running brooks and fresh verdure, all the odour that orange-flowers, all that a mild suavity, a balsamic air, and a most enchanting horizon, can impart, and you will then have but a feeble idea of the small slip of earth included between this expansive lake and the overflowing Nile.

A mile south-west of the town is an orange grove, to which the inhabitants resort. This is the only place where art has any way aided nature; no where else are the trees planted in rows. Here I almost daily went, especially during February, March, and April, when the orange is in flower. No words can express the pleasure of breathing the cool and perfumed air of these delightful shades. The unmulituted trees are above 30 feet high, and their intermingled branches and thick foliage, all in bloom from top to bottom, wholly exclude the sun's ray. Each orange tree is a vast nosegay, the flowers of which almost conceal the leaves, forming together the most beautiful canopy ever beheld. There is a small rivulet beside each row, and twice a day a reservoir is opened, by which the trees are watered. It is intoxication of pleasure to walk here at noon; never did I so forcibly feel all the delicious enjoyments that odours and aromatics can inspire. Here, in these hot climates, was I convinced that such sweets, far from injuring, are even necessary to health.

THE NILE FROM CAIRO TO DAMIETTA.

On the 15th of Feb. I went from Damietta in a canjoi, or boat, built for pleasure. A faithful janissary, and an Arabian servant accompanied me, all well-armed: a very necessary caution on the banks of the Damietta, where attacks are continual.

We left Boulac about one o'clock, with a serene sky, and a heat as temperate as one of the finest days of our spring. The inundation had been over about six weeks, and the waters of the Nile incessantly decreased. The current being rather slow, and the North wind blowing, the men were obliged to take to their oars. Wheat and barley, began to ripen. The Indian millet was a foot high; and the third crop of lucern was springing. Cucumbers and water melons spread their flexible branches over the river banks, and beans were almost ripe. The foliage of the trees was verdant, but differently tintured, and the orange and citron were in flower. Such was the aspect of the country on the 15th of February.

WATERS OF THE NILE

The waters of the Nile, lighter, softer, and more agreeable to the taste than any I know, greatly promote the health of the inhabitants. All antiquity acknowledges their excellence, and the people drink them with a kind of avidity, without ever being injured by the quantity. Being lightly impregnated with nitre, they are only a gentle aperient to those who take them to excess.

An ancient historian says, that the Egyptians are the most healthy people on earth, which advantages they owe to the salubrity of the air, and temperature of the climate, which seldom varies. But M. Savary observes, that there is an unhealthy season in Egypt. From February till the end of May, the south winds blow at intervals, and load the atmosphere with a subtle dust (which makes breathing difficult), and drive before them pernicious exhalation. Sometimes the heat becomes insupportable, and the thermometer suddenly rises twelve degrees. The inhabitants call this season Rhawsin, fifty, because these winds are mostly felt for fifty days, between Easter and Whitsuntide. It must not, however be supposed, that this wind, which in a few hours corrupts meat and animal substances, blows fifty days. Egypt would become a desert. It seldom blows three days together, and sometimes is only an impetuous whirlwind, which rapidly passes, and injures only the traveller overtaken in the deserts. These whirlwinds of sand have buried caravans and armies.

M. Savary maintains, in opposition to M. Paw and other modern authors, that the plague is not a native disorder of Egypt, but is commonly brought from Smyrna and the Turkish forts. It always stops in the month of June, or those who catch it then are always cured. Excess of heat and cold seems to be equally destructive of this dreadful contagion; winter kills it in Constantinople, and summer in Egypt; it seldom reaches the polar circle, and never passes the tropic.

The European stands aghast with fear at the calamities it produces in Grand Cairo. This city is computed to contain from eight to nine hundred thousand inhabitants. They are so crowded that two hundred citizens here occupy less space than thirty at Paris. The streets are very narrow, and always full of people, who crowd and jostle each other; and the passenger is sometimes obliged to wait several minutes before he can make his way. One person with the plague will communicate it to an hundred.

The Mahometans die in their houses, public squares and streets, without one of them endeavouring to save himself. The Europeans, who shut themselves up, and avoid communication, alone escape the general disaster.

All do not die who are attacked, but I have been assured, that the plague sometimes carries off three hundred thousand people from Grand Cairo.

The Turks use no precautions to prevent the plague; they say it is fate; nor is quarantine performed at one single port.

LETTER FROM THOMSON.

[We are always pleased with an opportunity of preserving fugitive essays, and frank and undisguised letters from the pen of Genius. The following original letter from the Bard of the Seasons will be read with uncommon interest.]

An original letter from Thomson, author of the Seasons, to Paterson, a short time before his death, in the beginning of May, 1748.

NO DATE.

DEAR PATERSON,

IN the first place, and previous to my letter, I must recommend to your favour and protection Mr. James Smith, searcher in St. Christophers; and I beg of you, as occasion shall serve, and as you find he merits it, to advance him in the business of the customs. He is warmly recommended to me by Sargent, who in verity turns out one of the best men of our youthful acquaintance, honest, honourable, friendly, and generous.

If we are not to oblige one another, life becomes a paltry, selfish affair....a pitiful morsel in a corner! Sargent is so happily married, that I could almost say....the same case happen to us all!

That I have not answered several letters of your's, is not owing to the want of friendship, and the sincerest regard for you; but you know me well enough to account for my silence, without my saying any more on that head. Besides, I have very little to say that is worthy to be transmitted over the great ocean. The world-either fertilises so much, or we grow so dead to it, that its transactions make but feeble impressions on us. Retirement, and nature, are more and more my passion every day. And now, even now, the charming time comes on: heaven is just on the point, or rather in the very act, of giving earth a green gown. The voice of the nightingale is heard in our lanes.

* Paterson was Thomson's deputy as surveyor of the Leeward islands.

You must know that I have enlarged my rural domain, much to the same dimensions you have done your's. The two fields next to me, from the first of which I have walled...no, no,...paled in about as much as my garden consisted of before; so that the walk runs round the hedge, where you may figure me walking any time of the day, and sometimes under night. For you, I imagine you reclining under cedars and palmattoes, and there enjoying more magnificent slumbers than are known to the pale climates of the north: slumbers rendered awful and divine, by the solemn stillness and deep fervours of the torrid noon! At other times I imagine you drinking punch in groves of lime or orange-trees; gathering pine-apples from hedges, as commonly as we may blackberries; poetising under lofty laurels, or making love under full-spread myrtles.

But, to lower my style a little: as I am such a genuine lover of gardening, why don't you remember me in that instance, and send me some seeds of things that might succeed here during the summer, though they cannot perfect their seed sufficiently in this, to them ungenial climate, to propagate; in which case is the calliloo, that, from the seed it bore here, came up puny, rickety, and good for nothing. There are other things certainly with you, not yet brought over hither, that might flourish here in the summer-time, and live tolerably well, provided they be sheltered in an hospitable stove or green-house during the winter. You will give me no small pleasure by sending me, from time to time, some of these seeds, if it were no more but to amuse me in making the trial.

With regard to the brother gardeners, you ought to know, that as they are half vegetables, the animal part of them will never have spirit enough to consent to the transplanting of the vegetable into distant dangerous climates. They, happily for themselves, have no other idea but to dig on here, eat, drink, sleep, and kiss their wives.

As to more important business, I have nothing to write to you. You know best the course of it. Be (as you always must be) just, and honest; but if you are unhappily romantic, you shall come home without money, and write a tragedy on yourself*. Mr. Lyttleton told me that the Grenvilles and he had strongly recommended the person the governor and you proposed for that considerable office, lately fallen vacant in your department, and that there were good hopes of succeeding. He told me also that Mr. Pitt had said that it was not to be expected that offices, such as that is, for which the greatest interest is made here at home, could be accorded to your recommendation; but that as to the middling or inferior offices, if there was not some particular reason to the contrary, regard would be had thereto. This is all that can be reasonably desired; and if you are not infected with a certain Creolian distemper (whereof I am persuaded your soul will utterly resist the contagion, as I hope your body will that of their natural ones) there are few men so capable of that unperishable happiness, that peace and satisfaction of mind at least, that proceed from being reasonable and moderate in our desires, as you are. These are the treasures dug from an inexhaustible mine in our breasts, which, like those in the kingdom of heaven, the rust of time cannot corrupt, nor thieves break through and steal. I must learn to work at this mine a little more, being struck off from a certain hundred pounds a year, which you know I had.

West, Mallet, and I, were all routed in one day. If you must know why...out of resentment to our friend in Argyle-street. Yet I have hopes given me of having it restored, with interest, some time or other. Ah! that some time or other is a great deceiver.

Coriolanus has not yet appeared upon the stage, from the little dirty jealousy of Tullus [Garrick] towards him who alone can act Coriolanus [Quin.]. Indeed the first has entirely jockeyed the last off the stage for this season; but I believe he will return on him next season, like a giant in his wrath. Let us have a little more patience, Paterson; nay, let us be cheerful. At last, all will be well; at last, all will be over....here I mean! God forbid it should be hereafter! But as sure as there is a God, that will not be so.

Now that I am prating of myself, know that, after fourteen or fifteen years, the Castle of Indolence comes abroad in a fortnight. It will certainly travel as far as Barbadoes. You have an apartment in it, as a night-pensioner; which you may remember I fitted up for you, during our delightful party at Northaw. Will ever these days return again! Don't you remember your eating the raw fish that were never caught?

All our friends are pretty much in statu quo, except it be poor Mr. Lyttleton. He has had the severest trial a humane tender heart can have; but the old physician, Time, will at least close up his wounds, though there must always remain an inward smarting.

Mitchell* is in the house for Aberdeenshire, and has spoke modestly well: I hope he will be in something else soon; none deserves better: true friendship and humanity dwell in his heart. Gray is working hard at passing his accounts. I spoke to him about that affair. If he gives you any trouble about it, even that of dunning, I shall think strangely; but I dare say he is too friendly to his old friends, and you are among the oldest. Symmer is at last tired of quality, and is going to take a semi-country house at Hammersmith.

I am sorry that honest sensible Warrender (who is in town) seems to be stunted in church preferment: he ought to be a tall cedar in the house of the Lord. If he is not so at last it will add more fuel to my indignation, that burns already too intensely, and throbs towards an eruption. Poor Murdock is in town, tutor to admiral Vernon's son, and is in good hope of another living in Suffolk, that country of tranquillity, where he will then burrow himself in a wife, and be happy. Good-natured obliging Millar is as usual. Though the doctor increases in his business, he does not decrease in his spleen; but there is a certain kind of spleen that is both humane and agreeable, like Jacques in the play: I sometimes too have a touch of it. But I must now break off this chat with you, about your friends, which, were I to indulge it, would be endless.

As for politics, we are, I believe, upon the brink of a peace. The French are vapouring at present in the siege of Maestricht, at the same time they are mortally sick in their marine, and through all the vitals of France. It is pity we cannot continue the war a little longer, and put their agonizing trade quite to death. This siege (I take it) they mean as their last flourish in the war. May your health, which never failed you yet, still continue, till you have scraped together enough to return home, and live in some snug corner, as happy as the Corycius Senex, in Virgil's Fourth Georgic, whom I recommend both to you and myself, as a perfect model of the truest happy life. Believe me to be ever most sincerely and affectionately, Your's, &c.

JAMES THOMSON.

A DIALOGUE IN THE SHADES.

CHURCHILL AND DR. JOHNSON.

Churchill.

THOUGH I disliked you upon earth, and never designed to enter into conversation with you; yet, as you are lately arrived in these regions, I should like to be informed even by you of the late transactions in the other world.

Johnson. I always said you was a blockhead, sir, and I shall never alter my opinion....I never converse with blockheads.

Churchill. Your manners have not received much polish since I left you upon earth....You still retain much of the savage about you, both in your figure and deportment; but believe me Pomposo, I shall lash you into civility, as I did in the other country, if you provoke me.

Johnson. Lashes from your feeble hand can only excite my laughter.

Churchill. I shall publish another Ghost that will strike terror into your soul, if you refuse or delay to answer me such questions as I think proper to propose to you....Why did you refuse me the honour of admitting me among the British poets, contrary to the opinion and request of the proprietors?.... Answer me without prevarication, or you shall take the consequences.

Johnson. Your pieces had some merit, but it was of the temporary and local kind, and not at all calculated for posterity, or for distant countries: therefore I did not think it my duty to class them with those works which had a claim to immortality.

Churchill.. Did I not caution you against prevarication?....No more of it, Pomposo, if you dread the shafts of my resentment.

Johnson. Why if I must acknowledge the truth. I must....I deserved the chastisement which you severely inflicted on me, and found no inclination to propagate my disgrace....I had been so clearly convicted of folly at your tribunal, that I thought proper to suppress the publication of my trial.

Churchill. Now, I think I have brought you to the point....But answer me ingenuously the question I am about to propose:....Were the booksellers your masters, so ignorant as to suppose the poems of Pomfret were superior to those which I have written, and which have certainly had admirers among people of some taste?

Johnson. Ignorant they are, or....I should not have prevailed on them to reject your performances, and introduce the flimsy rhymes of sleepy Pomfret. I acknowledge, to my shame, that I extolled the wretched productions of that versifier and preferred them to the harmonious and nervous satires which proceeded from your pen. My employers seemed astonished at my opinion, but readily acquiesced in it (or as they were pleased to say) that I was more competent than they were to decide upon such a subject.

Churchill. What have you to say in extenuation of the crime you have committed, in robbing me of my well-earned fame?

Johnson. I had smarted under your correction, sir, and naturally embraced an opportunity of having my complete revenge....But, be consoled....Time will restore you to the rank which I deprived you of, and posterity will do you that justice which my resentment has, for a time, withheld from you.

Churchill. Your candour almost atones for the injury that you have done me. I forgive you....This point being adjusted between us, we may now converse together on friendly terms. I have many enquiries to make after such of my acquaintance as have not set out upon their journey to these abodes.

Johnson. And you shall find me communicative respecting matters that I am acquainted with. But, for the present I must leave thee....My Tetsy beckons me towards her.

ORIGIN OF THE GREY MARE'S BEING THE BETTER HORSE.

I HAD lately the pleasure of passing a very agreeable evening in a mixed company of both sexes, where the conversation happening to turn upon the propriety of that power which men usually arrogate to themselves of ruling over their wives with despotic sway, a young lady of wit and humour, then present, replied, "it might possibly be so sometimes, but much oftener the grey mare is the better horse!" and very obligingly entertained the company with the following account of the rise of that proverbial saying, which is made use of when a woman governs her husband.

A gentleman of a certain county in England having married a young lady of considerable fortune, and with many other charms, yet finding, in a very short time, that she was of a high dominating spirit, and always contending to be mistress of him and his family, he was resolved to part with her. Accordingly he went to her father, and told him, he found his daughter of such a temper, and he was so heartily tired of her, that if he would take her home again, he would return every penny of her fortune.

The old gentleman having inquired into the cause of his complaint, asked him, "why he should be more disquieted at it than any other married man, since it was the common case with them all, and consequently no more than he ought to have expected when he entered into the marriage state?" The young gentleman desired to be excused, if he said he was so far from giving his assent to this assertion, that he thought himself more unhappy than any other man, as his wife had a spirit no way to be quelled; and as most certainly no man, who had a sense of right and wrong, could ever submit to be governed by his wife. "Son (said the old man) you are but little acquainted with the world, if you do not know that all women govern their husbands, though not all, indeed, by the same method: however, to end all disputes between us, I will put what I have said on this proof, if you are willing to try it: I have five horses in my stable; you shall harness these to a cart, in which I shall put a basket containing one hundred eggs; and if, in passing through the county, and making a strict inquiry into the truth or falsehood of my assertion, and leaving a horse at the house of every man who is master of his family himself, and an egg only where the wife governs, you will find your eggs gone before your horses, I hope you will then think your own case not uncommon, but will be contented to go home, and look upon your own wife as no worse than her neighbours. If, on the other hand, your horses are gone first, I will take my daughter home again, and you shall keep her fortune."

This proposal was too advantageous to be rejected; our young married man, therefore, set out with great eagerness to get rid, as he thought, of his horses and his wife.

At the first house he came to, he heard a woman, with a shrill and angry voice, call to her husband to go to the door. Here he left an egg, you may be sure, without making any further enquiry; at the next he met with something of the same kind; and at every house, in short, until his eggs were almost gone, when he arrived at the seat of a gentleman of family and figure in the county: he knocked at the door, and enquiring for the master of the house, was told by a servant, that his master was not yet stirring, but, if he pleased to walk in, his lady was in the parlour. The lady, with great complaisance, desired him to seat himself, and said, if his business was very urgent, she would wake her husband to let him know it, but had much rather not disturb him. "Why, really, madam (said he) my business is only to ask a question, which you can resolve as well as your husband, if you will be ingenuous with me. You will, doubtless, think it odd, and it may be deemed impolite for any one, much more a stranger, to ask such a question; but as a very considerable wager depends upon it, and it may be some advantage to yourself to declare the truth to me; I hope these considerations will plead my excuse. It is, madam, to desire to be informed, whether you govern your husband, or he rules over you?"..... "Indeed, sir (replied the lady), this question is somewhat odd; but, as I think no one ought to be ashamed of doing their duty, I shall make no scruple to say, that I have been always proud to obey my husband in all things; but, if a woman's own word is to be suspected in such a case, let him answer for me, for here he comes."

The gentleman at that moment entering the room, and, after some apologies, being made acquainted with the business, confirmed every word his obedient wife had reported in her own favour; upon which he was invited to choose which horse in the team he liked best, and to accept of it as a present.

A black gelding struck the fancy of the gentleman most; but the lady desired he would choose the grey mare, which she thought would be very fit for her side-saddle; her husband gave substantial reasons why the black horse would be most useful to them; but madam still persisted in her claim to the grey mare. "What (said she), and will you not take her then? But I say you shall; for I am sure the grey mare is much the better horse." Well, my dear (replied the husband), if it must be so..... "You must take an egg (replied the gentleman carter), and I must take all my horses back again, and endeavour to live happy with my wife." ZENO.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The following lines, from the State Gazette (a federal paper, printed at Charleston, South Carolina), are happily conceived, and perhaps are not, at this time, inapt.]

THE FABLE OF THE OAK AND THE WILLOW, PARAPHRASED.

WITHIN the commonwealth of trees,
There liv'd, in opulence and ease,
A Willow and a neighbouring Oak,
Two very powerful gentlefolk!
The helm of state was all their aim,
To which they laid an equal claim.
The Willow vain, provok'd at length
The sturdy Oak to try its strength:
The challenge was received in form,
To be decided by a storm.
The God of Storms was now address'd,
The prowess of each side to test.
'Twas granted, as each Willow knows,
And now a furious tempest rose,
That threaten'd, with disastrous fate,
The constitution of the state.
The conscious Willow knew, of course,
That cringing was his last resource,
And bending from the dubious blast,
Evaded all its force at last;....
While the firm Oak to fury's tide
Opposed its lacerated side;
And scorning meanness, with disdain
Fell prostrate on the groaning plain.
Meantime th' exulting Willow stood,
And claim'd the victory o'er the Wood.

When thus the firm and stately Oak,
In terms of indignation, spoke:....
"Mean, worthless wretch! is this thy fort,
Each fickle, favouring gale to court,
And, with insinuating wile,
Of half its force the storm beguile?
Not to thy strength, but frail condition,
Thou owest thy present elevation.
I am an Oak, tho' fall'n, indeed!
Thou still a wile and skulking weed!
Rais'd by no merit of thy own,
But by the blast that laid me prone.
Say! if thou canst, what plant or tree,
Except a sycophant like thee,
Devoted to intrigue and strife,
Would e'er prefer a dastard's life,
Preserv'd by guile and crafty saws,
To falling in a GLORIOUS CAUSE.

ATTICUS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TELL me, Eliza, tell me why
Thou charmst us so?....Is it thine eye,
That eye which beams celestial light?
No; other eyes may glance as bright.

'Tis then, perhaps, thy ruby lip,
Where Cupid ambush'd lurks to sip,
With urchin'd art, ambrosial dew;
No; other lips are ruby too.

May it not be the modest rose,
Which in thy vermil cheek still glows,
Where laughing health confest we view?
No; other cheeks boast roses too.

Where then's this fascinating grace,
That's e'en more lovely than thy face?
This magic cestus worn alone by thee?
'Tis in thy gentle manners, void of art,
Which speak the dictates of thy peaceful heart,
Candour, Good-humour and Simplicity.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The following lines were occasioned by seeing, about a twelvemonth ago, a very pretty girl, whose eyes expressed no monastic feelings, confined in a convent at Messina.

Immur'd within the silent convent's gloom,
The chill abode of superstitious fear,
Whose baleful aspect blights each op'ning bloom,
Whose worship is the agonizing tear,

Sweet maid, with all those charms condemn'd to pine,

While Nature, ever to her feelings true,
To give regret for what you thus resign,
Shall paint each pleasure in its gayest hue.

Teresa! say, is that benignant Pow'r,
For whom my thoughts with purest fervour glow,
Best worship'd by the monkish forehead's lour,
The tear of anguish and the sigh of woe?

Or by those passions, which around mankind
Shed their soft lustre, and the heart improve?
A spirit lib'ral, open, and refin'd,
Contentment's sonnet, and the smile of love?

Is he more pleas'd, when from the surly reign
Of ruffian winter all the songsters fly?
When dead each flowret of the frozen plain,
And clouds and tempests blacken all the sky?

Or when mild spring returns with smiling face,
When Flora scatters all her gayest blooms,
When the soft turtles form the amorous chace,
And wanton zephyrs waft around perfumes?

Behold within these walls the pining maids!
Their cheeks how pale! how dim their vestal eyes!
And say, secluded in these dismal shades,
Has Heav'n alone the tribute of their sighs?

Then from thy grate view yonder sportive throng,
Where mirth and health their mingled gifts impart,

Where age, embrown'd with toil, joins in the song,
And thanks Hygeia for his happy heart.

Behold and say....shall Nature to our reach Present those joys, which Nature's God denies?
With monitory voice shall Virtue teach,
To spurn those blessings Providence supplies?

O, be not cheated by the fraudulent tale!
Nor think that HE, who all those beauties gave,
Dooms e'en the blushing flow'r that scents the vale,
Unheeded, unenjoy'd to seek the grave.

Teresa, fly where o'er th'Atlantic wave
No horrid prisons hold thy lovely sex;
No frowning parents innocence enslave,
Where only importuning lovers vex.

Oh fly! and let the tender task be mine,
To keep thee free from all but love's alarms,
With fainting transport on thy breast recline,
And teach the better uses of thy charms.

Then on thy couch no more the fiend Despair
Shall from thy trembling eye-lids call a tear;
But Cupids guard thee with assiduous care,
And bliss, forever smiling, hover near.

With bloom renew'd thy lovely cheeks shall glow,
While sweetest thoughts thy soften'd sighs express,

And those bright eyes, no more suffus'd with woe,
The dearest ecstasy of love confess.

TO CHLOE.

SAY, dearest girl, the bloom divine
Upon thy cheek which glows,
Those pouting lips, where loves refine
The sweetness of the rose;
That wildly wanton swelling breast,
So form'd each bliss to prove;
Those limbs by all the graces drest,
Those eyes that swim in love.

Ah! say, shall all that store of charms,
Which lavish Nature gave,
E'er sink in cold Indifference' arms,
Of beauty still the grave:
While I, within whose breast the beams
Of beauty, love has bred,
Am, sighing, left to court the dreams,
That gives thee to my bed.

No, Chloe, let each soft desire
Thy panting bosom fill,
Nor him whose heart thy charms inspire,
With frigid prudence kill.
So may sweet ecstasy be thine!
May bliss e'er dwell with thee!
While smiling loves thy heart incline
To share that bliss with me.

TO ELIZA.

DEAR lovely maid, that rul'st my heart,
What evils cause those sighs,
And force those trembling tears to start,
That dim thy radiant eyes?

What pales thy cheek, whose bloom so late
Surpass'd the orient glow?
Oh! why, complaining of thy fate,
Look'st thou the form of woe?

Is it (whom fortune's frowns oppress,
And force from thee to part),
The image of thy love's distress,
That melts thy gentle heart?

Eliza! sure thy virtues are
Of such celestial hue,
That Heav'n itself will have a care
O'er him thou lov'st so true.

SELECTED POETRY.

[Even the gravity of the Monthly Reviewers declared, on the first publication of the following catch, that "its humour was easy, and agreeable."]

Which is the properest day to drink?
Saturday, Sunday, Monday?

Each is the properest day, I think,
Why should we name but one day?

Tell me but yours, I'll mention my day,
Let us but fix on some day.

Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, Friday,
Saturday, Sunday, Monday.

STANCES MORALES, PAR M. DE PILS.

LA grande route de la vie
Se partage en quatre relais;
Quoique plantee en noir cipres
Nuit et jour elle est fort suivie.

En vertu des arrêts du sort,
C'est dans une ample diligence;
Que le tems coche de la mort,
Y voiture l'humaine engeance.

Pour ce voyage vous jugez,
Que l'homme part des qu'il est jeune;
Et l'usage veut qu'il dejeune,
A l'hotel des prejugés.

A midi Venus le supplie
De diner chez elle en passant;
Bien que l'hotesse soit jolie,
Il la querelle en la quittant.

Pour dissiper sa reverie,
Quand la journée est aux trois quarts
Il fait hat a l'hotellerie
De la science, et des beaux arts.

Il y voit des jaloux sans nombre,
Qui se mettant tous a crier;
Lui disputent d'un regard sombre,
Deux ou trois feuilles de haurier.

Contre une aussi futile troupe,
Emu d'une juste pitie;
Il remonte, et le soir il soupe
A l'auberge de l'amitie.

Mais a cette paisible table,
Comme il alloit se divertir,
Le postillon impitoyable
Le force encore a repartir.

C'en est fait! son ame succombe
Au souvenir de tant de maux;
Il arrive; et c'est une tombe
Qui lui sert de lit de repos.

LINDORE.

In reply to "The Fairest of the Fair," a song, by the Bishop of Dromore.

O LINDORE, canst thou doubt my love,
Or think the town deserves a sigh?
Thy Nancy will a cot approve,
Nor envy queens, if thou art nigh.
Then shall the russet gown be mine,
Nor splendid jewels deck my vest;
Nor ever shall my heart repine,
With Lindore's fond affection blest.

With thee I'll fly each scene so gay,
Though heat annoy, or wintry wind;
Nor shall a look or sigh betray
A mournful heart, or restless mind.
With thee each labour I'll defy,
With thee, I'll gently sink to rest,
Nor shall past pleasures raise a sigh,
With Lindore's fond affection blest.

If perils should my love oppress,
With him I'll brave their bitter rage,
And, 'mid the terrors of distress,
His presence shall my fears assuage;
And on his frame should sickness prey,
My care shall every pang arrest;
Nor shall a thought past joys display,
With Lindore's fond affection blest.

And should my gentle Lindore die,
Let Nancy his last moments cheer,
Her bosom ne'er shall heave a sigh,
Her eyes shall ne'er distil a tear:
But when thou'rt gone, thy wretched love
Will rend her heart upon thy breast,
Nor any scenes but those approve,
Which Lindore's fond affection blest.

EPIGRAM,

On a Young Lady of the name of Whiting.

SURE Whiting is no fasting dish,
Let priests say what they dare;
I'd rather have my dainty fish,
Than all their Christmas fare.
So sweet, so innocent, so free
From all that tends to strife;
O happy man! whose lot shall be
To swim with her thro' life.

Whatever bait love e'er could make,
To catch my fish I'd try,
I'd be a gentle for her sake,
Or artificial fly.
But Venus, goddess of the food,
Does all my pray'rs deny;
And surly Mars cries "D—n your blood,
You've other fish to fry."

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XIII.

AT the commencement of these my speculations, I felt considerable anxiety, with respect to the degree of support upon which I could calculate, from the favours of correspondents. In my first paper, therefore, I implored their assistance with earnestness, and I am happy to acknowledge the liberality with which it has been afforded. I think that it is Fielding, who compares the condition of a periodical essayist, to that of a stage-coachman, who must proceed on his journey, whether his vehicle be empty or full. In like manner, the first page of the Port Folio must be filled with a Lounger, whether the brain of Samuel Saunter be competent to furnish the materials or not. For the present, however, and indeed for some weeks to come, the file of letters and papers which lie beside me on my desk, give me the comfortable assurance, that I am amply supplied.

I have only to lament, that so many of my friends communicate their observations upon similar topics. In consequence of this, I am compelled either to omit entirely many favours, of which I should willingly avail myself, or to give to my speculations too uniform a complexion. The state of manners in the theatre, the behaviour of would-be-critics, and lobby loungers, has been enlarged upon in many letters upon my file. Some of these I shall select for my present paper, and others may furnish materials for a future one.

The first letter which I have to communicate, appears to come from the same correspondent, who offered me some friendly advice in my second number.

Philadelphia, March 26.

MR. SAUNTER,

I was one of the first to hail the establishment of a paper in our city, which should contain a transcript of, and animadversions upon, our prevailing manners and customs. I saw, at an early period, the difficulty of the undertaking, and offered you some well-meant admonitions upon the subject. I am happy to observe, that you have steered so carefully clear of any thing personal, that even the censorious and the malicious can only complain of general severity in some of your strictures, but cannot point out any individual reflection. This is well done. But I am, sometimes, almost inclined to grieve that ever your paper was undertaken, for I dare hardly flatter you with the hope that it has done any good; and, on the other hand, that it has done some harm. The description of your person and character, in the first number, has been mistaken for a real one, and has produced a host of imitators, who infest us in all places of public amusement, but particularly in the theatre. I cannot conceive of any thing more unbecoming the character of a gentleman, than his presuming to interrupt the amusement of a numerous company, by loud laughing, or talking. If the conversation were worth listening to, it might, in some degree, compensate for the rudeness of preventing our attention to what is said upon the stage; but poverty of ideas, and vulgarity of language, are generally alike conspicuous in these lobby conversations. But this is not all. Many, I believe, think that, by the most disgusting display of apathy and indolence, they may perhaps be taken for Samuel Saunter.

It is but a little month, since I beheld one of this class of puppies, reclining at ease in a stage-box, with his head on the seats behind him, and his boots upon the front of it, displayed in full view, both to the audience and the performers. Had I been manager, I would certainly have had him turned out. I thought that this youth had carried his insolence to the utmost pitch; but even this was exceeded a few evenings since, when a couple of loungers, in the same box, had the audacity, even during the performance of the play, to turn their backs upon the stage and audience, and very calmly sit down upon the front of the box, with their coat-lappets hanging over, and their hats upon their heads, and begin a conversation.

Surely, Mr. Saunter, these things are not to be endured; and, if you perform your office with fidelity, you ought to give these puppies a little wholesome admonition in your next number.

I am, sir,

Your humble servant,
MONITOR.

I know not how I can better fulfil the wishes of my correspondent, than by publishing his letter. He appears to write with vehemence; but this vehemence is, in my apprehension, commendable. I was not a witness of the first outrage of which he complains; but the second I beheld, and beheld with astonishment. Surely an audience is culpably tame, that endures such insults, without resentment. Every individual should consider himself as interested in preserving the decorum, which should always distinguish a scene of liberal amusement. Such a spirit, we are informed by those, upon whose information we can rely, is uniformly manifested in the theatres of Europe, and, if it were exerted here, the evils of which my correspondent complains, would very soon be effectually obviated.

SIR,

Although I live a good way back in the country, I get a peep, every now and then, at your Port Folio, for lawyer Subtle of our town takes it in; and though I should like it better, if it gave us a little more news, and told us who was dead and married, and such like, and told us about fires, and robberies, and murders, and other entertaining matter, yet I have been well enough pleased with it in the main. But I have seemed to be more diverted with the Lounger, than any other part of it, for some of that seems comical enough. But all this is only beating about the bush; let me come at once to the matter in hand.

You must know then, Mister Saunter, that I came to Philadelphia about three weeks ago, and, since that time, I have been a good many times to the play. I don't mean to talk about the acting, for I don't pretend to be a judge, though I have been told that's a pretty general case among those, who talk the most of it; but what I want, Mr. Saunter, is to ask you a plain question. You must know, sir, that I have very often seen young ladies, aye, and fine, well-dressed ladies too, stand up between the acts of the play, and squat down on the front of the box, with their backs turned to the folks in the house. Now, is this good manners, or is it not? I remember mother, when I was a boy, used to be dinging it into my ears, that 'twas very uncivil to turn one's back to company. Indeed, when I first saw it, I had a great notion of giving some of them a spank, and I could have reached some of them from the pit very well, I guess. But, perhaps, all this is only my country breeding, and I may be out of my reckoning, and it may be very good manners, though I don't understand it.

If you please to correct all faults in the spelling and such like, you may put this in your paper if you please. I expect mother will be mighty glad, to hear that her son Zcky is got into print; and pray let me have your opinion upon the matter.

Here rests,

Your loving friend,
HEZEKIAH HOMESPUN.

I have frequently noticed the custom alluded to, by friend Hezekiah, and cannot help thinking, that it is a gross solecism in manners. I know of very few sights, that have a more ludicrous and curious effect, to a spectator in the pit, than the display which meets his eyes, when he raises his head, in an interval of the performance. I too have more than once felt a similar propensity with my correspondent, and have been strongly inclined to give them a "spank." But my chastisement would have been administered with as much delicacy as that which, if we may believe De Lolme's facetious history of the Flagellants, was inflicted by some ghostly fathers of the Roman church, upon their female penitents. Far from using the scourge with severity, he observes, that the disciplinarians, upon such occasions, "femora molliter perfricabit." As the subject is a delicate one, I shall be excused, to adopt the words of the historian of the Roman empire, "for veiling it in the obscurity of a learned language."

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MADELINA.

TO R. L.

MADELINA, you wish me to draw your character. What a strange wish, to be preferred by a young lady to a young man, who has seldom seen you, at times and in situations which admit of no disguise, and which draw forth all our secret foibles and who, at best, has neither a sober nor impartial judgment. Still, however, I will do my best. If I blame you, your pride may occasionally impute it to my ignorance; if I praise, your modesty will naturally suggest some doubts of the sincerity of one, who sets a very high value on your good opinion, and who thinks your smiles cheaply bought, even at the price of some duplicity.

And now to begin: but how? With the person to be sure. Beauty is never of small moment in a woman's eye, and that is a cause of deep regret to those, who love true female dignity, happiness and virtue. In the passion for beauty, shall we find the source of all the follies, and many of the crimes of women. So common is this passion, that, though a distinction of the sex, it is no characteristic of the individual. And yet had I a seraph's eloquence, it should be incessantly exerted to persuade the woman whom I value, that, inasmuch as she prizes beauty (particularly if she herself be beautiful), is she silly, wicked, or unfortunate. After this, you will hardly expect me to say any thing of your person.

But there is another reason for my silence: my decision would be no test of the truth. The female form generally pleases in different degrees, according as it is viewed in different lights, at different hours, and by different eyes. The sentence of to-day, suggested by negligence of dress, capricious behaviour, or unamiable sentiments, would be reversed to-morrow, at the intercession of a few smiles and affabilities, or at the pleading of a robe, brilliantly fair, and enchantingly becoming. So, we'll say nothing of thy person, Madelina.

Are you witty? Are you amiable? Are you wise? How hard to answer these questions, so as to convey, to the object of our scrutiny, our precise meaning! I am almost afraid to proceed. To tell the truth is not always to make either wise or happy; and, when the truth breeds nothing but resentment or misery, why should it be told?... But come, in order to be safe, I will sketch what I think a good character, and leave it to you to find its resemblance to yourself.

The good girl, whom I wish to meet with, has a face that nothing but the soul within makes beautiful. It never yet was clouded by anger; never yet had peevishness, resentment, envy, even a momentary place in it. The perverseness or malignity of others cannot be so great or incessant, as to conquer her patience. Her charity is large enough to take in every offence. Her penetration is clear enough to see the guilt and folly of impatience, in any situation. She has no sullen looks; no hasty plaints; no keen retorts; all is placid suifrance, and heavenly serenity. She is good, inasmuch as she never treats others hardly or capriciously. She is perfect, inasmuch as the injuries of others, so far from provoking vengeance, never even cause indignation, nor stop the current of that charity that flows for all.

She cultivates her mind, by regular and close attention to every profitable study. She has leisure, and the greatest part of it is spent in reading. She deems this an amusement indeed, but also a duty. She indulges, without scruple, that inclination, which leads her to works of taste, fancy, and domestic morality, because she regards these as the regulators, sweeteners, and embellishers of life; but while these are her favourite pursuits, she by no means despises or shuns the more rugged paths of history or science.

Still, however, she is no bookworm, no recluse, no pedant. She meditates and reasons for herself, and her studious hours are betrayed, not by mere literary talk, by anecdotes of authors, and criticisms on their works, by hard words, and formal quotations, but by a certain dignity of thought, and refinement of language, which nothing but familiar converse with books can give, and which diffuse themselves through all her conversation.

She is fond of society. The worthy and intelligent she seeks and caresses; the gay, thoughtless, frivolous, immoral, or indecent, she treats, when she meets them, with strict politeness, but she never seeks them, and is at home to them as rarely as possible. She endures their company, when unavoidable, but you cannot subject her to a more mortifying penance.

In her dress, she studies not merely the decent and becoming, but also the frugal. One of her chief cares is to shun all superfluous expenses. She always remembers, that her family are not opulent; that she has no independent provision. To-morrow may ravish from her grasp the frail and precarious props that uphold her. This reflection has made her a pattern of economy and industry. She is, in many respects, her own laundress, and, in all respects, her own sempstress.

She well knows the magic graces that flow from personal purity and habits of delicacy. Beauty is bestowed by some power beyond ourselves. It most commonly entails on the possessor infinite depravity and folly, and can never confer any real good. A temper, serene amidst the evils of life, and the fluctuations of others, forbearing and affectionate to all; manners, soft, mild, full of dignity and personal decorum, constitute the lasting power, the bewitching grace, the irresistible charm.....but if I run on thus, I shall write a volume, instead of a letter; so I will stop here, and ask you, Madelina, in what respects this creature of my fancy resembles you?

Are you studious? Do you spend a certain portion of each day in reading? Were the reflections of any five minutes of your life suggested by any thing you met with in a book? Are any of the terms or ideas, which occur in your conversation, derived from this source? Are your friends and intimates distinguished by their charitable, devout, thoughtful, and home-loving habits? Are none of them vain, giddy, ridiculously prejudiced or spoilt by fashion?

Are you diligent and economical? Do you spend nothing upon superfluities? Have you, in all you buy, or all you do, a view to future independence, to be raised on your own efforts? Do you perform, for yourself, all that decency permits, and that a noble humility, a laudable frugality requires you to do?

Is your temper benign and equable? Do you never repine at the want of those advantages of person and fortune, which others possess? Would not a splendid villa and an equipage atone for many misfortunes of yourself and friends?

But let me, above all, inquire, whether rational piety, its sanctions, duties, and consolations, are any thing to you but empty sounds? Have the ideas of a future state, a pure and all-seeing eye, ever found a moment's place in your thoughts? Are you at all acquainted with that principle, which enables us to love merit, though beautiful or rich, and to look down with pity on arrogance and pomp?

To some of these questions, candour may oblige you to answer, but not without reluctance; and your heart, impatient of blame, may whisper....“I have as much of these estimable qualities, as most others. I can scarcely point out one of my acquaintance, who (no older than I) has more simplicity, frugality, industry, charity, candour, or devotion. If I err, my judgment, and not my inclination, is to blame. I ardently wish to attain all that is good, graceful, and lovely in the female character. I am always striving to attain them, and the failure of my efforts humbles and distresses me.

“Above all things, I want to be reputed sensible and learned, but my poor head will not allow it. I cannot keep alive my curiosity for books. When I read, unless it be some fashionable play or novel, all is tedious, dark, and unintelligible: but I did not chuse my own understanding, and I cannot re-create myself; and, though nature will not second my wishes, to reach the highest place, yet I am not the very lowest in the scale. I know myself to possess some sense, some generosity, a heart that is both pure and warm, and principles that will never let me stoop to meanness or falsehood; and my great comfort is, that few are better than me, many, very many that are worse.”

Thy pleas, Madelina, are perfectly just. Inclination and zeal will go far to make us better, but they will not do every thing; and whatever charm there may be in diffidences and disclaimings, it is absurd and pernicious to give up our dues. I rejoice in thy anxiety for improvement, and applaud thee for respecting thyself. In looking round, I also find very few that are thy superiors, but very many that are, in all estimable qualities, much below Madelina.

[The following essay is not only a humorous Satire upon the romances of the circulating library, but is a just reprehension of the levity and licentiousness of those Angelinas and Celestinas, who have exchanged a washing-tub for a writing-desk.]

AN ESSAY ON THE MODERN NOVEL.

IT is a misfortune, incident to human nature, that its finest qualities may be perverted to the most destructive ends. Love, the brightest spark that enlightens the soul, burns frequently for the impurest purposes, and lends its rays too often to inflame the eyes of lust, and to light the adulterer to his couch. Having erected his empire, in a greater or less degree, in every breast, he reigns every where. There's ne'er a mother's son between this and the Antipodes, from beardless sixteen up to grey-beard sixty, who has not struggled at some period of his life in the Cytherean net, and confessed the power of the blind god. But let them describe the impulses that push them forward into the snare, and you will find they have worshipped some other deity than real love; some usurper, who has borrowed his name and authority. From the beginning it has been so, and to the end it will continue so; for the present age, with all its refinements, is more distant from the knowledge of real love, than were our forefathers of the fifth century.

It would be an amusing study to a speculative mind, to observe how this fascinating something has played upon the folly and invention of mankind through all ages. It has exhibited its pranks and whimsies in a thousand different scenes, and in every shape that vanity or fancy could devise, has paid its addresses to the heart. Love is the Proteus of heaven; and, had the ancients known the full extent of his qualities, and seen what we have seen, no doubt they had given him the proper attributes of that character.

But of all the artillery which love has employed to brighten eyes, and soften hearts, the most effectual and forcible is the modern novel. Of all the arrows which Cupid has shot at youthful hearts, this is the keenest. There is no resisting it. It is the literary opium, that lulls every sense into delicious rapture; and respecting the bias of a young lady's mind one may venture to turn out the Nobie's and Robson's, with half a dozen of their greasy combustible duodecimos against the nurse, the mother, and the common-prayer-book....ay, and they would conquer them too. These gentlemen are real patriots, never-failing friends to the propagation of the human species. They have counteracted all the designs of the British senate against matrimony; and, in contempt of the marriage act, post chaises and young couples run smoothly on the north road. All this, and more, we owe to novels, which have operated like electricity on the great national body, and have raised the humble spirit of citizens to a parallel with the veriest pomp of quality in the coterie.

But what charms all ranks of people in these productions is the manner....Unrestrained by that disgusting simplicity, that timid coyness, which checked the fancies of former ages, the modern muses are stark naked: and it were no vague assertion to declare, that they have contributed more than any other cause to debauch the morals of the young of the fair sex. Novels, according to the practice of the times, are the powerful engines with which the seducer attacks the female heart, and if we judge from every days experience, his plots are seldom laid in vain. Never was there an apter weapon for so black a purpose. Tricked out in the trappings of taste, a loose and airy dishabille, with a staggering gait and a wanton eye, the modern muse trips jauntily on, the true child of fashion and folly. By tickling the ear, she approaches the heart, and soon ruins it; for, like all other prostitutes, she is plausible and fascinating, and has "her winning ways." A wretched levity of thought, delivered at random in an incoherent style, passes current for sentiment, and so alertly has this mental jargon played its part, that our young ladies begin to throw out Steele and Addison to make room for H— and De Verger. An ingenious author of this age has given us in a few lines the following admirable receipt to make a modern novel.

Take a subject that's grave, with a moral that's good,
Throw in all the temptations that virtue withstood;
And pray let your hero be handsome and young,
Taste, wit, and fine sentiment flow from his tongue;
And his delicate feelings be sure to improve,
With passion, with tender soft rapture, and love.
And some incidents too, which I like above measure,
Such as those I have read, are esteemed as a treasure,
In a book that's entitled....The Woman of Pleasure;
Mix well, and you'll find 'twill a novel produce;
Fit for modest young ladies....to keep it for use.

To do justice to the bard, he has chalked out the outlines very gracefully, and justly described the ingredients for making this literary pill operate against morality. But lest any reader mistake the author's meaning, here follows a letter, worked up to the very humour of the times, and stamped with the true current mark and signature of 1792. It is fraught with style, manner, and sentiment; and the next worthy gentleman, who gives a three guinea novel in two volumes, is welcome to insert it in his work.

LETTER XVI.

Lady Juliana Glanville to Miss Henrietta Wentworth.

Heigho! Wentworth! who could have thought it?...What a foolish thing is a fond fluttering heart! How often have you told me what a metal mind was made of!....Hard as it was, O'Brien's eyes have melted it!....The dear youth saw and conquered!....Your friend is no longer free....Oh! the dear enchanting scenes around Glanville castle, that once delighted my innocent hours....Ye lowering forests....myrtle shades....crystal streams....and cooing turtles....ye have no more charms for me....none....unless O'Brien be there.

Rocks from your caves repeat the plaintive strains,
And let the mournful tale be echo'd o'er the plains.

....And so, my dear, I'll tell you how it was....I went last night to the Grove assembly, in company with the Miss Seymours and that fright, Bluffton... By the bye, my dear, is not that fellow a dreadful creature;....huge and horrid....how I hate him!.... So, my dear, as I was saying, we all met together....I dressed in my white satin and silver, and pinned up my hair with my new Barbelot's brilliant....a propos....how do you like my last suit of Brussels?....And, just as we were going to cross the style, whom should I see peeping on the other side of the hedge, but....O'Brien! lovely and enchanting as he was when I saw him last winter at Carlisle house?...I instantly feigned illness, and turned up the lane to return; when O'Brien, with an angel's swiftness, flew over the hedge....and we both dissolved in tears....O! sweet sensibility! why was my heart formed with more than woman's softness; why was O'Brien formed with more than manly grace....It was in a bower composed of honeysuckles and jessamine that we reclined....The dear youth spoke a thousand tender things with his eyes, and I answered him with sighs and with blushes....Seated in a deep embowering shade....lips trembling....hearts beating....locked in each other's arms....what a dangerous situation! and the discourse on love!

.....And Oh! his charming tongue
Was but too well acquainted with my weakness!
He talked of love, and all my melting heart
Dissolv'd within my breast.

Do you know Wentworth, that I was violently inclined to play the fool? We found ourselves lavishing encomiums on disinterested love and a cottage. His description was animated to the last degree. My whole attention was engrossed. He held my hand, tenderly pressed between his, while I listened to his soothing tale. His eyes were still more eloquent than his bewitching tongue.

I was almost a lost woman; when, fortunately for me, the idea of squalling brats, and matrimonial bitters, darted across my thought. Up I sprang. A fine day for a walk, cried I; and away I tripped. I had nothing for it but flight. He followed me, dejected,....his arms folded. He looked amazingly handsome. But prudence kept her seat in my breast: prudence, you know, is the foil of love. We strolled towards the house, without any other conversation, except expressive sighs on his side.... half-stifled ones and stolen glances on mine. I flew to the harpsichord to rouse my spirits. He drew a chair near me; and, leaning on the instrument, fixed his languishing eyes on my face. My fingers involuntarily touched soft plaintive notes. Instead of a sprightly air, out came a ditty, as melancholy as "The babes in the wood." He perceived my swimming eyes....he perceived my confusion; and, snatching the moment of love, he threw himself on his knees, looked moving, and swore,

While youthful splendor lighten'd in my eyes,
Clear as the smiling glory of the skies,
More white than flax my curling tresses flow'd
My dimpled cheeks, with rosy beauty glow'd.

Enchanting lines! are not they, Wentworth?... Well! and what followed?...you ask me....Ay, there's the rub....but positively you shan't know till my next letter....Heigh ho! Adieu, Henrietta....and tell me how your affair with the baronet goes on....Adieu, my dear, and remember your sighing, and almost ruined cousin,

JULIANA GLANVILLE.

What effect such graceless raptures and broken periods may produce on untutored miads, let ten thousand boarding-schools witness. This contagion is the more to be dreaded, as it daily spreads through all ranks of people; and miss, the tailor's daughter, talks now as familiarly to her confidant, Miss Polly Staytape, of swains and sentiments, as the accomplished dames of genteel life. In a word if a man of sense has an inclination to chuse a rational woman for his wife, he reaches his grand clinacteric before he can find a fair one to trust himself with....so universal is the corruption!.... These are the fatal consequences of novels!

LEVITY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

HAVING observed, in a late paper, some cases, proving the efficacy of leeches, in drawing off the bad blood and viscid humours of the system, we may expect to see the body-politic thoroughly drained, as a large number of hungry animals of that description have fastened themselves thereon, and are sucking with that avidity which results from a state of previous starvation. E.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LONDON FASHIONS FOR FEBRUARY.

A cap of lace, drawn up close behind, and finished with a lace frill; a coquelicot feather or flower in front.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

The prevailing colours are scarlet, purple, yellow, and brown. Short pelisses, lined with scarlet or purple, and trimmed all round with fur, are very much worn; the petticoats are generally trimmed with narrow flounces. Except in very full dress, flowers are more adopted than feathers; the most favourite flowers, at present, are those intermixed with steel beads and bugles.

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

Buff colour satin hats, with amaranthus colour drapery, are very fashionable, as are apricot velvet hats, trimmed with amaranthus colour ribbons, with gold stripes, and feathers of the same colour, others of capucine colour velvet, with ribbons the same colour, and some of pale blue velvet, with blue feathers. The head-dresses in hair, that were entirely out of fashion, are again in favour; some ornamented with a polished steel diadem. The caps worn under turbans are, in general made of black velvet, spangled instead of poppy colour.

POLITICS.

MINISTERIAL ADROITNESS,

Or the newest and most approved method of EXPEDITING

LEGISLATIVE BUSINESS;

Being a history of the rise, progress, and final passage of One Bill, in One House of the National Legislature.

Extract of a letter from Washington to the Editor of the Gazette of the United States.

"Though you find, in the National Intelligencer, a correct statement of the most important votes, which are taken in the house of representatives, and a very smooth account of the course of proceedings, yet you get no adequate idea of the ministerial mode of transacting business. You will, indeed, occasionally find very unwarrantable statements in that paper, whenever, in the opinion of the editor, the character of his party requires from him that kind of aid. In the Intelligencer of Wednesday, the twenty-fourth of March, it is asserted, that the discussion of the bill, for relieving the luxuries of life from the burden of taxes, continued with little intermission for six days, during which the house sat to a late hour, notwithstanding repeated motions made by the minority to adjourn. In this unusual devotion to public business, the citizens will discern a laudable solicitude to terminate the session at the earliest period."

"It is to be hoped that this indecent misrepresentation is chargeable only upon the editor of the Intelligencer, and that he has not been put upon it by some man of more consequence.

"Notwithstanding repeated motions made by the minority to adjourn....The fact is, that on four successive days, out of the six here mentioned, the ministerial party adjourned in great confusion, for the purpose of devising ways and means to extricate themselves from the embarrassments into which they were thrown by their own proceedings.

"Inasmuch as an examination of the subject has been provoked, I will give you a history of this bill, which, in the opinion of the Intelligencer, reflects so much honour upon the industry, skill, and perseverance of the ministerial party.

"The committee of ways and means, which reported this bill, and of which Mr. Randolph of Virginia is chairman, was appointed on the second day of the session. After a good deal of delay, which exhausted the patience of several of the party, Davis of Kentucky moved a resolution for the repeal of the internal taxes, and stated as his reason, the delay of the committee of ways and means upon this subject. Even the Aurora thought some apology necessary, and informed us that the committee had resolved to mature the business before they brought it forward, and to introduce it to the house in a perfect state, so that it might be acted upon with promptness and without embarrassment.

"At length, after sitting precisely three months, Mr. Randolph introduced his well matured bill to repeal the internal taxes. The bill was referred to a committee of the whole house on Monday, the 15th of March. Some discussion took place on the merits of this perfect bill, and Mr. Randolph was convinced that it might be rendered yet more perfect by some slight alteration. He consequently introduced an amendment twice as long as the original bill. A gentleman remarked, that the amendment ought to be printed for the use of the members before acting upon it. Mr. Randolph said that was his object: but he had several other amendments to propose, and thought it best to have them all printed at once. It was mentioned that no other amendment could be submitted while that was pending; but the gentleman might withdraw his first amendment, and offer the others with it, after which the whole might be printed.

"Mr. Randolph accordingly withdrew his long amendment, but not exactly understanding what was to be done next, he moved that the committee rise, and as soon as the speaker had resumed the chair, moved that the long amendment be printed.

"Mr. Griswold observed, that he had no objection to an order for printing; but it must be an order to print a paper in that gentleman's pocket. No amendment was before the house....none had been reported by the committee of the whole. The ministerial gentlemen knew not how to proceed. Mr. Randolph made a long speech....but the difficulty still remained. At length Mr. Randolph moved to go back into committee of the whole, for the purpose of starting anew. The house accordingly resolved itself into a committee of the whole, and the long amendment was again proposed, upon which the committee rose, and the house ordered the amendment to be printed.

"Mr. Randolph did not chuse to hazard another step that day, and accordingly moved for an adjournment at an early hour, and the motion was carried. Of course, this was not a 'motion by the minority.'

"On Tuesday, the bill for repealing the internal taxes was again resumed. A number of new objections were urged against this perfect bill, and Mr. Randolph and his friends finding themselves unable to obviate them were again disconcerted. A motion was made to recommit it to the committee of ways and means. It was said to be so immature, that the committee of the whole, and the house could not advantageously proceed upon it, in its present form. Mr. Randolph admitted the force of the objections, complained that gentlemen on the other side of the house only pointed out errors, without assisting to correct them, but objected to the recommitment. Such was the imperfect state of the bill, and so evident was the necessity of drawing it anew, that the little David of Legislation, after one or two long speeches, finding that the question could no longer be evaded, called for an adjournment, after the speaker had risen and stated the question to the house, but before the vote could be taken. The adjournment was carried by the ministerial party, though the other side of the house voted against it.

"When the House met on Wednesday, Mr. Randolph introduced another long string of amendments, which he hoped would remedy the faults complained of, and spare him the mortification of a recommitment. A great part of the day was spent in hearing the arguments of the ministerialists to prove that these amendments would answer the purpose; and finally, after the amendments had been amended by an entire new section, which Mr. Goddard introduced, and by an alteration of several others, they were adopted. Mr. Dennis then moved to strike out of the first section, the words 'sales at auction,' and to insert 'coffee,' and gave notice that he intended to move further amendments; by substituting brown sugar, bohea tea, and salt, in place of some of the refined articles named in the bill, for the purpose of trying the principle, whether the surplus revenues should be spared exclusively from luxuries, or in part from the necessities of life. The ministerial party did not wish to have this comparison appear upon their journals, and, as the best expedient, which occurred to them to avoid it, called for a division of the question, so that the votes upon striking out and inserting should be taken separately. This was objected to, as not in order; it was said that the motion was a simple proposition, and consequently not divisible, by the rules of the house. It was referred to the speaker, who decided that the question was not divisible. The party, not to be thwarted in their course by rules of the house, and decisions of their own speaker, appealed from the decision of the chair. The question being put, 'Is the decision of the chair in order?' the ministerialists, tenacious of their purpose, and willing to compass their end, whatever might be the means, determined in the negative. Here a whimsical farce commenced respecting the second part of the motion. These wise legislators, with the little man of slings at their head, had imagined that by carrying the first part of the motion in the negative, and leaving no place designated for the insertion of the word coffee, they would be able to evade that part of the question, and pursuing the same course with the amendments which they knew were to follow, congratulated themselves upon a new discovery, by which they expected to keep their journals free from the mention of those articles of necessity, which the constitutionalists wished to substitute for the luxuries named in the bill. But here again they were brought up, as the sailors say, all standing, by another rule of the house, and by a positive declaration of the speaker, that the question must be put. After nearly an hour had been consumed, and no way discovered to get out of the perplexity, a reconsideration of the vote for dividing the question, was moved and seconded. After a variety of remarks upon this motion, the speaker rose to put the question, when an adjournment was called for and carried, by the ministerial side of the house.

"On Thursday, after commencing the proceedings of the day in a very curious and novel manner, which will be noticed further on, the house proceeded to consider some further amendments, offered by Mr. Randolph, and General Smith, of Maryland. After the usual time of adjournment, and when the members appeared to be exhausted by the labours of the day, an adjournment was asked for by one of the constitutionalists, in order, as is believed, to give Mr. Griswold an opportunity of submitting to the house a number of arguments against the bill, but which he thought would not be heard with patience at so late an hour. On this solitary occasion, it is true, that a motion was made by the constitutionalists to adjourn, and was not carried. Mr. Griswold went into a very able and conclusive argument, which detained the house to a very late hour. A motion was then made further to amend the bill, by inserting, after the words 'stamped vellum, parchment, and paper,' the words 'and the duties on imported brown sugar.' Mr. Randolph had now got through with all the amendments, which he had to offer. He began to look, with extreme solicitude, upon this favourite child of his legislative labour. It had cost him many 'throes and convulsions' in the production, and much anxiety and perplexity in the nurturing; and he became, every moment, more and more desirous of seeing it out of the reach of those, who had been all along unkindly pointing out to him deformities, which his paternal eye had not discerned, and who, for ought that he knew, might still discover as many more, should time be given them to examine it. He therefore hoped that the bill would be ordered to be engrossed before the house should adjourn; and for the purpose of saving time, and coming at a prompt decision, he said he would move for the previous question, upon the amendment last proposed. The motion being seconded, it was put by the speaker in these words 'Shall the main question be now put?' And it was carried in the negative by the ministerial sect. Having thus cut the business short, and as they shrewdly imagined, surmounted all obstacles, they triumphantly called for the question on engrossing. But here again, like an ill omen, a rule of the house thwarted their course, and once more put them at a stand. The speaker declared that the bill could not be engrossed, while a motion to amend was pending, and this motion, he said, had been hung up by the previous question just taken. Upon this, the ministerial gentlemen began to manifest some doubt of the expediency of the mode, which they had adopted for saving time, and coming at a prompt decision. They attempted to retrace their steps, and called for the question on the amendment, upon which the previous question had been taken. Here also, they were equally entangled; for the speaker declared, in conformity with the rules of the house, that it was not in order to put the main question on any motion the same day on which the previous question on such motion had been put and carried in the negative. It was now evident, that nothing further could be done without getting rid of these rules, and for that purpose Mr. Elmendorf, who has sometimes been called the bird of wisdom, demanded to appeal from the decision of the speaker. Here again the sect were reduced to the perplexing alternative, either of going directly in the teeth of all rules of order, and again deserting their speaker, or else of stopping short, and abandoning the triumph of a prompt decision. In this dilemma an adjournment was called for, and carried, but not by the minority.

"Having thus stated to you the manner, in which the ministerialists closed their sessions upon four of the days occupied in the business of repealing the internal taxes, I will now give you an account of the manner, in which some of those sessions commenced. The Intelligencer continues:

"In this unusual devotion to public business, the citizens will discern a laudable solicitude to terminate the session at the earliest period. It is a very hard thing to decide upon men's intentions, and I will not undertake to say that the ministerial gentlemen are not solicitous to expedite public business: but if I were disposed to write their eulogium, knowing the progress, which they have made during the present session, and particularly knowing the history of the bill now under consideration, I should never mention that solicitude, lest I should be thought either to satirize them, or to impeach their talents. Will the Intelligencer place to the account of this solicitude, the two hours and a half spent by these gentlemen on Thursday, in making, debating, and withdrawing motions to amend the minutes of the day before? The parts, which they wished to have stricken out were those, which recorded the decision of the chair on the indivisibility of Mr. Dennis's motion, and that, which says that a debate arose upon a question of order. It was said by the ministerialists, who were in favour of striking out, that the journals ought not to contradict the positive rules of the house, and those rules direct that no debate shall be had upon a question of order. On this occasion, Mr. Davis, who is rather stubborn, and not so well broken in as the generality of the sect, rebelled, and declared that if the journal was not consistent with the rules of the house, it was consistent with truth, and with the proceedings, which it recorded, and that he should vote against striking out. Several of the constitutionalists opposed the motion. They said that the constitution compelled the house to keep a journal, and the sole object was to enable the public to judge whether their proceedings were correct and proper or not. The precedent of sulking out, what all acknowledged to be a true statement of facts, was dangerous in the extreme. If the majority were at liberty to record only such parts of their proceedings as they might chuse, the intention of the constitution would be frustrated, and the house might as well keep no journals. Mr. Bayard said, that if gentlemen would run themselves into excesses, and contravene the rules of order, for the purpose of coming at an object, which they had in view, and, after sleeping upon it, could come into the house and new-model their journals, in conformity with their cooler judgment, it would be better to keep no journals, for they could answer no purpose but to deceive the public and posterity. He insisted, that though the majority have the physical power of controuling their own journals, and rendering them what they please, yet, in justice and propriety, they can exercise that power only in rendering the record conformable with the facts which it records. This was acknowledged on all hands to be the case in the present instance. He said if the principle now contended for by the other side of the house should prevail, he should not be surprized at seeing a motion brought forward, to erase from the journals the yeas and nays, whenever the majority might wish to conceal the names of those, who had voted for or against any particular measure. It was said in reply, that the journals are entirely in the power of the house, and I think it was Elmendorf, but it was certainly some one of the sect, who declared that the majority might, if they pleased, expunge the yeas and nays. After many other remarks, which it would not be convenient for you, nor very honourable for our national legislature, to lay before the public, the motion was withdrawn.

"Mr. Randolph moved to amend that part of the journal, which stands in these words:

"Another motion was then made and seconded, farther to amend the bill, by striking out in the said first section thereof, the words 'sales at auction,' for the purpose of inserting in lieu thereof, the word 'coffee.'

"The proposition was to strike out of the journal the words 'for the purpose of,' and the words 'in lieu thereof,' in order to insert the word 'and,' so as to make the journal read 'by striking out in the said first section thereof, the words sales at auction, and inserting the word coffee.' Upon this motion Mr. Bacon made a long speech, and apparently proved to his own satisfaction, that a very nice distinction ought to be taken between the import of the words, 'and inserting,' and the words 'for the purpose of inserting.' He said that as the motion stood recorded upon the journal, there could be no doubt that it was a simple proposition; that it could not be divided; and that he, on the appeal from the decision of the chair, had voted wrong in declaring that decision to be not in order. But the case, he insisted, would be very different upon a question put in the other form. If you had ever heard this old gentleman speak, you would feel no inclination to see his arguments recapitulated in this place. Suffice it to say, that he made a long speech, and so convincing was it, that as soon as he sat down, Mr. Randolph withdrew his motion. The motion made the evening before, to reconsider the vote for dividing Mr. Dennis's motion, was then called up and disposed of, and the house proceeded to business between two and three o'clock, about the usual time of adjourning.

"On Friday morning, a similar scene was acted over, with some alterations and embellishments. It commenced upon the reading of the following part of the minutes of Thursday:

"A call was then made for the question to engross the bill, in order to its being read a third time.

On which call,

Mr. Speaker declared, that, in his opinion, it was not in order to engross the bill, until the main question on the motion on which the previous question had been called for and taken, should be put and decided by the house: and it was further the opinion of the chair, it was not in order to call for, or put the main question on any motion, the same day on which the previous question on such motion was called for, and decided in the negative, by the house. Whereupon, an appeal was demanded from the decision of the chair."

"A motion was made by Mr. Nicholson, to strike out the whole of this part of the journal. It was debated for a considerable time, and many arguments were urged to prove, that the proceedings of the speaker are not proceedings of the house. It was suggested in reply, that there was an appeal pending from these very decisions; that the vote on that appeal must be recognized by the clerk: and that the journal would be absurd, should it state the proceedings on an appeal from a decision, which should not appear to have ever been made. Some one rose and said, if Mr. Elmendorf would withdraw his appeal, this objection would be obviated. Mr. Elmendorf then rose and said, that he would withdraw the appeal. The speaker informed him, that it was not in order to withdraw any motion, while another motion was pending before the house. Mr. Nicholson withdrew his motion to expunge. Mr. Randolph immediately renewed it. Another debate ensued? Mr. Gregg of Pennsylvania was ashamed of his party, and declared, that a new mode of proceeding had found its way into that house. He said, he had never witnessed any thing of this kind in former sessions, and did not think that any honour was reflected upon the legislature or the nation by such proceedings. One of the constitutionalists moved for the yeas and nays on the question for expunging. A sufficient number of members rose in favour of taking them. If the question had been so taken and carried, it would have been the duty of the clerk to enter the question at large, together with the yeas and nays, in the minutes for Friday, so that the obnoxious passage would still have appeared in the journal. This being suggested, Mr. Randolph withdrew his motion, and the ministerialists abandoned the expunging plan.

"The journal being thus left to speak the truth, Mr. Elmendorf rose, and withdrew the appeal which he had made from the decision of the speaker, just before the last adjournment. Upon this, Mr. Dawson rose and renewed the appeal. The decision being again read by the clerk, a division of the question on the appeal was called for, and the vote was taken accordingly upon the separate parts of the decision. Some of the ministerialists, on this occasion, deserted their standard, and voted with the constitutionalists. The consequence was, that both parts of the decision were declared to be in order: and so the house was once more ready to proceed to business.

"The bill to repeal the internal taxes was then resumed, and the motion on which the previous question had been taken, on Thursday, was called up. As no project for saving time and making a prompt decision was now offered, the amendment was soon disposed of. After this, a new section was added. A call was then made for engrossing the bill. Mr. Griswold hoped that bill would be printed. He said it had undergone so many and such various amendments, that scarcely any thing of the original bill remained, and declared for one, that he did not understand it. Mr. Randolph hoped it would not be printed. He hoped it would have a third reading, and pass that day. It was said, in reply, that the bill could not possibly be passed on that day, as time must be taken for engrossing it, and it was already a late hour. Several of the ministerialists concurred in the wish that the bill might be printed. They acknowledged, that so far were they from comprehending the bill with all its amendments, that they could not even tell the number of amendments which had been made to it. Mr. Randolph began to fear that his troops were not sufficiently disciplined. Several of them indicated symptoms of desertion. He resolved, if possible, to rally them, and bring them back to a state of due subordination. He assured them, in a tone of authority, that there was no obstacle in the way of the final passage of the bill; that it was already engrossed, and might immediately be read a third time and passed. He reminded them of the opposition and perplexity which they had met with in the progress of the bill; complained of the delay occasioned by so often taking votes, by yeas and nays; and, to put their allegiance to the severest test, concluded by declaring, that he should be DISAPPOINTED and MORTIFIED if the bill should not finally pass, before the adjournment of the house. Mr. Davis again became restive. He said, he could see no reason why the time might not as well be spent in taking yeas and nays, as in making and withdrawing motions to expunge the journals, and in trying appeals from decisions of the speaker. 'I am astonished,' said he, 'at the assertion of the gentleman, that the bill is already engrossed: I cannot understand him...it is not true...we are now considering the question of engrossing...it has not been taken; and yet the gentleman tells us the bill is engrossed. I do not understand such proceedings.' Several gentlemen hoped that the bill would be engrossed, and ordered for a third reading on Monday, and that, in the mean time, it would be printed for the use of the members. This order was accordingly taken, and Mr. Randolph was left to fulfil, at his leisure, his promise of disappointment and mortification, at the stubborn disobedience of his men, not twenty of whom voted with him. The bill passed finally on the following Monday, and went up to the senate, where it is undergoing a thorough revision and repair, on account of its imperfections.

"Such have been the real proceedings in this case, which is seized upon by the ministerial print, as affording the best opportunity, which has occurred, of bestowing an eulogium upon the skill and legislative talents of the sect, and of calling upon the citizens to admire and applaud the new order of things. Ab uno disce omnes. From this specimen, and from the commendation bestowed upon it, you may form some idea of the ordinary mode of proceeding."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF SAMUEL BUTLER.

SAMUEL BUTLER, author of the most celebrated burlesque poem in the English, or perhaps in any other language, was the son of a reputable farmer at Strensham in Worcestershire, where he was born, according to one account in 1600, according to another in 1612. After a grammar education at the free school in Worcester, he was sent to Cambridge, where he resided six or seven years. On his return to his own county, he lived some years as clerk to Mr. Jefferys of Earl's Croom, an eminent justice of the peace, where he had leisure enough to prosecute his literary studies, particularly those to which he was most attached, history and poetry. He likewise amused himself with music and drawing. He afterwards lived under the patronage of Elizabeth countess of Kent, where he had access to a well furnished library, and enjoyed the advantage of acquaintance with the learned Selden, who employed him as a secretary or amanuensis. His next residence was with Sir Samuel Luke, a gentleman of ancient family at Cople in Bedfordshire, and a distinguished commander under Cromwell. The manners and principles to which Butler was witness in this place, gave him the hint, and supplied him with the materials of his famous "Hudibras." A caricature of Sir Samuel himself serves for the portrait of the hero, and perhaps some of the knight's actions are ludicrously sketched in the adventures of Hudibras. Whether the poet, in this indulgence of his wit, was guilty of ingratitude could only be determined by a more particular knowledge of the nature of their connection than we possess. After the restoration, Butler was made secretary to Richard earl of Carberry, lord president of Wales, who appointed him steward to the court held at Ludlow castle. About this period he married Mrs. Herbert, a lady of good family and some fortune. The first part of Hudibras was printed in 1663, and no poem was ever more popular, especially with the prevailing party in church and state. It was brought into the notice of the court by that patron of polite literature, the earl of Dorset. Its remarkable passages were got by heart, and served as common-place for quotation, and the king himself was perpetually answering his courtiers out of Hudibras. Yet with all his literary and party merits, the author obtained little more than praise and barren promises; and though it seems to have been a misrepresentation that he was ever reduced to absolute indigence, yet he passed his days in an obscure and narrow condition. An attempt to obtain him the patronage of the witty and profligate Villiers duke of Buckingham failed through the volatility of that nobleman; and Charles II. had too little feeling and too much prodigality to be a munificent rewarder of the humble merit of a man of letters. He is said, indeed, once to have ordered him a gratuity of 300l. which the poet honourably devoted to the payment of some debts he had been obliged to contract. Respected for his integrity, and beloved by his few intimates for his social qualities, he died in 1680, and was buried in St. Paul's church, Covent-garden (the parish in which he latterly resided), at the expence of his friend Mr. Longueville of the Temple. A monument was erected to his memory among the poets in Westminster-abbey, in 1721, by Alderman Barber, the printer. Its inscription gives credit to the common opinion of his poverty, by these words: "ne cui vivo decrant ferè omnia, deesset etiam mortuo tumulus:"... "lest he who when living wanted almost every thing, should, when dead, also want a tomb."

Hudibras is one of the most original works, in its style and matter, that was ever written. Its leading purpose is to throw ridicule upon the religious and political principles of the puritans, as they appeared after the civil war which overthrew church and state in the reign of Charles I. This is effected by means of the characters of a fanatical knight and his squire, obviously the Don Quixote and Sancho of the piece, who are engaged in a variety of comic adventures, and hold still more comic dialogues. There are three parts of the poem, but it is left unfinished as to the story; its great end, however, of giving vent to inexhaustible wit, keen satire, and learning of the most uncommon and recalcitrant kind, is fully answered; and the reader who is perpetually amused in the progress, cares little for the catastrophe of the work. The diction and versification are often coarse and negligent, yet on the whole they are such as add to the humorous effect; and few will probably agree in opinion with Dryden, that the heroic style and measure would better have suited the authors purpose. The frequent double rhymes, though often very imperfect, give a sort of comic tone to the whole, and sometimes really improve the wit, by coercively bringing together the most incongruous ideas. But besides his powers of diverting by odd and whimsical notions and associations, Butler had much solid knowledge of human life. "He had watched," says Dr. Johnson, "with great diligence the operations of human nature, and traced the effects of opinion, humour, interest, and passion. From such remarks proceeded that great number of sententious distichs which have passed into conversation, and are added as proverbial axioms to the general stock of practical knowledge." (Life of Butler, in Lives of the Poets.) There have been numerous editions of this poem. The most valued is that of Dr. Grey, published in 1744, with large and learned annotations, which the depth of erudition in some of the author's allusions, and the obsoleteness of fact in others, rendered extremely necessary for a full comprehension of his meaning.

It is this work alone which has made Butler famous. After his death, was published, under the title of his "Posthumous Works," a collection of pieces, most of them falsely ascribed to him, and none of much value. A much more respectable publication appeared in 1759, entitled "Genuine Remains in prose and verse of Mr. Butler, from the original manuscripts formerly in the possession of W. Longueville Esq." 2 vols. 8vo. The editor was Mr. Thyer of the Manchester library, and the authenticity of the pieces is indubitably established. The volume, besides a satire on the Royal Society, and other pieces scarcely equal to the author's reputation, contains in a detached form many of the similes and thoughts made use of in Hudibras; which is a proof of the care and attention he bestowed upon the embellishment of that work, the prose consists of characters, and of thoughts on various subjects. The first are drawn with much force and humour. They are not personal, but general, describing various ranks, professions, and designations in society.

LEVITY.

[The following good-humoured article we extract from a London paper.]

THE BALANCE OF POWER;

OR THE NEW NATIONAL SCALES.

THE balance of power has never been understood and maintained, except by three descriptions of people, the ancient states of Greece, the savage tribes of America, and the modern nations of Europe. The savage tribes of America may be classed, in this respect, with the ancient states of Greece, they are both broken to pieces. The nations of Europe either have undergone, or are now suffering, such changes, as give to France a decided preponderance. The balance of power, therefore, no longer exists in any part of the world. How much England has expended in blood and treasure to preserve it, is written in every page of her history. This would be sufficient to prove its immense value, even though we were not assured, from the highest authority, that our safety, nay, our very existence, depends upon its preservation. Ministers must, therefore, be very anxious to repair this loss, and will not surely refuse their approbation to an essay, the sole object of which is to provide a substitute, and to save the country from the peril awaiting the present state of affairs.

It is the duty of every government, to deliberately weigh every measure of internal and external policy, to ascertain to a scruple the true weight of every thing, to see that the good preponderates in all their plans, and, where there is only a choice of evils, to select the lightest. Let us try the conduct of ministers by this test. Upon the annexation of Belgium to France, they said, that measure would give the republic a preponderance in Europe. When we got possession of St. Domingo, they declared that an equivalent for all the expenses of the war. When Paul wanted Malta, we were assured, that that island, thrown into the scale with Russia, would destroy the balance. When the evils of war were complained of, we were told, they were light, when weighed against the miseries which a peace would produce. All this ministers have repeated a thousand times, since the commencement of the war. What do they tell us now? They assure us, through their journals, that St. Domingo, Malta, the Cape, &c. are all of no weight; that they are all mere feathers in the scale, compared with the blessings of peace. As to Belgium, we do not find that it is now considered even worth notice. The inference that necessarily follows from these premises is, that the balance of power, the only one used by ministers upon these occasions, must have been a very false balance; or that ministers must have set down our colonies and conquests at such a weight as fancy or common report chose to state them.

To prevent, then, the recurrence of so fatal an error, and provide a substitute for the lost balance of power, it is proposed, that ministers should immediately provide themselves with a plain London-made pair of scales.... yes, a pair of plain London scales; for it would not be difficult to prove, that, had they weighed the war and all its consequences in the worst pair of steelyards that were ever broken by a market jury, they could not have erred half so much as they have done. The recommendation of the scales necessarily brings with it some directions as to the weights. Had ministers only to weigh a dead vote, or a rotten borough, a few half hundreds might suffice; but, as they will have occasion sometimes to weigh the national debt, and sometimes a little cheese-parings or candle-ends, they will themselves see a necessity for a very great variety. This constitutes the whole plan, in support of which, that it may not be censured as novel, rash, or visionary, the following precedents are appealed to.

In the twenty-second book of the Iliad, we find this description:

"Jove lifts the golden balances, that shew
The fates of mortal men and things below:
Here each contending hero's lot he tries,
And weighs with equal hand their destinies;
Low sinks the scale, surcharg'd with Hector's fate,
Heavy with death it sinks, and hell receives the weight."

Virgil contains a similar allusion. It was also a custom in the Mogul empire to weigh his imperial majesty annually on his birth-day, and if he was found to have increased in weight, to celebrate this increase by public rejoicings; a ceremony purely allegorical, and emblematic of his political increase of weight, power, and dominion, for it is impossible that an increase of fat, which, in its literal sense, is synonymous with an increase of stupidity, could be a just cause for the congratulations of a loyal people.

Should it be objected that these are obsolete cases, a variety of modern precedents will readily suggest themselves. Ministers sent sir James Pultney on the Ferrol expedition, and what was the result? "When I came before the place," says sir James, "I weighed the advantages against the disadvantages, and, finding the latter to preponderate, I declined attack." Thus was preserved, by a good pair of scales, the very army, to which we are indebted for the conquest of Egypt, and which would have been probably lost before Ferrol, if the commander had relied upon the estimate of ministers. Mr. Windham disapproves of the present peace, because its evils more than counter-balance the evils of war. Now it is clear, that no statesman would attempt to decide such an important question by guess. It follows, therefore, that the ex-secretary does his business by a very nice pair of scales. Not to detain the reader unnecessarily.... what is the constitution itself, but such an equipoise of its three parts, the king, the lords, and commons, that not any one shall outweigh the rest? a case, which never can happen, except when the scales hang even in equilibrium.

It, therefore, appears from the constitution, and from precedent, as well ancient as modern, that without a good pair of scales all the enterprizes and measures of ministers are mere chance-medley, and that no nice statesman should neglect to provide himself with a pair, particularly now, that he has lost the balance of power, with which our statesmen have so long strove to get through their work. The national advantages resulting from such an improvement are so striking, that any enumeration of them might be felt as an insult to the discernment of the public. We shall merely observe, that in such case we should not be eight years fighting for islands, under the false idea that they were of any solid weight or importance. We should not quarrel with France for Belgium, nor with Paul for Malta, no more than we would seek cause of quarrel in a straw; for of no greater weight are they now found in the scale against the millions of pounds, which they were said to counterbalance. Would lord Hawkesbury take an article from his grocer without weighing? Certainly not. Is then a loaf of sugar a subject of more care and solicitude than a whole plantation? This is to be penny wise and pound foolish, with a vengeance. Not only in all the superior courts of justice, but in every little piec poudre court, we find a pair of scales. Of consequence, justice is there weighed out fairly to the suitors. A pair of scales would be found equally useful in the cabinet. Nor would their benefit stop here. They might be used for weighing men as well as things. To the authorities already advanced, we may add that of Juvenal, in support of this application.

"Expende Hannibalem,"

"Weigh Hannibal." Such is the mode recommended by that great moralist, to ascertain the real value of a great man. What an immense prospect of national advantage does this hint open to the view! Suppose, for example, a new parliament. Let the pockets of each member be searched on his first entrance into the house, and then let him be fairly weighed in the new national scales. After some important debate, let the individuals composing the majority be weighed again. If they shall answer the original weights, of which a register should be kept, then it is a fair majority; but if one shall be found with his pocket full of candle-ends; another stuffed with a slice of a loan; another with a contract; another with a pension; and so on through them all, who will assert, that there has not been some foul play? If such a parliamentary mode of weighing the members on all important questions should be objected to as inconvenient, we might appeal to our glorious trial by jury; according to it, a man is to be tried by his peers, that is, his equals. As such, they enter the box, and as such, they shall give their verdict; the officer of the court, who has them in charge, is sworn that he will not suffer them to receive meat, drink, or candle-light, or indeed any thing that might give an undue weight, until after the verdict.

It requires no argument to prove that a similar practice in St. Stephen's chapel would render it as pure as the King's Bench or the Common Pleas. In this event, party also would have a more correct standard of right and wrong, than the authority of a leader. With the aid of the scales, the most illiterate and stupid would be able to ascertain to a drachm, the real weight and tendency of every measure. They would be able to know to a single barrack, a single place or pension, whether there was too much in the scale of the executive, and too little in that of the legislative. In short, the members would always be able to compare and adjust, with the utmost precision, the prerogative of the crown, and the privileges of the people, and so take care that the one did not preponderate against the other.

JUSTICE.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

JOSEPH GROFF, printer, bookseller, and stationer, No. 75, South Second-street, Philadelphia, proposes to print, by subscription, the whole of the Works of Alexander Pope, Esq. in eight volumes, duodecimo, from the latest and most correct London edition, printed in 1797; with notes and illustrations, by Joseph Warton, D. D. and others. Also from the above valuable edition with notes and illustrations, Pope's Poetical Works in five volumes complete. The first volume of each of these works will be embellished with a handsome engraving of Mr. Pope, taken from a full length portrait, and the only one ever drawn.

The works of this unrivalled genius are so well known, and so universally admired, that it might be deemed presumptuous in the publisher to say much in their commendation. It only remains then, to call the attention to the edition from which it is contemplated to print the one now claiming the patronage of the public, which is the most valuable, correct, and copious, of any now extant. The reviewers speak of it in the highest terms of approbation; extracts might easily be inserted, but it is presumed the reader will receive more satisfaction by perusing the different reviews for 1797 and 1798, than from partial selections.

The prospectus here submitted, presenting a choice of the works, will, it is hoped, meet with general approbation. Those, who have long wished to see an American edition of Pope's Poetical Works, will now have an opportunity of being gratified, by giving their support to the work. And those, who wish to possess his works complete, will have an equal opportunity of obtaining one of the most correct and cheap editions ever published.

CONDITIONS.

I. The work complete will be comprised in eight volumes, duodecimo, printed on a good paper, and handsome type.

II. It shall be delivered, to subscribers, at one dollar a volume, neatly bound and lettered, payable on delivery. [The edition, of which this will be a faithful copy, sells in London at 3l. 12s. sterling.]

III. It shall be put to press, as soon as a number of subscribers are obtained, sufficient to justify the undertaking, and finished with all the expedition that a due attention to neatness and accuracy will admit.

IV. The poetical works complete, will be comprised in five volumes, duodecimo, printed on the same paper and type, and delivered to subscribers at one dollar a volume, payable on delivery, and be, in every respect, conformable to the work complete. The price to non-subscribers will be considerably advanced.

EPICRAM.

WITHIN the grove Maria lean'd
Upon her William's breast,
Her head upon his cheek reclin'd,
Her lips to his were press'd:

When lo! a rustling noise was heard,
Of near-approaching feet,
Maria left her lover's arms,
And sunk upon a seat.

The old duenna hobbled in....
"Here's pretty doings, miss!
"What man is this you come to see,
"What man, what man is this?"

"Oh governess! I do not know,
"But he was very rude,
"For as I pluck'd wild roses here,
"He came from out the wood."

"He seiz'd my hand, he press'd it hard,
 "And talk'd of Cupid's dart,
 "He kiss'd my cheeks, and falsely swore
 "That I had stole his heart.

"But he will come no more, for I "Have very much incens'd him,
 "For when he wish'd to kiss my lips,
 "I rose in arms against him."

FROM THE ANTI-DEMOCRAT.

AN IMPROMPTU.

In one of his late answers to an address, Mr. Jefferson promises his addressers the utmost fidelity in the "gestion of their affairs."

A few days since, an honest swain
 Propos'd this simple question....
 "What can sage Monticello mean,
 By this new word call'd "gestion?"

A stranger, who the problem heard,
 At once resolv'd the question....
 "He thinks our state affairs too hard,
 For aught but his di-"gestion."

SELECTED POETRY.

Extract from a work lately published in England, entitled PERSIAN LYRICS.

FAIR maid of Shiraz, wouldst thou take
 My heart, and love it for my sake,
 For that dark mole my thoughts now trace
 On that sweet cheek on that sweet face,
 I would Bokhara, as I live,
 And Samarcand too, freely give.

Empty the flagon fill the bowl,
 With wine to rapture wake the soul:
 For Eden's self, however fair,
 Has nought to boast that can compare
 With thy blest banks, O Rocnabad!
 In their enchanting scenery clad;
 Nor aught in foliage half so gay
 As are the bow'rs of Mosellay.

Insidious girls with syren eye,
 Whose wanton wiles the soul decoy,
 By whose bewitching charms beguill'd,
 Our love-smit town is all run wild,
 My stoic heart ye steal away,
 As janissaries do their prey!

But ah! no laureat lover's praise
 The lustre of those charms can raise:
 For vain are all the tricks of art,
 Which would to nature ought impart;
 To tints, that angelize the face,
 Can borrow'd colours add new grace?
 Can a fair cheek become more fair
 By artificial moles form'd there?
 Or can a neck of mould divine
 By perfum'd tresses heighten'd shine?

Be wine and music, then our theme;
 Let wizards of the future dream,
 Which unsolv'd riddle puzzles still,
 And ever did, and ever will.

By Joseph's growing beauty mov'd,
 Zuleikha look'd, and sigh'd, and lov'd,
 Till headstrong passion shame defy'd,
 And virtue's veil was thrown aside.

Pe thine, my fair, by counsel led,
 At wisdom's shrine to bow thy head;
 For lovely maids more lovely shine
 Whose hearts to sage advice incline,
 Who than their souls more valued prize
 The hoary maxims of the wise.

But tell me, charmer, tell me why,
 Such cruel words my ears annoy:
 Say, is it pleasure to give pain?
 Can slanderous gall thy mouth profane?
 Forbid it, Heav'n! it cannot be!
 Nought that offends can come from thee:
 For how can scorpion venom drip
 From that sweet ruby-colour'd lip,
 Which, with good-nature overspread,
 Can nought but dulcet language shed?

Thy gazel-forming pearls are strung,
 Come, sweetly, Hafiz, be they sung:
 For Heaven show's down upon thy lays,
 Thoughts, which in star-like clusters blaze.

We subjoin the version of sir W. Jones, for a comparison instead of the prose paraphrase.

Sweet maid, if thou would'st charm my sight,
 And bid these arms thy neck infold;
 That rosy cheek, that lily hand,
 Would give thy poet more delight
 Than all Bochara's vaunted gold,
 Than all the gems of Samarcand.

Boy, let yon liquid ruby flow,
 And bid thy pensive heart be glad,
 Whate'er the frowning zealots say:
 Tell them, their Eden cannot show
 A stream so clear as Rocnabad,
 A bower so sweet as Mosellay:

O! when these fair perfidious maids,
 Whose eyes our secret haunts infest,
 Their dear destructive charms display:
 Each glance my tender breast invades,
 And robs my wounded soul of rest,
 As Tartars seize their destin'd prey.

In vain with love our bosoms glow:
 Can all our tears, can all our sighs,
 New lustre to those charms impart?
 Can cheeks, where living roses blow,
 Where nature spreads her richest dyes,
 Require the borrow'd gloss of art?

Speak not of fate:....ah! change the theme,
 And talk of odours, talk of wine,
 Talk of the flowers that round us bloom:
 'Tis all a cloud, 'tis all a dream;
 To love and joy thy thoughts confine,
 Nor hope to pierce the sacred gloom.

Beauty has such resistless power,
 That e'en the chaste Egyptian dame
 Sigh'd for the blooming Hebrew boy;
 For her how fatal was the hour,
 When to the banks of Nilus came
 A youth so lovely and so coy!

But ah! sweet maid, my counsel hear,
 (Youth should attend when those advise Whom long experience renders sage):
 While music charms the ravish'd ear;
 While sparkling cups delight our eyes,
 Be gay; and scorn the frowns of age.

What cruel answer have I heard!
 And yet, by heaven, I love thee still:
 Can aught be cruel from thy lip?
 Yet say, how fell that bitter word
 From lips, which streams of sweetness fill,
 Which nought but drops of honey sip?

Go boldly forth, my simple lay,
 Whose accents flow with artless ease,
 Like orient pearls at random strung:

Thy notes are sweet, the damsels say
 But O! far sweeter, if they please,
 The nymph for whom these notes are sung.

PROLOGUE,

On opening the theatre, at Sydney, Botany-bay, spoken by the celebrated Mr. Barrington.

FROM distant climes, o'er wide-spread seas we come,
 Though not with much eclat or beat of drum,
 True patriots all, for be it understood,
 We left our country for our country's good;
 No private views disgrac'd our generous zeal,
 What urg'd our travels was our country's weal;
 And none will doubt but that our emigration
 Has prov'd most useful to the British nation.

But you inquire, what could our breasts inflame,
 With this new passion for theatric fame?
 What, in the practice of our former days,
 Could shape our talents to exhibit plays?
 Your patience, sirs, some observations made,
 You'll grant us equal to the scenic trade.

He, who to midnight ladders is no stranger,
 You'll own will make an admirable Ranger.
 To see Macheath we have not far to roam,
 And sure in Filch I shall be quite at home:
 Unrivall'd there, none will dispute my claim
 To high pre-eminence and exalted fame.

As oft on Gadshill we have ta'en our stand,
 When 'twas so dark you could not see your hand,
 Some true-bred Falstaff we may hope to start,
 Who, when well bolstered, well may play his part,
 The scene to vary, we shall try in time
 To treat you with a little pantomime.
 Here light and easy Columbines are found,
 And well-tried harlequins with us abound;
 From durance vile our precious selves to keep,
 We often have recourse to th'flying leap;
 To a black face have sometimes ow'd escape,
 And Hounslow Heath has prov'd the worth of crape.

But how you ask, can we e'er hope to soar
 Above these scenes, and rise to tragic lore?
 Too oft, alas, we forc'd th'unwilling tear,
 And petrified the heart with real fear.
 Macbeth a harvest of applause will reap,
 For some of us, I fear, have murdered sleep;
 His lady too, with grace, will sleep and talk,
 Our females have been us'd at night to walk.

Sometimes, indeed, so various is our heart,
 An actor may improve and mend his part;
 "Give me a horse," bawls Richard, like a drone,
 We'll find a man would help himself to one.
 Grant us your favour, put us to the test,
 To gain your smiles we'll do our very best:
 And, without dread of future Turnkey Lockits,
 Thus, in an honest way, still pick your pockets.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XIV.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

I AM the wife of a very respectable man, who, by his industry, and my economy, has obtained a handsome estate. Being blest with only one son, our mutual care has been to train him in the right path, and teach him rather to be good than great, and, therefore, we avoided sending him to schools, where his learning was to be acquired at the expense of his morals. I have always endeavoured to select his associates, as much as possible, and have devoted my attention to his education, from his earliest infancy to this hour. I instructed him in reading, writing, and English grammar, and his father carried him through the "Schoolmaster's Assistant," when he had just turned his fourteenth year. For the last six years, we have exercised him pretty constantly in the shop, where he has been a most diligent and active assistant to us. After the duties of the day, we always passed our leisure together, and our son having really a relish for books, we have read most English authors. I have been again and again charmed with the sparklings of his genius, and, at the same time, with his prudent conduct, for he has always had free access to the money drawer, and yet never has been extravagant.

View this picture of parental bliss, Mr. Saunter, and then I am sure you will mourn with me the change!

You must know, then, that, early in the last autumn, my son consulted us on the propriety of his becoming a member of a certain club, which is nameless, I believe, strictly. He told us it was composed of literary characters, and that they met on Tuesday, to talk upon all new publications on historical subjects, and now and then to scribble a little for the magazines. So reasonable a desire could not, with justice, be checked, and I declare I was delighted with so judicious a choice, to pass one evening in the week. And, in order that he might not be least among the worthies, his wardrobe was re-fitted; and accordingly, on the following Tuesday, he was enrolled as a member.

The first evening that he passed there, his father and I sat up until he returned, in hopes of being delighted with his description of so enlightened a band; but he stopped all our inquiries, by saying, he was not at liberty to tell either what they did, what they said, or who belonged to the association.

Now, Mr. Saunter, from that night, I have observed a great change in my son. He has never missed a meeting of the club, and his shop duty is hourly more and more neglected. He is reserved and cold to his mother, unmindful of his father's counsel, and passes whole hours in humming a tune, or reciting silly poetry. I often pick up scraps of paper, on which are some of his verses. They are about as unpoetical as silly; and, if I did not fear it would expose him too much, I would send you some of his lines. He also imagines he is a philosopher, and is continually chattering to his visitors about the new light, and a great deal more of like nonsense. In addition to all this, by associating with men, who are more skilled in the learned languages than himself, he has contracted a manner of conversation, which, to us, is wholly unintelligible, and which, I fear, must make him very ridiculous among his acquaintance.

If you will have the goodness to bear with me a little longer, I will endeavour to make you understand what I mean most to complain of, by relating certain instances of his style. He had sold a piece of goods the other day, and the person was to call in half an hour to take it away. I was behind the counter, and he was reading at the other end of the shop. I called to know if that was the man to whom I must give the muslin. He replied, in a masterly style, "ecce homo, mother." The man laughed; and, before I had time to ask him again, was off with the parcel. When I turned round, and entreated him not to give way to a practice, which placed a learned man on a level with the illiterate and foolish, he arose, and, with a Ciceronian air, exclaimed, "Inscientia excellere pulchrum putatur." I have tried every persuasion in my power, to prevent his indulgence in this absurd habit, but I fear my entreaties are vain. I would wish you to let me know what is the meaning of "Non decet te rixari;" for, whenever I begin to advise seriously, he repeats that sentence, with a most sagacious look, and leaves me. His father spoke to him the other day on the subject, and he offended him so much, by roaring out in his face "satis verborum," that he assures me he will not soon forgive him. If we ask him any question, instead of answering, he goes on, as if he was going to make a Latin oration.

The other evening, I had occasion to send the waiter out of the room, during the time of tea, and I asked my son to pour some water in the teapot. When it was about half full, he calls out, do you want plus, mother? I said yes, being entirely ignorant of his question, which he repeated, and I my answer several times, and he really poured the water, until he had wet the tea-board all over, and then sneered at my ignorance, and hoped that now I had a "quantum sufficit." I was vexed, and meant to have severely reproved him, but he instantly bade me a good night, and crying out "Heu ignaræ mentes!" left us to go to club.

Now, Mr. Saunter, I earnestly entreat your interference; and, as he has determined never to listen to any more of his mother's advice, I must beg that you will inform him, that his father means to withhold further pecuniary supplies; and that he will not again be admitted to our society, until he promises to leave off his disgusting pedantry.

I also wish you would throw out a few hints to this intolerable club, which I plainly foresee will be the ruin of all our industrious young men, by giving them a relish, not only for Bacchannalian joys but by making them imagine none can be gentlemen, who have not been to Rome, and are unskilled in the dead languages. If they assemble for the purpose of individual amusement, there are subjects from which they may derive inexhaustible merriment, without making an amiable young man the object of their ridicule; for I suspect they have made my son a philosopher, a Latinist, a pedant, and poet, only to "laugh him to scorn."

Since I have introduced the subject of this club, and as I expect you will satirise them as they deserve, I will mention that it is generally believed, all those anonymous letters which have been sent to you, respecting our sex particularly, were originated in these literary meetings. If this is the case, you ought not to spare them, but, as the champion of the fair sex, and our surest defence against their spleen, you ought to summon all your indignation to attack them.

I hope you will not delay, however, the consideration of my painful situation, and I shall acknowledge myself under great obligations to you.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. FRANCIS'S benefit offered attraction to the frequenters of the boxes, the pit, and the gallery. The Distrest Mother, a Representation of the Grand Federal Procession, and the pantomime of Robinson Crusoe, were the entertainments of the evening. The effect of the tragedy was greatly injured, by the absence of Mrs. Merry. In consequence of her indisposition, the part of Hermione was read by Mrs. Shaw. The procession disappointed the expectation of at least three-fifths of the audience. By that proportion, it was expected that the figures which constituted it were to be "all alive." The expectation was ridiculous enough; but, at the same time, it would perhaps have been more just, had the nature of the procession been generally announced. None would then have been disappointed, and few dissatisfied; for the pasteboard representatives of the partakers of that day's triumph appeared to be neatly executed. Although Robinson Crusoe was much curtailed, the house was detained to a very late hour.

Mr. Cain undertook, for his own benefit, the difficult part of Hamlet. His attempt was an arduous one, and, though not completely successful, he was highly respectable. His most excellent scene was the expostulation with his mother in her closet; he seemed to fail most in the recitation of the animated soliloquy, "To be or not to be." Mrs. Merry, in Ophelia, almost excelled her former excellence. Her "snatches of old tunes" were given "in wringing tones so sooth," that many an eye was moistened with sympathy.

Mr. Wood selected the popular play of the Way to get Married. He appeared himself in the character of Tangent. The excellence of our lamented Moreton in this character, can never be forgotten. Yet, such was Mr. Wood's success, that it challenged universal applause. He was, throughout, spirited and correct, and always retained the easy gestures of a gentleman. Mr. Green, in Captain Faulkner, was highly respectable, and Mrs. Merry's Julia has lost none of its original attraction. In the afterpiece, Mrs. Whitlock gave interest to a part scarcely worthy of her powers; but the imperfections attendant upon the getting up of pieces for a benefit, strangely marred the catastrophe, for some of her coadjutors in the scene seemed to know very little of the "matter in hand."

The classical and elegant comedy of the Rivals was presented, for the benefit of the veteran Morris. It was uniformly well acted. The part of Old Absolute was undertaken by the veteran himself, and his delineation of it, when allowance is made for his advanced age, was highly praiseworthy. Miss Westray gave a finished sketch of what the author designed in Lydia Languish.

For her benefit, which was the next in succession, she took the play of A Bold Stroke for a Husband; a comedy written by Mrs. Cowley, and replete with those contrivances and plots, which are said particularly to distinguish the productions of the female pen. She sustained her part with unremitting vivacity and spirit.

The comedy of More Ways than One, a production of the same writer, was performed, for Mrs. Shaw's benefit, on Friday. It was, in some parts, ably supported; but we were sorry to see neither the name of Mrs. Merry, nor that of Mrs. Whitlock, in the bill.

The arch Blissett invited the town to the Reconciliation, and the Poor Soldier. The former was excellently performed. The latter dragged on most heavily. We were sorry that ill health prevented his appearance in Darby.

The Castle Spectre, and the Children of the Wood, were performed for the benefit of Mr. and Mrs. Jones. The former exerted himself very successfully in Hassan. The return of the latter, after a suspension of her theatrical labours, was cordially welcomed. She sang, with much sweetness, the song of the Day of Marriage, which we have so warmly applauded in a former number. With her other song, we were not so well satisfied.

The popular comedy of Speed the Plough was performed, for the united benefit of Mrs. Snowden, Miss Arnold, and Mr. Usher. This piece seems always to possess attraction. A pantomime, from the French theatre, called La Forêt Noire, was the afterpiece. It is an interesting and well-contrived story; and we rather wonder that it should have been suffered to slumber, during the long interval of six years.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

An original letter from Dr. Johnson to Miss Langton.

London, April 17, 1771.

MADAM,

IF I could have flattered myself that my letters could have given pleasure, or have alleviated pain, I should not have omitted to write to a lady, to whom I do sincerely wish every increase of pleasure, and every mitigation of uneasiness.

I knew, dear madam, that a very heavy affliction had fallen upon you; but it was one of those, which the established course of nature makes necessary, and to which kind words give no relief. Success is, on these occasions, to be expected only from time.

Your censure of me, as deficient in friendship, is, therefore, too severe. I have neither been unfriendly, nor intentionally uncivil. The notice with which you have honoured me, I have neither forgotten nor remembered without pleasure.

The calamity of ill health, your brother will tell you that I have had, since I saw you, sufficient reason to know and to pity. But this is another evil, against which we can receive little help from one another. I can only advise you, and I advise you with great earnestness, to do nothing that may hurt you, and to reject nothing that may do you good. To preserve health, is a moral and religious duty: for health is the basis of all social virtues; we can be useful no longer than while we are well.

If the family knows that you receive this letter, you will be pleased to make my compliments.

I flatter myself with the hopes of seeing Langton, after Lady Rothes's recovery; and then I hope that you and I shall renew our conferences, and that I shall find you willing, as formerly, to talk and to hear; and shall be again admitted to the honour of being, madam,

Your most obedient

And most humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

VING. ÆN.

LANGUAGE has been commonly defined, by grammarians, to be the art of expressing our ideas. Nor was the definition a bad one, during those times, when our rude ancestors were sufficiently uninformed in the ars rhetorica, to speak always what they really thought. But, since we have wisely banished that absurd custom, I should humbly presume, that the aforesaid definition might also be altered, and that, from henceforward, language be entitled the art of concealing our ideas; and I will venture to assert it is used infinitely oftener for the latter purpose than the former, by all ranks and ages, and at all times and in all places. So totally indeed is a regard to veracity excluded from the system of modern ethics, that, were it not for diseases, duns, and wives, who sometimes tell one disagreeable truths, one would imagine that truth, as well as justice, had left this degenerate world, at the expiration of the golden age. And, that I may not take an unfair advantage, I shall say nothing of the numerous tribes, whose situation authorizes, and, in some measure, obliges them to a continual breach of veracity (such as foreign ministers, ladies' maids, lawyers, and physicians, to which list I may also add lovers and their mistresses, who can claim so many precedents in favour of this practice, that they may be said to lie by prescriptive right), and only consider how little attention we all of us pay to truth, in the common intercourse of life.

When my friend, Jack Saunter, enters my room on a fine day, and catches me with my hat in my hand, and one glove on, just ready to enjoy my morning's walk, he would have a strange opinion of my politeness, did I not meet him with a smile, entreat him to sit down, and express myself so wonderfully happy in his company, that one would imagine I thought myself obliged to him, for depriving me of my favourite amusement; and my old acquaintance, Captain Prolix, would think me a brute, did I not express myself highly delighted with the account of the battle of Bunker's-hill, though he well knows I have not heard it, on the most moderate computation, less than two hundred times. Nay, even my old paralytic uncle at ninety-six, would take it very ill, if I did not seem exceedingly alarmed whenever he coughs, though he knows I am to inherit all his fortune, and that he has plagued our whole family these twenty years upon the strength of it! Nay, so utter an aversion have we to truth, that, not satisfied with breaking her laws ourselves, we daily instruct and oblige our servants to do the same; and, if we can afford such a piece of luxury, even hire a stout fellow to stand at our door, and lie by the year.

Nor has poor truth been much better treated in books than in conversation; since, not to mention poets, who have always claimed exemption from her rules, even plain scribblers of prose pay so little regard to her laws, that they commonly bid her boldly defiance in the very preface, scarce any of these ingenious gentlemen forgetting to assure us, that he was not induced to publish his work by love of fame or money, and had no other object in submitting his performance to the public, than a desire of instructing and amending his fellow creatures; and this often too, when the first six pages of his work give the lie to his assertion.

But, of all publications, none are perhaps so deficient in an adherence to truth, as those well-known compositions, which are daily served up with their tea to the inhabitants of this country, and which (perhaps for that very reason) are more studied by all orders of men, than any other work of genius whatever. I need not, after this, add, that I allude to those numerous miscellanies, which, under the titles of Gazetteers, Heralds, Chronicles, and Advertisers, make their appearance, to gratify the curiosity, and encrease the knowledge of all those, whose circumstances are not too narrow to allow them so innocent and cheap a mode of gaining information, and in many of which, it may fairly be said, that there are not four exact truths, in the whole four pages.

Many of my readers have possibly perused the works of Madame Genlis, and may remember a little tale entitled Le Palais de Verité, a place endowed by its tutelary genius with so singular a power, that all, who entered its walls, were obliged to speak their real thoughts, without being themselves sensible that they did so; and the difference between what they say, and what they intended to say, forms some very laughable scenes. I have often wished a few copies of a modern gazette could be struck off within the precincts of this palace; but, as that is impossible, I shall present my readers with an imaginary one, drawn on the above-mentioned plan, and will appeal to their impartial judgment to determine, whether it is not full as entertaining as the Herald, the World, and the Star.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday....The house met this day at four, and the minister, according to his promise of last week, rose to open the budget. He informed the house, that he very much disliked the subject of finance at all times, but that it was particularly disagreeable to him at present, as the expenditure of the last year had exceeded the revenue, by some hundred thousand pounds, and would do so next year in a much greater degree, owing partly to the inefficacy of some late taxes, but chiefly to the enormous pensions he was obliged to grant to his friends; a circumstance, he observed, well known to many in that house; that, as he had not the smallest regard for his country, her present situation gave him no uneasiness; and he was therefore resolved to lay on no new taxes, which might draw odium upon his administration, foreseeing that he should be well able to stand three or four years longer, at which time he purposed accepting of a peerage, and enjoying the remainder of his life, the fortune he had so honestly acquired at the beginning of it. He then read over a number of papers to prove his assertions, and concluded his speech with saying, that he cared not a straw what the opposition bench could say, as he had taken care to secure a majority.

He was answered by Mr., who began by assuring the house, that he had no more regard for his country than the minister himself; no one, who knew him, could suppose he had. He told them, that he was equally sensible that a proper majority was secured by the friends of government; and that, as for the calculations contained in the honourable gentleman's speech, he knew not whether they were true or false, as he had not listened to one single syllable which had fallen from the honourable gentleman....being entirely taken up in considering what answer he should make, as he well knew it was expected he should say something; but, as he wished the house to think he knew more of the matter than he really did, he should move, that certain papers and estimates be laid before them; that he well knew the intelligence contained in them was not worth sixpence, but that, at worst, if granted, the perusal of them would save time, and clog the measures of government, and, if denied, would throw some odium on the minister and his friends.

Sir John then rose to defend the measures of administration. He was not, he said, perfectly clear what the minister's intentions were, but that, in his heart, he believed them to be very bad; that he himself had a large family, and a small fortune, and should think himself a bad father, if he did not vote for a man, who had already given him so much, and from whom he expected yet more; that he should give him his hearty assistance at present, and would continue to do so, as long as there was no chance of his being turned out, in which case, he meant to make peace with the other side, as well as he could.

As soon as the warm plaudits which followed this speech were a little subsided, Mr., a young member, got up, and, with great modesty, asked pardon of the house, for presuming to give his opinion, on subjects which men, so much his superiors in age, could not agree on; and added, that nothing but a consciousness of his own superior abilities, information and eloquence, could have prevented him from remaining silent; that, in consequence of this superiority, he must bespeak the attention of the house for about five or six hours, while he slightly reviewed the transactions of the present administration, from their first assuming the reins of government, to the present day; which he protested he had not been more than two months in drawing up. He then began a long and circumstantial detail of the follies and blunders of the m..... and his friends; but perceiving, at the end of four hours, that one half of the house was gone to dinner, and the other were inclined to sleep, he told them, that, though he had much more to say, yet, as they were so d....d tasteless, as not to enjoy his rhetoric as it deserved, he should treat them with no more of it at present.

Upon which, the speaker having stretched himself in his chair, the question was put, and carried.... and the house adjourned.

FOREIGN OCCURRENCES.

Paris, May This day his majesty was pleased to make the following most gracious reply to the humble petition of his parliament:

"I am perfectly satisfied of the justice of your remonstrance. I shall nevertheless persevere in my measures. I am determined to make you, and all France, know I will be master....for I hate to be a tyrant by halves....Car tel est notre plaisir."

HONE OCCURRENCES.

Yesterday the church-wardens and parish officers of the parish of dined at the London Tavern, in order to consider the distressed state of the poor in the said parish; and, after mature deliberation, came to a resolution, That their next meeting should be at the Turk's Head....the port at the former house being thick, and the claret very ill flavoured.

On Monday last, came on the election of a member for the borough of Guzzledown, when the numbers on the poll were,

	£.	s.	d.
For Mr. M.	2000	18	2
For Sir John S.	1900	4	0

Mr. M. was of course declared duly elected; but we understand Sir John's friends demand a scrutiny, under pretence that several of Mr. M.'s guineas were light.

Any gentleman, having a sum not less than two, or more than four thousand pounds, to dispose of, may have a most eligible opportunity of gaining at least 25 per cent. by placing it in the hands of the advertisers, who are the proprietors of a large and lucrative patent manufacture. The utmost honour and secrecy.

N. B. It is recommended to any person, whom this may suit, to be quick in their applications, as the advertisers must certainly become bankrupts in a week, if they do not get the money.

Wanted....A curacy, in a good sporting country, near a pack of fox-hounds, and in a sociable neighbourhood; it must have a good house and stables, and a few acres of meadow ground would be very agreeable....To prevent trouble, the stipend must not be less than 80%.

The advertiser has no objections to undertaking three, four, or five churches of a Sunday, but will not engage where there is any weekly duty. Whoever has such a one to dispose of, may suit themselves by sending a line, directed A. B. at the Turf Coffee-house, or the gentleman may be spoken with, any Tuesday morning, at Tattersall's betting room. C.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

Nemo in sese tentat descendere.—Juv.
Nobody tries himself to scan.

"Sir,

"THE peculiar hardships of my situation call loudly for your interference. As they have hitherto escaped the notice of those righters of wrongs, and redressers of grievances, your periodical predecessors, it remains with you, sir, by the publishing of this letter, to clear my injured fame from the aspersions of the malevolent; and vindicate to the world the importance of my character.

"I shall not detain you, Mr. Griffin, by a long account of my birth, parentage, and education; suffice it only to say, that I never received any education; that I am not indebted to a parent for my existence; but that, notwithstanding I am thus defective in point of ancestry, I boast a family of wide alliances and extensive relationships, and date my birth even prior to the creation.

"In short, sir, the person, who has now the honour to address you, is no other than Nobody. To prove what I have advanced of my large connections, I am, you must know, allied to Anybody, nearly related to Somebody, and connected by the closest ties to the family of Everybody. Besides these, the various branches of the What'shisnames, the Whatycallums, the Suchaones, and the Thingums and Thingumbobs, come, one and all, from the same parent stock.

"From this account, you might probably be led to suppose, that my situation is, of all others, the most enviable; that I am growing old, amid the caresses of a diffusive family; and that I am looked up to with wonder and veneration by the rest of the world, as a being pre-existent to the common ancestor, and contemporary with every generation of mankind. But alas! Mr. Griffin, very widely mistaken would this idea be found. Alas, sir, the world holds me in contempt, and my nearest relations have been taught by their example to do the same. I cannot make Anybody confess his knowledge of me; Everybody shuns the suspicion of being acquainted with me; and Somebody has long ago set himself up in direct opposition to me: and by degrees attracted to his party all the inferior branches of the family, who find their ideas of self-consequence much more pleasingly gratified in the relationship they bear to him, however distant, than in the disgraceful consanguinity of Nobody.

"It has not been always thus. There was a time when the name of Nobody was more respected. You cannot but know, Mr. Griffin, that in all places where the feudal system obtained, and even now I believe, in some remote parts of Scotland, it has been customary for whole clans to take the name of the master under whom they held their several tenures; insomuch, that it was nothing unusual for the inhabitants of whole districts to be distinguishable from each other only by the difference of their prænomens, or christian name, or by some additional cognomen, which they adopted for the purpose of this distinction; so that had you, sir, lived in those days, there would have been, I doubt not, whole provinces peopled with a hopeful progeny of Griffins. Ah, sir, these were times indeed. Then it was that I, and my old opposer, Somebody, by mutual compact, shared the land between us, and distributed our names to our respective adherents. The barons, to be sure, and all principal persons, considered themselves as members of his family; but then the tenants, and the bulk of the people, were of necessity contented to rank under my denomination. And so very inconsiderable was the number of his adherents, compared to that of mine, that he might be almost said scarcely to have Anybody on his party; whilst, comparatively speaking, Everybody sided with me.

"There were then no regular steps of consequence, no intermediate gradation of ranks between the lord and his slave; but while the importance of the one was sufficiently gratified in the title of Somebody; the other, hugging himself in his own insignificance, was fully satisfied to herd with the multitude of Nobodies.

"How different is my situation, and how much lessened is the estimation in which I am held in these days; while Everybody is labouring with restless ambition to be considered by the world as Somebody. It is this principle, which enforces the young heir into expences far beyond the limits of his fortune, and melts the accumulation of years in the extravagance of an hour; that he may, by his spirited conduct, persuade the admiring world that he is Somebody. On what other principle does the spouse of the substantial shop-keeper ground her arguments in favour of frosting the cauliflower wig, and rolling up the round belly in a new red waistcoat, but that he may be enabled to display himself on a Sunday's terrace, with a dress and a figure, which may shew him to be Somebody? And whence that self-sufficient smile, which curls the fat cheek of his love, but from a consciousness of having assumed, together with her flowered damask, a degree of importance, which abundantly rescues her from the disgraceful appellation of a Nobody.

"But even these desertions, sir, however distressing, and this contempt, however wounding, I might perhaps be able to endure without complaint; and console myself with the idea of their being but negative misfortunes. But who, Mr. Griffin, could forbear to complain of the malice of false aspersions, and the railings of groundless abuse? who could bear, without repining, the imputation of vices, of which he was perfectly u-conscious; of outrages, of which he was perfectly incapable?

"There does not pass a day, in which my name is not called in a hundred times, as a foil to the vices and imperfections of others; as thus, in speaking of any notorious offender, 'Nobody is more wicked,' 'Nobody more abandoned,' 'Nobody will come sooner to the gallows.'....It is, however, some compensation for this, you will say, that I am also made use of as a comparison for all that is good and great in any character....But, alas! when you consider how far greater is the propensity of most people to calumny than commendation, you will readily own, that the being coupled once or twice with the name of a great or a good man, is but a slender consolation, for being daily associated with the name of every thing that is rascally and villainous under the sun.

"It cannot, I think, have escaped your observation, how often, in common life, a suspicion of being an acquaintance of mine, has been prejudicial to many an innocent and well-meaning person; and has served as an excuse for treating him with the utmost incivility; a hint, that such a person was a fellow, 'who spoke to Nobody,' or a 'creature that Nobody knew,' has been a cause sufficient to subject him to the most mortifying rudeness and contempt. But I shall pass over the consideration of this, and a multitude of other circumstances of the same nature; nor shall I stop to make a single observation on that unaccountable malignity, with which mankind are taught to persecute me in proverbs, and most maliciously to pronounce that wind 'An ill wind, which blows Nobody good.'....But "I shall proceed without delay to shew the injustice and wickedness of mankind, in laying to my charge several enormities, which it is actually out of my power to perform. The instance, which occurs to my memory is one of very great antiquity, of which you, Mr. Griffin, have in a former paper very properly taken the notice it deserved, for which I thank you. I allude to the paltry contrivance of Ulysses, who, to shield himself and his party from the resentment of Polyphemus, for the extinction of his eyes, had the address to persuade that simple shepherd swain, that it was one Oude, (meaning me, sir), who was perpetrator of the bloody deed. Of this accusation, you have already had the goodness to acquit me to the world. But it were endless to dwell on every particular circumstance, which has been laid hold of, to sully my fair fame with malevolent aspersions. I should detain you too long, were I to enumerate the many atrocious house-breakings, of which a confirmed suspicion is said to have fallen on Nobody; the many midnight murders, at which Nobody was thought to have been present; or, to descend to less heinous offences, the many strayed tea-spoons and broken china basons, the guilt of which a favourite lap-dog, a cat, or a fine family of little ones, have been lucky enough to throw off their own shoulders on those of Nobody. I myself was not a little displeased the other day, to hear on old gentleman, who, by the bye, has one son of two and twenty, and several head of younger children, living in the house with him; complain, in the double capacity of master of a family and justice of the peace, that he had at that time a pier glass shattered to pieces, an arm broken off his mahogany easy chair, and a housemaid in the straw, for all which circumstances he was, as far as he could learn, indebted to the kind officiousness of Nobody.

"Now, Mr. Griffin, I have laid my misfortunes before you in a manner that I think cannot fail to excite your compassion. With you it remains to mediate between me and the public....and by explaining my case to them, to confer on me a lasting favour and benefit, and lay a strong claim to the gratitude of,

"Sir,
"Your sincere admirer,
"And most humble petitioner,
"NOBODY.

EDUCATION.

[It affords the Editor the purest and sincerest satisfaction to have an opportunity, on any occasion, to give publicity to any scheme, whose object is the literary and moral advancement of the country. To the monarchy of Genius it is ardently hoped Americans will ever look with veneration eyes, and to the enterprising instructor of youth may they ever exclaim with more than the enthusiasm of HORACE

"I, bone, quo virtus tua te vocat; i PEDE FAUSTO."]

TO THE PUBLIC.

The Trustees of the Newark Academy, and several gentlemen of the town, having taken into consideration the high importance of female education, have agreed to establish a female academy and boarding school in this place; and from the healthiness and flourishing state of the town, and its happy situation for such an institution, they conclude they have just reason to hope, that their efforts thus to promote the interest of society, will be attended with success.

They have engaged the Reverend William Woodbridge to take charge of this seminary and boarding school; a gentleman of very amiable character, eminently qualified for such an office, and who, for several years, with great reputation, had presided over an institution of a similar nature.

This institution will be founded on the following principles and regulations:

I. It shall be under the patronage and inspection of the trustees of the Newark Academy, some of whom will visit it monthly, and also, such ladies as the Trustees shall appoint.

II. In this seminary shall be taught:

The first principles of the English language, and plain sewing, for three dollars per quarter.

The fine branches of needle work, the English language grammatically, reading, writing, arithmetic, composition, history, and the use of the globes, for five dollars per quarter.

The French language for five dollars per quarter.

Drawing, vocal and instrumental music, on reasonable terms.

III. The price of board will be one hundred dollars per annum; the young lady to provide her bed and bedding, and to defray the expense of washing her apparel.

IV. All the pupils, day scholars as well as boarders, shall pay twenty-five cents, quarterly, as an acknowledgment for the use of the building.

V. Any pupil may enter this institution, to continue by the quarter, or year.

VI. Boarders shall, continually, advance money for one quarter's board; and all pupils shall always advance the money for one quarter's tuition.

VII. It will be earnestly recommended to every young lady, when health and circumstances shall permit, to attend on Sundays, the place of public worship to her most agreeable..

VIII. Particular attention shall be paid to the manners, decency of dress, as well as the morals of pupils.

IX. A proper library shall be provided for the recreation and improvement of the young ladies, at their leisure hours, day scholars as well as boarders; and those who shall incline to resort to it, shall each pay fifty cents, quarterly, for the privilege, which money shall be applied to purchase books for the library.

X. The books to be studied in the academy, shall be prescribed by the Gentleman who shall preside over it, with the approbation of the Trustees above mentioned.

XI. The spring vacation shall commence the third monday in April, and the fall vacation, the third monday in September, and the term of vacation shall be three week.

XII. The scholars shall be examined, quarterly, with respect to their progress in their several studies, in the presence of the Trustees of the aforesaid academy, and such ladies and gentlemen, as, by invitation shall attend on the occasion.

XIII. No boarder shall visit, or go abroad, without permission of her instructor, or instructress.

XIV. The pupils shall attend public devotion, morning and evening, on days of tuition, in the academy.

XV. Other regulations may be added to these, if deemed necessary, with the approbation of the Trustees of the Newark Academy.

A suitable building is provided for this institution, which will be opened the first day of May next. It is requested, that those parents and guardians, who shall incline to send their children to this academy and boarding school, either as boarders, or day scholars, will give information thereof, previous to the twentieth day of March next, to either of the subscribers.

NOTE. After the first of May next, the Reverend Mr. Woodbridge will also have the superintendence of the English and mathematical departments in the Newark Academy.

The Trustees of this academy, have received several very honourable testimonials of the character of this gentleman, and from them, it is deemed proper, to publish the following extract of a letter from his excellency, Jonathan Trumbull, esq. governor of the state of Connecticut, dated 16th January, 1802, addressed to the honourable Judge Boudinot.

"I have seen several testimonials which the Reverend Mr. Woodbridge is possessed of, from the late President Stiles, of Yale College, and others, to the points of his talents and conduct, as a teacher and scholar, to which I can most cheerfully subscribe. I can also add,....that I have had knowledge of Mr. Woodbridge for more than twenty years....He had his school education at the grammar school in this town, from whence he went to Yale College, where he obtained his more enlarged knowledge of the various sciences, as certified by the Reverend President Stiles....In his different walks in life to this time, I have ever understood, that he has sustained uncommon reputation as a teacher and instructor of youth, he being possessed not only of the requisite talents, but having a happy facility of communicating information....together with an amiable mode of deportment towards his pupils, commanding their respect and regard.

Should you obtain Mr. Woodbridge for your institution, I shall have one thing to regret, which is, that we shall be deprived of the talents and abilities of a very useful instructor to the youth of his state...as well as of the example and influence of a man of virtue, good morals, piety and benevolence, among the circle of his acquaintance in the eastern part of the United States."

[IN conformity to a plan commenced in our first volume, we shall in future, occasionally publish translations from the French classics.]

THE ADVENTURES OF SCARMENTADO.

A SATIRICAL NOVEL,

Translated from the French.

MY name is Scarmentado; my father was governor of the city of Candia, where I came into the world in the year 1600, and I remember that one Iro, a stupid and scurrilous poet, wrote a copy of dogrel verses in my praise, in which he proved me descended from Minos in a direct line; but my father being disgraced some time after, he wrote another poem, by which it appeared I was no longer a-kin to Minos, but the descendant of Pasiphae and her lover.

When I was fifteen years old, my father sent me to Rome to finish my studies. Monsignor Profonde, to whom I was recommended, was a strange kind of man, and one of the most terrible scholars breathing; he took it into his head to teach me the categories of Aristotle, and I narrowly escaped his throwing me into the category of his minions. I saw many processions and exorcisms, and much oppression. Signora Fatelo, a lady of no rigid morals, was foolish enough to like me: she was wooed by two youthful monks, the Rev. Father Poignardini, and the Rev. Father Aconiti, but she put an end to the pretensions of both of them, by granting me her good graces; yet, at the same time I narrowly escaped being excommunicated and poisoned. I left Rome exceedingly well pleased with the architecture of St. Peter's church.

I went to France, in the reign of Lewis surnamed the Just; the first thing I was asked was, whether I chose to breakfast on a collop of the marshal d'Ancre, whose body the public had roasted, and which was distributed very cheap to those that desired to taste it. This nation was at that time torn to pieces by civil wars, occasioned sometimes by ambition, sometimes by controversy, and those intestine broils had for the space of forty years deluged the most delightful country in the world with blood. Such were the liberties of the Gallican church: the French, said I, are naturally wise, what makes them deviate from that character? They are much given to joking and pleasantry, and yet they commit a massacre; happy that age in which they shall do nothing but joke and make merry.

From hence I sat out for England; the same fanatical temper excited the same furious zeal; a set of devout Roman Catholics had resolved, for the good of the church, to blow up the king, the royal family, and the parliament with gun-powder, and thereby free the nation from those heretics. I was shewn the spot where the blessed queen Mary, daughter to Henry VIII. had caused above five hundred of her subjects to be burnt alive. A pious Hibernian priest assured me it was a very laudable action: first, because those they had burned were English; secondly, because they were wretches who never took any holy water, and did not believe in St. Patrick.

From England I went to Holland, in hopes of finding more peace and tranquillity among a more phlegmatical people. At my arrival at the Hague, I was entertained with the beheading of a venerable old patriot, the prime minister Barnavelt, who was the most deserving man in the republic. Struck with pity at the sight, I asked what his crime was, and whether he betrayed the state? He has done worse, replied a preacher with a black cloak, he believes that we can be saved by good works as well as by faith.

You are sensible, that were such systems suffered to prevail, the commonwealth could not long subsist, and that a severe law is necessary to refute such scandalous errors. A deep Dutch politician told me with a sigh, that such commendable actions could not last for ever. Alas, sir, said he, our people naturally incline towards toleration; some day or another they will adopt it; I shudder at the thought: believe me, sir, pursued he, 'tis a mere chance that you actually find them so laudably and zealously inclined as to cut off the heads of their fellow-creatures for the sake of religion. Such were the lamentable words of the Dutchman; for my own part, I thought proper to abandon a country where severity had no compensation, and therefore embarked for Spain.

I arrived at Seville in the finest season in the year. The court was there, the galleons were arrived, and all seemed to proclaim joy, abundance, and profusion. I espied at the end of a beautiful alley, full of orange and lemon-trees, a vast concourse of people round an amphitheatre richly adorned; the king, the queen, the infants and infantas, were seated under a stately canopy, and over against that august family, another throne, higher and more magnificent, had been erected. I told one of my travelling companions, that unless that throne was reserved for God, I could not see the use of it; but these words being overheard by a grave Spaniard, I paid dear for having uttered them. In the mean time, I imagined we were to be diverted with a carousal, wrestling, or bull-baiting, when I perceived the grand inquisitor ascend that throne, and bestow his blessing upon the king and people. Then appeared an army of monks, filing off two by two; some were white, others were black, grey, and brown; some were shod, and some barefooted; some had beards, and some had none; some were with cowls, and some without. Then came the executioner, followed by about forty wretches, guarded by a world of grantees and alguazils, and covered with garments, upon which were painted flames and devils. These fellows were Jews, who would not altogether be compelled to abandon the law of Moses, and Christians who had married their god-mothers, or perhaps refused to worship Nuestra Dama d'Atocha, or to part with their money in favour of the brothers Hieronymians. Prayers were said very devoutly, after which all those wretches were tortured and burnt, which concluded the ceremony, to the great edification of all the royal family.

The same night, while I was going to bed, two messengers from the inquisition came to my lodgings with the holy Hermandad. They embraced me tenderly, and, without speaking a word, carried me out of the house, and conducted me into a dungeon not incommoded by heat, adorned with a curious crucifix, and a mat instead of a bed. After I had been there six weeks, the father inquisitor sent his compliments, and desired to see me: I obeyed the summons: he received me with open arms, and after having embraced me with more than paternal fondness, told me, he was very sorry they had put me in so bad a lodging, but that all the apartments happened to be full, it was impossible to give me a better; adding, however, that he hoped I should be better taken care of another time. Then he asked me very lovingly, whether I knew why I was put in there. I told the reverend father I supposed it was for my sins. Well, my dear child, replied he, but for what sin? make me your confidant, speak. I did all I could to bethink myself of some misdemeanor, but in vain; upon which he made me recollect my imprudent words: in short, I recovered my liberty, after having undergone a severe discipline, and paid 30,000 reals. I went to take leave of the grand inquisitor; he was a very polite man, and asked me how I relished the holidays they had given me? I told him they were delightful, and at the same time went to press my companions to quit this enchanting country. They had time enough, during my confinement, to learn all the great achievements of the Spaniards, for the sake of religion. They had read the memoirs of the famous bishop of Chiapa, by which it appears that ten millions of infidels were murdered in America, to convert the rest. I imagined that bishop might exaggerate a little, but suppose the victims were but half that number, the sacrifice was still admirable.

Notwithstanding the disagreeable adventures I had met with in my travels, I determined to finish my tour, and accordingly I embarked for Turkey, fully resolved never more to intermeddle with other people's affairs, nor give my judgment about public shews. These Turks, said I to my companions, are a set of unbaptized miscreants, and of course more cruel than the reverend fathers of the inquisition. Let us be silent among the Mahometans.

I arrived at Constantinople, where I was strangely surprised to see more Christian churches than in Candia; but much more so to see also a numerous train of monks, permitted to offer their prayers freely to the Virgin Mary, and to curse Mahomet, some in Greek, others in Latin, and some in Armenian. How reasonable are the Turks! (exclaimed I) whilst the Christian world stains a spotless religion with blood, these infidels tolerate doctrines which they abhor, without molestation or inhumanity. The Grecian and Latin Christians were at mortal enmity in Constantinople, and like dogs that quarrelled in the streets, persecuted each other with the utmost violence. The grand vizir protected the Greeks, whose patriarch accused me before him of having supped with the Latins, and I was most charitably condemned by the divan to receive one hundred blows with a lath upon the sole of the foot, with permission, however, to be excused for 500 sequins. The next day the grand vizir was strangled; and the day following, his successor, who was for the Latin party, and who was not strangled till a month afterwards, condemned me to the same punishment, for having supped with the Grecian patriarch; and, in short, I was reduced to the sad necessity to frequent neither the Latin nor the Greek church. To make myself amends, I determined to keep a mistress, and I pitched upon a young Turkish lass, who was as tender and wanton a tête-à-tête as she was pious and devout at the mosque. One night, in the soft transports of her love, she embraced me passionately, calling out alla, alla, alla. These are the sacramental words of the Turks. I took them to be those of love, and therefore cried out in my turn alla, alla, alla; upon which, she said, heaven be praised, you are a Turk. In the morning the iman came to circumcise me, but as I made some difficulty, the cadi of our quarters, a loyal gentleman, very kindly told me he purposed to impale me. I saved my foreskin and my backside with a thousand sequins, and flew into Persia, firmly resolved never to go to the Latin or Grecian mass in Turkey, nor ever more to say alla, alla, alla, at a rendezvous.

At my arrival at Ispahan, I was asked which I was for, white or black sheep? I answered, that the flesh of a white or black sheep was equal to me, provided it was tender. It must be known that the factions of the white and black sheep still divided the Persians, who imagined I meant to laugh at both parties, insomuch that I had scarce entered the city gates, but I had a sad affair to extricate myself from, which I did, however, with a good number of sequins, by means of which I got safe out of the hands of the sheep.

I went as far as China with an interpreter, who informed me that it was the only country where one might live freely, gaily, and peaceably. The Tartars had rendered themselves masters of it with fire and sword, and the reverend fathers the Jesuits on one side, and the reverend fathers the Dominicans on the other, said that they drew souls towards God every day, without any body's knowing it. Sure there never was a set of more zealous converters, for they persecuted one another by turns; they sent to Rome whole volumes of calumnies, wherein they reciprocally called each other infidels and prevaricators. There was particularly a terrible quarrel among them about the method of making a bow.

The Jesuits taught the Chinese to salute their parents after the manner of their country; and the Dominicans, on the contrary, held that they ought to bow to them after the manner of Rome. I happened to be taken by the Jesuits for a Dominican, and they told his Tartarian majesty that I was the pope's spy. The supreme council immediately ordered the prime mandarin, who ordered a serjeant, who ordered four guards to arrest and bind me, with all the ceremony used on such occasions. I was brought after one hundred and forty genuflections before his majesty, who asked whether I really was the pope's spy, and whether it was true that his holiness intended to come in person to dethrone him; I answered, that the pope was a priest, three score and ten years of age; that he lived four thousand miles distant from his sacred Tartaro-Chinese majesty; that he had about two thousand soldiers, who mounted the guard with a parasol; that he never dethroned any body; and, in short, that his majesty might sleep in quiet. This was the last unfortunate adventure I met with in the whole course of my travels. I was sent to Macao, where I embarked for Europe.

I was obliged, in order to refit my ship, to put into an harbour on the coast of Golconda. I laid hold on that opportunity to go and see the court of the great Aureng-zeb, so much renowned for its wonderful magnificence: he was then at Delhi, and I had the good fortune to see him the day of that pompous ceremony, in which he received the heavenly present sent him by the sheriff of Mecca, viz. the broom with which they had swept the holy house, the Caaba and the Beth alla. That broom is a symbol which only sweeps away all uncleanness of soul. Aureng-zeb had no occasion for it, since he was the most pious man in all Indostan. 'Tis true he had cut his brother's throat, poisoned his father, and put to death by torture about twenty rayas, and as many omrahs, yet nothing was talked of but his devotion, which they said was without equal, except that of his most sacred majesty Muley Ismael, the most serene emperor of Morocco, who never failed to cut off several heads every Friday, after prayers.

To all this I spoke not a word, my travels and adventures had taught me to bridle my tongue, and I was very sensible it was not mine to decide between the piety of the emperors of India and Morocco.

I had not yet seen Africa; but whilst I was debating with myself, whether it was better to satisfy this last inclination, or sail for Italy, my ship was taken by the negroes, and I was of course carried thither. Our captain railed against the captors, asking them the reason why they thus outrageously violated the laws of nations? they replied, your nose is long, and ours is flat; your hair is straight, and our wool is curled; you are white, and we are black; consequently we ought, according to the sacred and unalterable laws of nature, to be ever enemies. You buy us on the coast of Guinea, as if we were not human creatures, then treat us like beasts, and with repeated blows compel us to eternal digging into the mountains in order to find a ridiculous yellow dust of no intrinsic value, and not worth a good Egyptian onion;

therefore, when we meet with you, and are the strongest, we make you our slaves, and force you to till our ground, or else we cut off your nose or ears. We had nothing to say against so wise a discourse. I was employed to till the ground of an old negro woman, having no inclination to lose either my nose or my ears; and after a twelvemonth's slavery, I was redeemed by some friends I had written to for that purpose.

Having thus seen the world, and all that is great, good, and admirable in it, I resolved to return to Candia, where I married, a little after my arrival. I was soon a cuckold, but plainly perceived it to be the most harmless and tolerable situation in life.

POLITICS.

[We preserve in the Port Folio the following outline of a debate in the Senate of the United States, on the passage of the bill for fixing the military peace establishment, because the speeches, on one side, contain the doctrines of liberal economy, and shew that there are a few, who do not calculate national dignity from the pence table of Dr. Franklin.]

Mr. HILLHOUSE, of Connecticut, said, he should vote against the bill....that he was as fond of economy as other people, but then he wished it to be real economy, and not a mere sound to dupe the people. That on comparing the present establishment as it now stands with that which is proposed, it would appear that with the same effective force there was very little difference in the actual expense....that indeed there are now in service a number of officers of inferior grades who are supernumerary, but the extra expense attached to them was nearly balanced by useless officers of higher grades in the new system, among which are colonels, for which there was no use, and who had been found by experience, in the revolutionary war, to be both unnecessary and inconvenient....that a short bill authorizing the president to suspend enlistments and the filling up of vacancies in the present establishments would, unless our army was increased by him, leave the expense very much the same as that which would be required by the new system; and then if circumstances should require an increase of force, it might be obtained by the executive magistrate, without the necessity of summoning congress, at a great expense and loss of time....that such increase of force would cost the public much less than a similar increase under the new system, because that was a more expensive system, and that we should then have the advantage of retaining in our service officers who had acquired a knowledge of their business, and not be obliged to employ inexperienced young men, which would be both costly and hazardous; for we could not expect, that those whom we now turn out for no fault, but under a mere pretext of economy, would return again into our service....that, for his part, he was not one of those who could be led away by every idle talk about economy; he would look to facts....that, as he was well informed, a corps of seven hundred marines had been discharged last July, for the sake of economy, and what was the consequence? Why, these men, who were perfectly disciplined, well clothed, and every way fit for service, went off with their new clothing on their backs, and by the month of January following, it was found necessary to enlist others, and give bounty and clothes to men who, when they could be raised, would be of little use, and in the mean time, our frigates were detained, and the consequence probably would be, that the squadron in the Mediterranean would be obliged to come away, before that which is to be sent out could arrive; and thus our commerce in that sea would be left unprotected, and a great deal of money be spent for nothing; and all this that gentleman might put on the appearance of economy....that he was very much afraid the same thing would happen to our land force which had happened to our marines, and therefore he should vote against the bill.

Mr. Wright said, the gentleman from Connecticut was very much mistaken in his idea of the expense....that it was necessary to make that distinction of grades which was now proposed, for that officers would not too readily obey those who, being on the same grade with themselves, had only a seniority of commission....that this was a fact well known to military men. He thought therefore the new arrangement was wise and proper....that a very great saving would be made, and that without it the state of the finances would not permit the repeal of the internal revenues, and the relief of the people from those oppressive taxes which they groaned under....that confidence should be reposed in the administration, and when the administration, came forward to lessen the expenses of the country, and stated the force which was fully sufficient for the defence of the country, it was proper to comply with their patriotic wishes,

Mr. Baldwin, said, that to be sure there might be some little difference in the expense of organizing the regiments in the manner now proposed; but as that was thought most proper, by gentlemen better acquainted with the business than himself, he should not object to it on that account....that the difference between the old establishment and the new, was said to be between five and six hundred thousand dollars, a sum nearly equal to the net produce of the permanent internal taxes. He thought therefore it was proper to adopt a measure which would produce so considerable a saving.

Mr. Morris said, there was a wide difference between saving and economy in all affairs....whatsoever, from those of a family to those of a nation....that saving frequently involved very great loss....that if one of our frigates were moored with a rope in order to save the expense of a cable, she might indeed be held in a calm, but the first gale of wind would blow her on shore; and thus, though we saved a cable, we might lose a ship....that a government ought to extend its views beyond the mere pounds, shillings, and pence, because there were objects committed to its care which it was more important to economize than mere money....that even in a pecuniary point of view, he was doubtful whether it would not be better economy to fill up the regiments under the present peace establishment than to adopt the substitute proposed....that the United States had large tracts of land to sell, and a distribution of sufficient force through that tract of country, to preserve order among the people: prevent them from exterior injury; and give them a money market for a part of their produce, would certainly tend to accelerate the sale and settlement of those lands....that we are, moreover, bound by every principle of national faith, to afford full protection to those who have already purchased; and if, from the want of a sufficient force in that quarter, intruders should settle on and take from them their lands they had purchased, there would be an end to further sales. He did not therefore believe that this saving would eventually appear to be even an economy of money.

That the proposition of his honourable friend from Connecticut went however to the whole length of pecuniary saving which was desired or nearly so. That he believed the difference would not be more than thirty or forty thousand dollars which in a business of such magnitude was not worthy of notice. That events not only possible, but even probable might render it highly expedient and indeed indispensably necessary to increase that paltry force which we called an army. It had been frequently asserted that the administration thought the force proposed was sufficient. For his own part he did not mean to question the talents or virtues of the administration, neither would he place his private judgment or information in competition with those of men entrusted by the public confidence, with the conduct of our affairs. But he saw no where that distinct evidence of any such opinion or desire in the administration, as would furnish ground to act upon the principle of confidence, and involve the proper responsibility. He therefore thought it highly proper, to place at the disposition and in the discretion of the executive government, such powers as by circumstances it might be required to exercise, and then acting with the full information which the administration had the means of acquiring, it would be able to afford to the people that protection to which they are entitled. If no event took place calling for an increase of force, there would be no increase of expense. But if such event should arise the resulting expense be it what it may, must be borne.

That gentlemen, in the confidence of government, might possess more accurate knowledge of foreign transactions than he could acquire. That they probably did possess it, and could from thence conclude, that a reduction of our little military force might be prudent at the present time. That proceeding however, upon the ground of mere private information, he had reason to believe, that a part of the large armament coming from France was destined to take possession, of Louisiana in consequence of arrangements between the first consul and the Spanish court. That Louisiana was a large tract of country. That if the force which arrives should be large it might not be prudent to leave all our southern frontier without any regular troops, to which the militia might in an emergency repair. ...That he did by no means pretend to question the wisdom of the present administration, much less to dictate or even advise any specific line of conduct. That if it had been his fate to direct in any degree the public councils, it would have been with him a leading principle in our foreign relations, always to keep up a body of regular troops at the head of the St. Lawrence, and another near our southern frontier upon the Mississippi, equal to the military force, which any foreign power might oppose to them respectively. That indeed, the plan proposed by his honourable friend from Connecticut, would not enable the government to do this, but it would enable them, as soon as their information should render it advisable, to collect from the different posts a body of a thousand men (replacing them by recruits,) and to post them in a situation to prevent a sudden inroad, if any should be meditated. ...That if the case were of sufficient importance, the Congress might be assembled to make further provision. That the recruiting in the mean time would go on, and thus our preparations for untoward events, be in much greater forwardness. On this, as on every other occasion, he was disposed to shew that confidence which (for the public interest) must be reposed in the executive department of government, by vesting them with the needful powers to protect that interest; powers to be exercised under their constitutional responsibility. A responsibility which would not attach where the powers were withheld derived.

That he considered this question as much more important in its consequences and relations than in any immediate object, to which it could apply. That the time might come when the people of this country would say they had been betrayed. That the spirit of party had often raised charges as serious, on foundations much more slight. That he would neither incur the guilt, nor yet subject himself to the imputation, and should therefore, (if for no other reason) vote against the bill.

LITERARY NOTICE.

In an extract of a letter from a friend in Edinburgh.

THE author of "The Farmer's Boy" has just published a collection of Miscellaneous Poems, consisting of tales, ballads, odes, &c. replete with tenderness and simplicity. The subjects are chiefly drawn from "Cottage Life." I was never a very warm admirer of Mr. Bloomfield, but I confess I am much pleased with these poems.

The celebrated author of The Pleasures of Hope is about committing to the press a volume of poems, among which will be a description of a Tour through the Highlands of Scotland. Can there be a finer subject for a poem?

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following is a sensible remark of a London traveller:

We are sometimes urged by enthusiasm, to fall down and worship the golden image of commerce, but reflection bids us pause, and consider whether this mighty engine may not be overworked. Commerce is a great instrument, in the hand of reason, to connect and intermarry the wide spread families of mankind; but let us not trust to reason alone. Let us not wholly submit our feelings to our purses, and counters, and ledgers. Let us never forget that, though the business of the head is calculation, the business of the heart is enjoyment. We may be very rich in products, and manufactures, and population, and very poor in the spirits and minds of men.

London is, of all places, the most convenient and retired, for a man of small fortune. There, every sort of necessary is to be had in the smallest quantities; and, provided a man has a clean shirt, and three pence in his pocket, may talk as loud in the coffee-house as the 'squire of 10,000 a year. No one asks how he lives, or where he dined. It is not so in the country.

A GOOD ONE!

A prisoner, in the state prison of New-Jersey, being dangerously ill, requested the keeper to send for a clergyman to visit him. The keeper, doubtful of the lawfulness of granting the request, sent to one of the inspectors of the prison to know if he might admit the clergyman, the "act for the punishment of crimes" having declared the benefit of clergy forever abolished and done away!!

The London reviewers, remarking on a dull poem, thus jeer the miserable author, describing the admiration of the Jews, when Paul was preaching:

"The gazing synagogue, in wonder rapt, Devour his pregnant speech."

That the Jews were very voracious, the reviewer remarks, is not to be doubted; but to devour things pregnant, was contrary to their law. Besides, if they devoured the speech pregnant, they devoured it before it was delivered, a circumstance which surpasses all belief; at the same time, there was something extremely savage in the transaction, for the poet tells us, in the next line, that the saint spoke with "words that live;" so that the speech they devoured was not only pregnant, but they most inhumanly swallowed it alive!

Our dashing bucks, who display all their Jehuship in driving through High-street, frequently remind the pedestrian plodder of

Sunt quos curricula pulverem
Colegisse juvat.

ANACREONTIC.

HERE, from toil and trouble free,
Where no cares attack us,
We our song attune to thee,
Bacchus, jolly Bacchus!
Thou dost every bliss bestow,
Banish every sorrow,
And chase far the thoughts of woe,
Dwelling on to-morrow.

And by thee, whose bounty kind
Gives the magic cluster,
Beauty when inspir'd, we find
Glow with mellow'd lustre:
See the lightning of her eyes,
Bosom gently heaving....
Hear those soft, those witching sighs....
Say, are they deceiving?

Well may we, thy vot'ries, love
Thy extatic treasure,
Which can every care remove,
Heighten every pleasure:
And upon our bended knee,
(As becomes our duty)
We our off'ring pour to thee,
Bacchus! and to Beauty.

TO ELIZA.

THOUGH distant far from thy lov'd arms,
My thoughts with fondness dwell on thee;
For ne'er the fair with rival charms,
Can from thy bondage set me free:
His freedom he shall never find,
Who saw thy form, and knew thy mind.

As blended in yon prismatic bow,
I see the glowing hues combine,
So raptur'd fancy joys to shew,
Each beauty and each virtue thine:
And when such charms the heart inspire,
E'en reason but augments desire.

SELECTED POETRY.

BONAPARTE*.

[FROM THE METEORS.]

GOOD courteous reader, I am sure the name
Of Bonaparte must have reached thine ear;
But lest thou be deceived in his fame,
E'en from my muse his glories shalt thou hear.

And first, this hero, like to other men,
Has capabilities to eat and drink:
In stature, he is five feet nine or ten.
A goodly size, as many ladies think.

A year or two ago his face was pale,
But now, they say, it is a dingy brown;
And thence at Paris sprung an idle tale,
They said 'twas Gen'ral Toussaint come to town.

In science he is deep....his rapid pen
At once describes a vict'ry and a bust;
And fighting in a swamp or marshy fen,
He tells how many thousands bit the dust.

* The verses upon this renowned chief were written before he had assumed the new part, which he is now playing in the political drama of the French revolution.

His travelling has of course begot a skill
In lands and soils; but this I will advance,
That let his knowledge be whate'er it will,
He knows the difference 'twixt Cayenne and France.

But we must trace the history of his life?
Observe, how, inch by inch, his greatness grew;
At ten years old, we find him deep in strife,
Vowing in a balloon to take a view.

There first his mighty genius was unfurl'd,
(Admire his wise foresight and prudence true.)
He wish'd to see the huge unwieldy world,
His infant ardour panted to subdue.

Light o'er his head his youthful hours roll....
He hastes to Genoa....What do we behold!
The hero asking, "What's o'clock?" no soul
The hero can resolve....each watch is sold.

On ev'ry side the dreadful clamours rise;
No watches, shirts, or shoes do we possess;
Not thee, nor the directory we prize,
Unless ye save us from our sad distress.

"Courage! my lads; allons! see yonder plains
"And armies, given us by Fate's decree;
"The Austrian spoils shall well reward your pains,
"Watches enough, and Wurmser's watch for me."

Soon Ca Ira and civic hymns resound,
In horrid joy the regiments dance and jump;
And, as imagination wins the ground,
Each feels his bayonet in a hostile rump.

'Tis said dame Fortune is not over chaste,
Nor does she much delight in ancient men;
She found our hero most unto her taste,
And smil'd on Wurmser only now and then.

Thus victory to victory succeeds,
Armies retreat, and towns are render'd up;
The fields are spoil'd....and poor Italia bleeds,
And soon at Mantua will the victor sup.

He came....and told the people they were free,
Deliver'd from the tyranny of knaves;
Bade them to plant the emblematic tree,
Whose shadow would disdain to shelter slaves.

Bade them to be the right good friends of France,
And plac'd some thousand men within their walls,
Lest that by any accidental chance,
They chang'd their minds, and struggled in street brawls.

Next with the emperors courtiers, tete-a-tete,
At Campo Formio he plans a peace;
Which done, he vows that either soon or late,
He'll go and drive the English troops like geese.

His dreadful grenadiers, his boast and pride,
Borne on huge rafts shall strike us all with fears:
Sail up the Thames upon the faithless tide,
And knock the antique Tower about our ears.

March thence unto the bank, whose facile doors
Shall yield up all to their rapacious law,
Swift bounds the echo from the Gallic shores,
Folia bank notes at par with assignats!

But he or the directory soon found
This plan beneath the genius of France;
And then, the Turks and Mamelukes to confound,
He led his grenadiers a pretty dance.

Tost on the seas full many a stormy day,
At length his navy reach'd the Egyptian strand,
Only at Malta....stopping by the way,
To play the devil, did the hero land.

Safe in Aboukir's bay the navy rode,
Approaching victories the warriors greet,
Nor could they find one scaven for forbode
That Nelson hasten'd with his conqu'ring fleet.

Brave Nelson came....and while his vengeance flew
And claim'd the victory as Britain's right,
Great Bonaparte took a bird's-eye view,
Securely mounted on a turret's height.

The navy lost!....no logic can prevail
On Afric's citizen's to change one mind,
Those people thought he look'd just like a snail,
Who came abroad, and left his shell behind.

Yet Generalship like his were never found,
Hail, Ali Bonaparte! Vive Phero!
His faith like any weathercock veer'd round,
A pious mussulman from top to toe!

But here the devil interferes, and bids
Each thing run counter to the prophets will;
Still must he battle near the Pyramids,
And in their mosques some more old women kill.

Lo! on a dromedary, full of pride,
To Syria now the hero bends his way,
Those soldiers, who can steal a camel, ride,
The rest march after in their best array.

Rejoice, ye Jews! the Israelitish walls,
Require but workmen to be built apace,
A mighty rabbi loudly on you calls,
In every Syrian town to raise Duke's-place.

Gen'ral again, he summons Acre with Fraternal offers; strange, they won't go down,
But that uncivil knight, sir Sydney Smith,
Was rude enough to fortify the town.

He taught the Turks to banish idle fears,
And make incursions on the hostile French;
They sally....and find Jacobins have ears,
Which, as superfluous luxuries, they retrench.

To desperation drove, the town they storm,
And storm again; but it is all in vain;
At length they take their leave, without much form,
And, storming, march to Egypt back again.

In the retreat the Arabs were unkind,
Honour 'mongst thieves....yet they committed theft....
But soon the hero has the bliss to find
The pyramids stand just where they were left.

He calls a council; finds the season past,
When men can fly to India in a day;
And, after much debate, concludes at last,
From Egypt he had better slip away.

And as the Hebrew youths, in days of old,
Went into Egypt to preserve their lives,
So out of Egypt, Bonaparte bold,
Escap'd to Paris, where I hear he thrives.

BY THOMAS CAMPBELL, ESQ.

AUTHOR OF "THE PLEASURES OF HOPE."

I'll bid the hyacinth to blow,
I'll teach my grotto green to be,
And sing my true love all below
The hollow bow'r and Myrtle tree.

There, all his wild-wood scents to bring,
The sweet south wind shall wander by,
And with the music of his wing
Delight my rustling canopy!

Come to my close and clust'ring bow'r,
Thou spirit of a milder clime,
Fresh with the dews of fruit and flow'r,
Of mountain heath and moory thyme

With all thy rural echoes come,
Sweet comrade of the rosy day,
Wafting the wild bee's gentle hum,
Or cuckoo's plaintive roundelay.

Where'r thy morning breath has play'd,
Whatever isles of Ocean fann'd,
Come to my blossom-woven shade,
Thou wand'ring wind of Fairy Land!

For sure, from some enchanted isle
Where Heav'n and love their sabbath hold....
Where pure and happy spirits smile,
Of Beauty's fairest, brightest mould;

In some green Eden of the deep,
Where pleasure's sigh alone is heav'd,
Where tears of rapture lovers weep,
Endear'd, undoubting, undeceiv'd:

In some sweet Paradise afar,
Where Music wanders, distant, lost,
Where Nature lights her leading star,
And Love is never, never, cross'd!

Oh, gentle gale of Eden bow'rs,
If back thy rosy feet should roam,
To revel with the cloudless hours
In Nature's more propitious home.

Name to thy lov'd Elysian groves
That o'er enchanted spirits twine,
A fairer form than cherub loves....
And let the name be CAROLINE!

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XV.

I HAVE always admired character painting. It interests me, I confess, much more than face painting. THEOPHRASTUS, who held an old, but Grecian pencil, was an excellent moral limner. But I am afraid my fastidious readers would frown at the stern severity of his lineaments. I, therefore, will not copy from his drawings. But from a more recent and a more fashionable picture dealer, I will take the liberty to borrow a portrait or two; and to amuse myself, and please my courteous visitants, I have fitted up a Lounger's Gallery. Walk in, ladies and gentlemen, and try to discover a likeness.

Irene transports herself at a great expense to Epidaurus, sees Esculapius in his temple, and consults him upon all the disorders, to which she is subject. She begins by complaining that she is exhausted by fatigue; the god pronounces that that is occasioned by the great length of the journey, which she has just made. She informs him, that at night she is deprived of appetite; the oracle commands her to eat sparingly of dinner. She adds that she is deprived of sleep; and he prescribes her not lying in bed during the day. She asks why she has become inactive, and the remedy therefor; the oracle recommends her rising before mid-day, and sometimes exercising her limbs at the promenade. She declares that wine is noxious to her; the oracle commands her to drink water: that she is afflicted with indigestions, and he advises temperate diet. My vision becomes weak, said Irene; use spectacles, replied Esculapius. I daily lose a portion of my vigour, continued she; it is, said the god, because you grow old. But what remedy is there for this languor? The most efficacious one, Irene, is to die, as your mother and grandmother have done. Son of Apollo! exclaimed Irene, what advice do you give me? Is it in this that consists all that science, which men proclaim, and which has procured you the respect, the reverence of the world! What is there rare or mysterious in all that you have told me? Did I not know all the remedies which you have prescribed?.....Why then, replied the god, have you not made use of them, without coming so great a distance to consult me, and shortening your days by the fatigues of so long a journey?

Clitus, during his whole life, has had but two employments, eating his dinner in the afternoon, and his supper at night; it would seem that he was born only for digestion. He has but one subject of conversation; he tells you of the courses, which were served at the last repast, at which he was present, he informs you how many kinds of soup there were, and dilates upon the qualities of each;

he then describes the roasted and the boiled, he exactly recollects the dishes, of which the first course was composed, and does not forget the desert, the fruits, nor even the plates, on which they were served. He names all the wines and cordials, which he drank, he possesses the language of the kitchen as perfectly as possible, and inspires one with a wish to dine at a good table, where he is not a guest. He has, above all, a palate of exquisite delicacy, which cannot be easily deceived, and he has never been exposed to the horrible inconvenience of eating a bad ragout, or of drinking inferior wine. This is a man illustrious in his way, He has carried the art of good living as far as it can be carried; we shall not again see a man who can eat so much, and so luxuriously. He is the arbiter, whenever the quality of a dish is the subject of controversy, and it is hardly permissible to have a taste for what he dislikes. But he is no more. However, when drawing his last breath, he ordered himself to be carried to table; he gave an entertainment on the day of his death. Wherever thou mayest be, O Clitus! thou eatest still; and shouldst thou re-visit this world, it would be for the sake of eating.

I have known people wish to be girls, and handsome, from the age of thirteen to twenty-two, and after that age to become men.

Men and women rarely agree, as to the merit of a woman; their thoughts on such a subject must be different. They cannot please their own sex, by the same qualities that they please the other: a thousand charms, which excite, in us, all the noble passions, among them, only produces aversion and disgust.

There are some women, who have an artificial dignity, confined to the movement of the eyes, the air of the head, and the style of walking, which extends no farther; a dazzling mind, which imposes, but which we cannot esteem, as it is not profound. There are also some, who possess a dignified simplicity, the gift of nature, independent of gesture or step, and yet giving grace to every look and motion: this has its source in the heart, is a proof of high birth, indicates solid merit, is accompanied by a thousand virtues, which cannot be concealed, and which forcibly strike every beholder, though veiled by excessive modesty.

Some young persons are not sufficiently aware of the great advantages of artlessness, and how useful it is to encourage every thing that can promote it. They weaken this gift of heaven, so rare and so unstable, by affected manners and bad imitations. Their sound of voice and stile of motion are borrowed: they make themselves up, practise often little arts, and consult their mirrors to know if they are enough unlike what nature made them. It is not therefore without much trouble that they become less pleasing.

A coquette never loses her desire to please, nor the good opinion of herself. She looks upon time and years as something, which can only wrinkle and make other women ugly, and forgets that age is written on her own face. The same dress, which formerly embellished her youth, now disfigures her person, and increases the imperfections of her old age. Preciseness and affectation accompany her in sorrow and sickness, and she dies full-dressed in ribbons of gaudy colours.

Beauty is arbitrary; agreeableness is something more real, and more independent of taste and opinion.

To judge of some women, by their beauty, their youth, their haughtiness, and disdain, we would suppose that none but a hero would have power to please them. They select a husband, and we find him a little monster, without a head,

We derive this advantage from the perfidy of women, that it cures jealousy.

There is a false modesty, which is vanity; a false glory, which is folly; a false grandeur, which is meanness; a false virtue, which is hypocrisy; and a false wisdom, which is

PRUDERY,

MISCELLANY,

CRITICAL HISTORY OF POVERTY.

IT is difficult precisely to fix on the epoch of Poverty, or to mark with accuracy the moment of its birth. Chronologists are silent; and those, who have formed genealogies of the gods, have not noticed this deity's, though she has been admitted as such in the pagan heaven, and has had temples and altars on earth.

The fabulists have pleasingly narrated of her, that, at the feast which Jupiter gave on the birth of Venus, she modestly stood at the gate of the palace, to gather the remains of the celestial banquet, when she observed Plutus, the god of riches, inebriated, not with wine, but with nectar, roll out of the heavenly residence; and, passing into the Olympian gardens, he threw himself on a vernal bank. She seized this opportunity to become familiar with the god. The frolicsome deity honoured her with his caresses, and, from this amour, sprung the god of love, who resembles his father in jollity and mirth, and his mother in his nudity. This fabulous narration is taken from the divine Plato. Let us now turn to its historic extraction.

Poverty, though of remote antiquity, did not exist from the earliest times. In the first age, distinguished by the epithet of the golden, it certainly was unknown. In the terrestrial paradise it never entered. This age, however, had but the duration of a flower: when it finished, Poverty began to appear. The ancestors of the human race, if they did not meet her face to face, knew her in a partial degree. She must have made a rapid progress at the time of Cain, for Josephus informs us, he scoured the country with a banditti. Proceeding from this obscure period, it is certain she was firmly established in the patriarchal age. It is then we hear of merchants, who publicly practised the commerce of vending slaves, which indicates the utmost degree of poverty. She is distinctly marked by Job: this holy man protests, that he had nothing to reproach himself with respecting the poor, for he had assisted them in their necessities.

As we advance in the scriptures, we observe the legislators paid great attention to their relief.... Moses, by his wise precautions, endeavoured to soften the rigours of this unhappy state. The division of lands by tribes and families; the septennial jubilees; the regulation to bestow, at the harvest-time, a certain portion of all the fruits of the earth, for those families, who were in want; and the obligation of his moral law, to love one's neighbour as one's self, were so many mounds erected against the inundations of poverty. It was thus that the Jews, under their aristocratic government, had few or no mendicants. Their kings were unjust; and, rapaciously seizing on inheritances, which were not their right, increased the numbers of the poor. From the reign of David, there were oppressive governors, who devoured the people as their bread. It was still worse under the foreign powers of Babylon, of Persia, and the Roman emperors. Such were the extortions of their publicans, and the avarice of their governors, that the number of mendicants was dreadfully augmented; and it was probably for that reason, that the opulent families consecrated a tenth part of their property for their succours, as appears in the time of the evangelists. In the preceding ages, no more was given, as their casuists assure us, than the fortieth or thirtieth part; a custom which this unfortunate nation, to the present hour, preserves, and look on it as an indispensable duty; so much so, that, if there are no poor of their nation where they reside, they send it to the most distant parts. The Jewish merchants always make this charity a regular charge in their transactions with each other, and, at the close of the year, render an account to the poor of their nation.

By the example of Moses, the ancient legislators were taught to pay a similar attention to their poor. Like him, they published laws respecting the division of lands; and many ordinances were made for the benefit of those, whom fires, inundations, wars, or bad harvests had reduced to want. Convinced that idleness more inevitably introduced poverty than any other cause, they punished it rigorously. The Egyptians made it criminal; and no vagabonds or mendicants were suffered, under any pretence whatever. Those, who were convicted of slothfulness, and still refused to labour for the public, when labours were offered to them, were punished with death. It was the Egyptian task-masters who observed, that the Israelites were an idle nation, and obliged them to furnish bricks, for the erection of those famous pyramids, which are the works of men, who otherwise had remained vagabonds and mendicants.

The same spirit inspired Greece. Lycurgus would not have in his republic either poor or rich; they lived and laboured in common. As, in the present times, every family has its stores and cellars, so they had public ones, and distributed the provisions, according to the ages and constitutions of the people. If the same regulation was not precisely observed by the Athenians, the Corinthians, and the other people of Greece, the same maxim existed in full force against idleness.

According to the laws of Draco, Solon, &c. a conviction of wilful poverty was punished with the loss of life. Plato, more gentle in his manners, would have them only banished. He calls them enemies of the state, and pronounces, as a maxim, that, where there are great numbers of mendicants, great revolutions will happen; for, as these people have nothing to lose, they seize and plan opportunities to disturb the public repose.

The ancient Romans, whose universal object was the public property, were not indebted to Greece on this head. One of the principal occupations of their censors was to keep a watch on the vagabonds. Those, who were condemned as incorrigible sluggards, were sent to the mines, or made to labour on the public edifices. The Romans of those times, unlike the present race, did not consider the far niente as a pleasing occupation: they were convinced that their liberalities were ill-placed, in bestowing them on such men. The little republics of the bees and the ants were often held out as an example; and the last, particularly, where Virgil says, that they have elected overseers, who correct the sluggards....

.....Pars agmina cogunt
Castigant que moras.

VIRGIL.

And, if we may trust the narratives of our travellers, the beavers pursue this regulation more rigorously and exact, than even these industrious societies. But their rigour, although but animals, is not so barbarous as that of the ancient Germans, who, Tacitus informs us, plunged the idlers and vagabonds in the thickest mire of their marshes, and left them to perish by a kind of death that resembled their inactive dispositions.

Yet, after all, it was not inhumanity that prompted the ancients thus severely to chastise idleness: they were induced to it by a strict equity; and it would be doing them injustice to suppose, that it was thus they treated those unfortunate poor, whose indigence was occasioned by infirmities, by age, or unforeseen calamities. They, perhaps, exceeded us in genuine humanity. Every family constantly assisted its branches, to save them from being reduced to beggary, which, to them, appeared worse than death. The magistrates protected those, who were destitute of friends, or incapable of labour. When Ulysses was disguised as a mendicant, and presented himself to Eurymachus, this prince, observing him to be robust and healthy, offered to give him employment, or otherwise to leave him to his ill-fortune. When the Roman emperors, even in the reigns of Nero and Tiberius, bestowed their largesses, the distributors were ordered to except those from receiving a share, whose bad conduct kept them in misery; for that it was better the lazy should die with hunger, than be fed in idleness.

Whether the police of the ancients was more exact, or whether they were more attentive to practise the duties of humanity, or that slavery served as an efficacious corrective of idleness, it clearly appears, how little was the misery, and how few the numbers, of their poor. This they did too, without having recourse to hospitals.

At the establishment of christianity, when the apostles commanded a community of riches among their disciples, the miseries of the poor became alleviated in a greater degree. If they did not absolutely live together, as we have seen religious orders, yet the rich continually supplied their distressed bretheren: but matters greatly changed under Constantine. This prince, with the best intentions, published edicts in favour of those christians, who had been condemned, in the preceding reigns, to slavery, to the mines, the galleys, or prisons. The church felt an inundation of prodigious crowds of these unhappy men, who brought with them urgent wants, and corporeal infirmities. The christian families formed then but a few: they could not satisfy these men. The magistrates protected them: they built spacious hospitals, under different titles, for the sick, the aged, the invalids, the widows, and orphans. The emperors, and the most eminent personages, were seen in these hospitals, examining the patients. Sometimes they assisted the helpless, and sometimes dressed the wounded. This did so much honour to the new religion, that Julian the apostate introduced this custom among the pagans. But the best things are seen continually perverted.

Those retreats were found not sufficient. Many slaves, proud of the liberty they had just recovered, looked on them as prisons, and, under various pretexts, wandered about the country. They displayed, with art, the scars of their former wounds, and exposed the imprinted marks of their chains. They found thus a lucrative profession in begging, which had been interdicted by the laws. The profession did not finish with them: men of an untoward, turbulent, and licentious disposition, gladly embraced it. It spread so wide, that the succeeding emperors were obliged to institute new laws; and it was permitted to individuals to seize on these mendicants, for their slaves and perpetual vassals; a powerful preservative against this disorder. It is observed in almost every part of the world but ours; and it is thus that nowhere they so abound with beggars. China presents us with a noble example. No beggars are seen loitering in their country. All the world are occupied, even to the blind and the lame. Those, who are incapable of labour, live at the public expense. What is done there, may also be performed here. Then, instead of that hideous, importunate, idle, licentious poverty, as pernicious to the police as to mortality, we should see the poverty of the earlier ages, humble, modest, frugal, robust, industrious, and laborious. Then, indeed, the fable of Plato might be realized: poverty may be embraced by the god of riches; and, if she did not produce the voluptuous offspring of love, she would become the fertile mother of agriculture, and the ingenious mother of the fine arts, and of all kinds of manufactures.

THE LOITERER.

Non omnes Arbusta juvant.

Not all in woods delight.

SIR,

A WRITER of a periodical paper is always considered as the lawful receiver of those complaints and accusations, which cannot, with propriety, be brought before any other tribunal, and has, from time immemorial, been the repository of all those petty distresses, which, when vented any where else, oftener excite derision than pity. I flatter myself, therefore, you will be graciously pleased to take my case into consideration; and if, after I have told my story, you find right on my side, you will issue an edict, prohibiting my enemies from persecuting me.

I am the son of an opulent and respectable citizen, who, for the first fifty years of his life, was never, on any occasion, two miles from Thread-needle-street, who knew no learning but arithmetic, no employment but posting his books, and no dissipation beyond the enjoyment of his weekly club. It has been observed, that a man's veneration for learning is sometimes in proportion to his own want of it; this was exactly the case with my father. He was determined, he said, his son should be the best scholar in the city of London. He therefore sent me to a considerable free-school in the neighbourhood, where I acquired about as much knowledge as those seminaries usually bestow; and, if I was not quite the eighth wonder of the world, I was at least the wonder of my father, who always examined me of a Sunday after dinner, in the presence of the curate, who was generally complaisant enough to express his astonishment at the quickness of my apprehension, and the goodness of my memory.

At the age of eighteen, I was sent off in the regular succession to a college in Oxford, whose students were always taken from our seminary. As I had never in my life been farther from London than Turnham Green, I found myself in a new world, and, for some time, I thought it a very happy one. I had health and spirits, my allowance was ample, and I had a great many agreeable companions, who obligingly assisted me in the arduous task of spending it.

A very little observation was sufficient to shew me, that every body around me consulted only by what means they should best get rid of their time; and candour must acknowledge, that the variety and elegance of their amusements reflect great honour on the inventors. I too was resolved not to be behind hand with my friends, in the science of spending time agreeably; and, in order to do it more systematically, chose for my arbiter delictorum, one of the most knowing men in Oxford.... He not only regulated my dress and my behaviour, but selected, with great care, my acquaintance.... told me how many under-waistcoats were proper for the different seasons...how many capes were necessary for a great coat....when shoe-strings and when boots were most becoming....taught me how to lounge down the High-street....and how to stand before the fire at the coffee-house.

"Nil desperandum Teuero duce."

Under such a guide, my progress was not slow. I soon became almost as wise as my instructor, and should shortly have obtained the character of a knowing man, had not my hopes been cut off at once by an accident, which I am going to relate.It being summer when I was entered at the university, my feats of horsemanship had been confined chiefly to Port Meadow and Bullington Green; at one or other of which places I never missed appearing, at least once a day, upon a very clever cropt poney; and, though I knew no more of a horse than of an elephant, yet, by the instructions of my friend, by talking big, and offering to trot a number of miles within the hour for large sums, I contrived to make many people believe I knew something of the matter.

At last winter came, and I found it necessary to be very fond of fox-hunting, without which no man can pretend to be knowing. Never was a more fatal resolution taken; never was there man less qualified for a sportsman, as I was naturally timid and chilly, and had never been on horseback in my life, before I came to Oxford. But there was no alternative; my reputation, my character, my very existence as a knowing man, depended on my conduct in this article; and, to say the truth, I had heard from my acquaintance such long and pompous accounts of sharp bursts, and long chases.... such enthusiastic panegyrics on, and such animated descriptions of, this amusement, that I really began to think there must be something wonderfully bewitching in a diversion, which seemed to take up so much of the time and thoughts of my companions. I, therefore, by the advice of my friend, gave forty-five guineas for a very capital hunter; and having furnished myself with the proper paraphernalia, cap, belt, &c. made an appointment to go with a large party and meet the fox hounds the next day.

My friends were punctual to their appointment, and rattled me out of bed at seven o'clock, on a raw November morning, though I would have given a thousand worlds to have lain another hour, and a million not to have gone at all; I was, however, obliged to repress my sensations, and to feign an alacrity I felt not; and, though shivering with cold, and pale with apprehension, to affect the glow of pleasure; and assume the eagerness of hope. After a long ride, through a most dismal country, we arrived at the wood, where we found the hounds were not yet come, on account of the badness of the morning, which, from being foggy and drizzling, had now turned to a very heavy rain.

Here then we amused ourselves riding up and down a wretched swampy common, or standing under a dripping wood, for about two hours, at the end of which time the day cleared up, the hounds came, and every countenance but mine brightened with joy; for I was half in hopes they would not come at all. My sufferings indeed were but yet begun; for no sooner had the hounds thrown off, than my horse grew so hot, that, benumbed as my hands were with cold, I had no sort of power over him; the consequence of which was, that I received many severe reprimands for riding over the hounds, and treading on the heels of other horses. After I had ridden in this state of torment about three hours, the men and hounds all at once set up a most terrible howling and screaming, and they told me they had found a fox.

I shall not, Mr. Loiterer, attempt to describe the chase, for, if you are a sportsman, you know already what it is; and, if you are not, I am sure you will never know it from my description: all I remember is, that, as soon as the chase began, my horse (who went just where he pleased) dashed down a wet boggy lane, and in a moment covered me over with water and mud.

Oh, Mr. Loiterer! if you have the common feelings of humanity, you will not, without some degree of pity, conceive me at once cold, tired, and frightened, carried on with irresistible velocity, and plunged through the dirtiest part of the dirtiest county in England!

At last, however, my sufferings came to a close; for, at turning short at the end of a narrow lane, my horse started....I pitched over his head, and fell as soft as if it had been on a feather bed. There I lay, till a countryman, who had caught my horse, brought him to me, and good-naturedly assisted me in getting up and cleaning my clothes. No intreaties however could prevail on me to remount, and, having desired my assistant to lead my horse to Oxford, I determined to endeavour reaching home on foot: but this I found not so easily effected, in my present condition, and luckily met-inn with a higer's cart, which was bound for that place, got into it, and, in this vehicle, made my triumphant entrance over Magdalen bridge, about eight o'clock in the evening, just as the High-street was at the fullest.

As soon as I got to my college, I went to bed, and sent for Dr., by whose skill and assistance I was at the end of the week recovered, indeed, as to my health, but my reputation was gone for ever. My story, during my confinement, had got wind, and was laughed at in all parties. My acquaintance began to look at me in a very contemptible light, and even my own familiar friend, in whom I implicitly confided, soon let me know, that it was no longer consistent with his reputation to be seen walking the High-street with me. If I entered a coffee-house, I was sure to hear a titter and a whisper run round the room; and at last the very servants at the livery-stables pointed at me as I passed the streets, and said....There's the gentleman as got such a hell of a tumble t'other day.

In short, I was obliged to give up all my knowing acquaintance, and get into an entirely different set, who as they had never aspired to the first pinnacle of sporting merit, and could, at best, boast but a secondary kind of knowingness, received me with open arms. They, on hearing my story, told me I had totally mispent my time and money; that fox-hunting was not only a very dangerous, but a very expensive and a very uncertain amusement; that shooting, on the other hand, was free from these objections, being a diversion exceedingly cheap, always in our power, and which had the additional recommendation of furnishing us game for our own table, or our friends'. All this was ended in offering to be my instructors in this agreeable amusement.

I own I listened to this recital with pleasure, and accepted the offer with gratitude, for I was not yet quite cured of the rage for being knowing, and thought it not impossible to gain some degree of reputation for being a good shot. I therefore furnished myself with every proper requisite for this amusement, and, in an evil hour, accompanied my new friends to Bagley-Wood. I will not take up your time with a particular description of our day's sport, but it is enough to say, that the last error was worse than the first, that I returned home wet, dirty, scratched, and tired, and pretty well convinced, that I was not more fitted for a shot than a fox hunter.

I have since endeavoured to excel in some other amusements, but the same ill luck has constantly attended me. I got at least twenty broken heads last winter, in learning to skate, and have since narrowly escaped being drowned, by attempting to throw a casting net, which had nearly drawn me into the water with it. This, however, was the last effort of the kind I ever made, and I am now set quietly down, perfectly satisfied with my own achievements in the sporting way. But the worst part of the story is, that my companions have not yet done laughing at me; my exploits, on the contrary, seem to be to them inexhaustible subjects of amusement: sometimes they talk to me, and sometimes at me. One wonders at my want of taste, and another at my want of resolution. A third asks me how I felt when I was falling off. And a fourth thanks heaven he was not bred in London.

In this distressful situation, I apply to you, Mr. Loiterer, as my only friend, and beg you to intercede in my behalf, since nobody else will. Tell them then, sir, that I do not in the least call in question the merit of their different diversions, or doubt their particular prowess in them, but that, by early and unconquerable prejudices, and through a perverted but incurable taste, I can find no pleasure in diversions, where difficulty and danger are rewarded by dirt and noise. You may tell them also, that, on condition they are merciful to me on this subject I will, in my turn, promise always to speak of sportsmen with reverence, and drink fox-hunting in a bumper. And that whenever (at their return home, after their bewitching sports) they feel inclined to expatiate on their glorious toils, and hold forth on the merits of their horses or themselves, they shall find a most silent, respectful, and attentive hearer in, sir,

Your humble servant,
CHRISTOPHER COCKNEY.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

.....Usus
Quem penes arbitrium est et jus et norma loquendi.

Use is the judge, the law and rule of speech.

IT is a favourite amusement with me, and one of which in the present paper I shall invite my readers to participate, to adopt a maxim established in any single instance, to trace its influence where it has operated undiscovered; to examine the secret springs, by which it has worked; and the causes, which have contributed to their concealment. In the course of this pursuit, I may boast, that there is scarce one of these miniatures of experience and observation, from the moral maxims of Grecian philosophy, to the prudential apothegms of Poor Robin, which has not been successively the object of my observation and discussion. I am, however, aware, that in the opinion of their importance, I may perhaps be singular.

That "life is short," that "the generality of mankind are vicious," seem ideas that might have suggested themselves to a mind undistinguished for peculiar sagacity, or an uncommon share of experience. But to carry further the former of these maxims, and to consider that life is short, when compared with the multiplicity of its business, and the variety of its pursuits; that it is too much so for the purposes of honour and ambition; that to draw a conclusion from the attempts of men, we should imagine it longer; is an observation not so entirely unworthy of a philosopher. And by pursuing the latter of these thoughts, though, on the first view, it may not appear the result of any extraordinary observation, it may be found, on a narrower inspection, to convey a strong argument of the impropriety of popular government.

The scrap of Latin, which, in conformity to established precedent, is prefixed to my paper, exhibits an example of the influence of fashion beyond those limits, which are usually assigned to its prerogative. For were we to accept the definition of it, the most usually accepted, we should consider it only as the director of diversion and dress; of unmeaning compliment and unsocial intimacy. And however evidently mistaken such an opinion might appear, we must look for its source in one of the most prevailing principles of the human mind; a principle, the excess of which we stigmatize by the name of pedantry, of deducing the illustrations of every subject of inquiry, from the more immediate objects of our own pursuits, and circumscribing its bounds within the limits of our own observation. On the contrary, we shall find, that all our attempts to prescribe bounds to the activity of this so powerful agent, will end only in surprise at the extent of its authority; in astonishment at the universality of its influence. Its claim to an undisputed empire over language, is asserted by the author from whom I have taken the motto for this paper; with what justice, the testimony of a succeeding age may declare; when a Cæsar, who made and unmade the laws of the world at his pleasure, found the smallest innovation in language beyond the utmost limits of arbitrary power. Nothing, indeed, but the highest vanity, nourished by the grossest adulation, an idea of the infinitude of sovereign authority, and servile obedience, could have given birth to such an attempt.

However paradoxical it may seem, that, in a matter of judgment and taste, the vague arbitration of individuals should be preferable to the absolute decisions of a learned body: yet the imbecility so evident in the language of a neighbouring nation, and so undoubtedly the effect of establishing such a court of criticism, leaves us little reason to regret, that language with us is so entirely the child of chance and custom. The first prize of rhetoric given to a woman, was a bad omen to the future endeavours of the French Academy.

To omit the innumerable inconveniences attending on every attempt to regulate language; to judge of the possible success of such an attempt, from the abstracted probability alone, were to declare it impossible. A multitude of circumstances, equally unforeseen and unavoidable, must concur to the formation of a language. An improvement, or corruption of manners; the reduction of a foreign enemy; or an invasion from abroad, are circumstances that ultimately, or immediately, tend to produce some change in the language of a people. And even of these, the most feeble agents have been found more efficacious, than the joint operations of power and policy.

The conquests of this nation on the continent, contributed more perhaps to the naturalization of the French language amongst us, than the Norman invasion, and its attendant consequences, the necessity laid on every individual to acquire the use of that tongue, in which all cases of property were to be determined; and the numberless disadvantages and restrictions imposed on the study of the native language.

At a time when measures so seemingly decisive proved ineffectual, it may be curious to observe the agency of causes, apparently foreign from any connection with the improvement or alteration of our language. The residence of our nobility in the conquered provinces of France, the continual wars maintained against that nation, making the study of their language an indispensable qualification in all, who aspired to civil or military dignities, unavoidably brought on a change in our own. The accusation, therefore, of a learned etymologist, against Chaucer, of introducing into our language "integra verborum plaustra," "whole cartloads of words," however elegant in expression, is false in foundation. The language of Chaucer's poetry, is that of the court, in which he lived; and that it was not, no probable conclusion can be drawn, from any difference of style in this authors contemporaries. In those who wrote under the same advantages, no such difference is observable; and those, who were excluded from them, laboured under extreme disadvantages, from the variations in vernacular language, and the diversity of provincial dialect; which, as they have now in a great measure ceased to exist, may, together with their primary causes, furnish a subject for curious inquiry.

It appears, from the concurrence of several ingenious antiquaries, as well as from the testimony of Caxton, in one of his prefaces, that the English language was, in his time, diversified by innumerable provincial peculiarities. He mentions his own choice of the Kentish dialect, and the success that attended it. The language of Chaucer's poetry is frequently more intelligible to a modern reader, than that of such of his successors, as employed themselves on popular subjects. Gawin Douglas, a poetical translator of Virgil, is now, owing to the use of a northern dialect, though a near contemporary of Spencer's, almost unintelligible.

After establishing the existence of a fact, the beaten track of transition will naturally lead us to a consideration of its causes. Among the first effects produced by an extension of empire, may be reckoned a barbarous peculiarity of language, in the provinces the most remote from the seat of learning and refinement. Livy is said to have had his Patavinity; and Claudian is accused of barbarisms, the consequence of his education in a distant province. A difficulty of conveyance, a stagnation of commercial intercourse, will produce the same effects with too wide an extension of empire; and are as effectual a barrier against a mixture of idioms and dialect, as in a more civilized state, the utmost distance of situation between the most remote provinces.

To causes seemingly so unconnected with the situation of language, must we attribute the barbarity of our own, during so many centuries. And those, which contributed to its refinement, may, at first sight, probably, seem equally foreign to that effect. No nation, perhaps, contributed less to the revival of literature, than our own; a circumstance, which in a great measure secured it from that torrent of pedantry, which overwhelmed the rest of Europe. The ignorance of our ancestors kept them unacquainted with the ancients; except through the medium of a French translation. The first labours of the English press brought to light the productions of English literature; which, how rude and barbarous soever, were not confined to the intelligence of the scholar, or the libraries of the learned; but dispersed throughout the nation, and open to the inspection of all, disseminated a general taste for literature, and gave a slow, gradual polish to our language:.....while in every other nation of Europe, the conceits of commentators, and writers of a similar stamp, whose highest ambition it was to add a Latin termination to a High Dutch name, came into the world, covered with ill-sorted shreds of Cicero and Virgil; like the evil spirits, which have been said to animate a cast-off carcase, previous to their ascension to the regions of light.

FROM THE LEPTOLOGIST.

Multa pictores vident in eminentiis et in umbra, quæ nos non videmus.

THERE is scarcely any employment of the human mind, in which its greatest faculties are more nobly exerted, than in the delineation of the passions and sentiments incident to human nature, as they are the subjects of the painter's art. The habit of attention, to which a painter is accustomed, actually seems to add a new faculty to those, which are the common lot of mankind, and, as Cicero has observed, in the passage prefixed to this essay, the senses are made alive to objects, which, in their uncultivated state, would forever have escaped their notice. And while all the more elevated powers of the soul are employed in characterising the poetical or historical expression, which the principal subject of the piece requires, the minutest and most delicate attention is, at the same time, demanded by all those subordinate particulars of arrangement and execution, which, while they escape superficial observation, are the cause, as Reynolds has elegantly observed, that the elaborate productions of the most patient and persevering application appear to the admiring spectator to have been stamped on the canvas by one gigantic effort of a being of a superior order.

While the eye is accustomed by the study of painting to observe, the hand is at the same time habituated to express the most delicate differences of visible objects; and a mechanical facility is obtained, which is of the utmost advantage to the prosecution of many other branches of improvement; so that a certain degree of practice in the art of design, may be considered as absolutely necessary to a man of general science.

To attain a great perfection in the inventive and creative arts of painting can be expected but by few even of those, who devote their lives to the profession; but there is a certain degree of proficiency, which may be attained without the sacrifice of too great a portion of time, and which is of equal utility and importance with those studies, which are more universally considered as belonging to a finished education. A similar improvement of the faculties is in some degree produced by a diligent contemplation of the works of the great masters, which must naturally tend to impress the mind with conceptions, and fill the imagination with a scenery possessing that ideal perfection, which is sought in vain in the material world.

But as in philology, so in painting, it has been too usual to inquire, Whose is it? instead of What is it? and, as if it were the perfection of learning to be able to distinguish at once the hand-writing of every philosopher, that man has been deemed the most perfect connoisseur, who has been able most readily and most positively to decide on the painter's name. Not but that such a power of discrimination, notwithstanding the frequent blunders of those, who pretend to possess it, may easily be conceived to exist: we have all distinct ideas of the persons and autography of our friends; a shepherd readily knows each of his sheep, which to a stranger appear alike; and a nobleman high in rank and respectability might be named, who, when at Westminster, had learned, for his amusement, to distinguish all his school-fellows by their feet. It must also be granted, that the acquisition of such a discriminating faculty must have been accompanied with a considerable degree of experience in the essential excellencies, as well as in the accidental characters, of a painter. A man cannot have familiarised himself with the hard outline, the equable prosaic tint, and the sparkling eye of a Raphael, without feeling the sweetness, the symmetry, and the majesty, of his figures; nor have been impressed with the rich colouring the simpering mouth, the half common and half ideal features of Correggio, without a conception of that glow of animation, that vivid expression of nature and sentiment, which accompanies those characters. If he has adverted to the broad livid hues and reversed position of Guido's heads, and the spotted lights and garish looks of Annibal Carracci's personages, he must have relished in some degree the beauties and graces of the one, and the fire, spirit, and the fancy of the other.

We have at present artists in this country, who have given ample proofs that they have not looked on the works of their predecessors without a power of profiting by the study: and we should perhaps display in our annual exhibitions a still greater number of pieces deserving praise, if the many valuable collections of the works of the great masters actually in Britain, were as easy of access as in other countries. But it happens unfortunately in this case, that our private opulence produces a kind of national poverty; for our best artists are bribed to a constant sacrifice of their talents to personal vanity, in the lucrative employment of portrait painting; and those master-pieces of art, which, if collected together, would perhaps surpass every single gallery in the universe, not excepting even that of Dresden, are now scattered, solitary, or in small numbers, over the whole kingdom.

In fact, Britain is one great metropolis, and we cannot cross a single corner of the country without finding a palace and a court, which ever way we turn. If any magic art could present to us at one view, the contents of Windsor-castle, of Buckingham-house, of Burleigh, of Blenheim, of Chiswick, of Chatsworth, of Kedleston, of Cavendish-square, of the divided Orleans-gallery, of Lansdown-house, of Belvoir, of New Norfolk-street, of Park-street, and many other private collections, which might be named, we should find that there would be little necessity to seek for studies even in the most fortunate of other countries. That all these should ever, in the natural course of things, be brought together into one collection, is certainly very improbable; and the wish would be as vain as wicked, that a national museum should be formed on the Parisian system.

But nature's works are open to the study of all; and we need only refer to the Confession and La Fille mal gardee as splendid instances of the perfection, to which a liberal imitation of nature alone, has been able to advance the most original of the English artists.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF EDMUND BURKE.

EDMUND BURKE, a writer, orator, and statesman, of superior eminence, was born at Dublin, on January 1, 1730. His father was an attorney of reputation, of the protestant persuasion. Edmund received the early part of his education under Abraham Shackleton, a quaker, who kept a school or academy at Ballymore, near Carlow. If in this seminary he did not acquire that exactness of classical instruction, which is the pride of the public schools, it is probable that he was indebted to it for the rudiments of a larger plan of intellectual pursuit, which is often the advantage of a private institution. It is to the honour both of the master and the scholar, that for near forty years, the latter, in his visits to Ireland, used to travel many miles to pay his respects to the former, who lived to an advanced age. In 1746, Edmund entered at Dublin college, as a scholar of the house. It does not appear that he distinguished himself in the studies and exercises of the place; but his mind was by no means unoccupied. He closely pursued a plan of study of his own choice, of which the principal objects were logic, metaphysics, morals, history, rhetoric and composition. He seems to have left Dublin college after taking a bachelor's degree, in 1749; and it has been commonly reported that he finished his studies at the Jesuit's college, at St. Omer's. This circumstance, which has illiberally been made a sort of charge against him, has been denied, apparently on good grounds, by his biographers. Nothing, however, is recorded of him about this period of his life, but that he made an unsuccessful application for the vacant professorship of logic in the university of Glasgow.

In 1753, he first entered upon the great theatre of London, as a law student at the Temple. He soon became the wonder of his acquaintance for the brilliancy of his parts, and variety of his acquisitions; but, like many other nominal students of the law, he directed the force of his mind rather to general literature, than to studies properly professional. Indeed it appears probable that he was obliged to depend upon his pen for a support; for, soon after his settling in London, he became a regular writer in newspapers and magazines, which was a drudgery his genius would scarcely have submitted to, but for its emoluments.

He was always industrious, and never wasted his time or spirits on the pursuits of fashionable dissipation. Yes he was not so much a recluse as to be a stranger to the societies of the gay and polite; and an intimacy with the celebrated actress, Mrs. Woffington, whose conversation was at that time courted by men of wit as well as by men of pleasure, contributed to form his manners, and expand his social talents. A state of ill-health, into which assiduous application threw him, rendered him a guest in the house of Dr. Nugent, a physician, and was eventually the cause of his marriage with the doctor's daughter. This lady retained his esteem and affection during the whole of a long union. As she was a Roman catholic, additional force was given by that connection to the prevailing notion of Mr. Burke's good-will towards that communion.

His first avowed work appeared in 1756. It was a pamphlet, entitled, "A Vindication of Natural Society; or, a View of the Miseries and Evils arising to Mankind, from every species of Artificial Society; in a Letter to Lord ," by a late Noble Writer." This supposed noble writer was lord Bolingbroke, whose manner of writing and reasoning Mr. Burke in this piece ironically imitated, in order to shew, as he afterwards asserted, that the same arguments from abuse, with which that nobleman had attacked religion, might be equally employed against all civil and political institutions, and thereby to infer their fallacy. In so serious and forcible a strain, however, did Mr. Burke argue upon the evils of society, proceeding from the tyranny, injustice, and ambition of kings and governors, that the irony to many eyes was invisible; and the work has actually been republished in late times for the purpose of aiding the cause of a radical reform in human institutions. Whatever the author really meant by it, he certainly displayed great powers of writing and extensive knowledge; yet the work excited little notice, and it is only his subsequent fame that has made it an object of curiosity.

For this disappointment, however, he was fully compensated by the reception of his next literary performance, the "Essay on the Sublime and Beautiful," published in 1757. The elegance of its language, and the spirit of philosophical investigation it displayed, at once raised its author to the first class among writers on topics of taste and criticism. The hypothesis he maintained concerning the objects of his inquiry was, that the principal source of the sublime is terror, or some sensation analogous to it; and that beauty is that quality, or the result of those qualities in objects, by which they excite love, or some similar affection. This theory is supported with much acuteness, and felicity of illustration; and though, like many other ingenious men, he has shewn too great a propensity to generalising, it is certain that many of his observations are not less solid than elegant.

The fame acquired by this work soon introduced the author to the best literary acquaintance. He became intimate in the house of Reynolds, afterwards sir Joshua; and this connection which lasted for life, was equally serviceable to the reputation of the one, and the pecuniary circumstances of the other. Even the great Johnson courted his society, and there was no man, of whose exalted talents he was more sensible. "Burke," said he, in his strong manner, "is one, with whom if you were to take shelter from a shower under a gateway, you would say you had been in company with the most extraordinary man you had ever seen." This praise implies not only uncommon qualifications, but as uncommon a readiness of displaying them; which, in fact, was one of Burke's striking distinctions. It is also said, that Johnson would more readily bear contradiction in opinion from Burke than from any other person; and that if he did not fear him, he was at least held by him in respect. In 1758, Burke suggested to Dodsley, the bookseller, the plan of that valuable and entertaining work, the "Annual Register," and he took upon himself the writing of the historical part, which he continued for a number of years, greatly to the credit of the publication. It is allowed, that in no periodical work the narrative of the current transactions was ever given in a manner so nearly approaching to the dignity and consequence of history.

He was thus gradually forming for a statesman and orator; and his career may be said to have commenced in 1761, when he went over to Ireland, as confidential friend to Mr. Hamilton, secretary to the lord-lieutenant, lord Halifax. That gentleman, commonly known by the name of sing's speech, from a brilliant but a sole display of his oratorical powers in the English house of commons, was possessed of less industry than ability; and Mr. Burke is thought to have rendered him and the ministry some useful political services in Ireland, which were rewarded with a pension of 500l. on the Irish establishment. Soon after his return from that country, in 1765, he was introduced by Mr. Fitzherbert to the marquis of Rockingham, then appointed first lord of the treasury, who made him his private secretary; and through the interest of lord Verney, he was elected representative for the borough of Wendover. The marquis resolving durably to attach to himself a man of such first-rate talents, raised him at once to affluence by a nominal loan, but real gift, of a large sum, with which he was enabled to clear off incumbrances, and to purchase the elegant seat near Beaconsfield, where he thenceforth constantly resided. Mr. Burke was thus completely enlisted into party, under an aristocratical influence, but at that time exerted in favour of popular measures.

Before his political conduct is more particularly considered, it will be candid to furnish the reader with a kind of clue, which is contained in the character given of him by his early friend, Mr. Hamilton. "Whatever opinion Burke, from any motive, supports, so ductile is his imagination, that he soon conceives it to be right." This may be supposed chiefly applicable to the earlier part of his political life; yet it is sufficiently evident that his imagination had a great sway over his judgment to the last moment of his existence.

At this period the rising discontents in America were the great object of interest to the nation. The stamp-tax, imposed by the Grenville ministry, had kindled a flame among the colonies, which threatened very serious consequences. Mr. Burke's first speech in Parliament was on this subject, and it was much admired as a piece of eloquence.

was from his advice that the Rockingham administration took the middle and indecisive course of repealing the stamp-act, and passing a declaratory act, asserting the right of Great Britain to tax America; thus getting rid, indeed, of the present difficulty, but leaving to their successors the temptation, of renewing a project, which it is evident would be attended with a renewal of all the hazard and contention. The repeal, however, was an extremely popular measure at the time; and the ministry proceeded to other popular acts, as the repeal of the cyder-tax, and the resolution against general warrants, when, after a very short reign, they were turned out to make room for a new administration under the auspices of Mr. Pitt. It is allowed that Burke, though exhibiting great splendour of talents, was at this time too speculative and refined for real practice. He had, indeed, gone through a very different course of preparation for public life from that usually pursued. He had taken a wide range through all the studies which teach the nature, fortune, opinions, and principles, of mankind, and had employed himself in laying up those rich stores of knowledge, which he afterwards poured forth in such astonishing profusion. It was about this period that the character drawn for him by the poet Goldsmith, in the set of imaginary epitaphs composed for the several members of their celebrated literary club, appears to have been particularly applicable:

Here lies our good Edmund, whose genius was such,
We scarcely can praise it or blame it too much;
Who born for the universe, narrow'd his mind,
And to party gave up what was meant for mankind.
Though fraught with all learning, yet straining his throat
To persuade Tommy Townsend to lend him a vote;
Who too deep for his hearers still went on refining,
And thought of convincing while they thought of dining;
Though equal to all things, for all things unfit,
Too nice for a statesman, too proud for a wit;
For a patriot too cool, for a drudge disobedient,
And too fond of the right to pursue the expedient.
In short, 'twas his fate, unemploy'd or in place, sir,
To eat mutton cold, and cut blocks with a razor.

It is not intended in this biographical sketch to enter minutely into the political transactions of the time; it will suffice for our purpose to give a succinct view of the principles supported by Mr. Burke in that long warfare of opposition to ministerial measures, in which he passed his best days. After concluding his official labours by a "Short account of a late short administration," written with force and simplicity, he took his station, along with his discarded brethren, as a guardian of the people's rights and the public welfare, and a vigilant censor of the conduct of his successors. In the proceedings against Mr. Wilkes, and the case of the Middlesex election, Burke found large scope for blaming and ridiculing the policy of ministers; and he strenuously joined his efforts to those of the remonstrants against the violation of the rights of electors.

About that time he published one of his most remarkable political works, entitled, "Thoughts on the causes of the present Discontents," which contains a large and explicit declaration of his ideas of the English constitution, and the mode by which power should be administered. He attributes all the evils and misgovernment of the reign to a plan formed by the court for governing by the private influence of its favourites, thus establishing a secret cabinet, always controuling the operations of the ostensible ministers, and dismissing them when not compliant with its designs. He shows in strong terms the incompatibility of such a secret influence with the principles of a free state; and supports some extremely popular notions concerning the house of commons, which, he says, was originally designed as a "controul, issuing immediately from the people, and speedily to be resolved into the mass whence it arose."

Democratical as these sentiments may appear, his proposed remedy for the prevailing evils was perfectly aristocratical; since it consisted essentially in placing the government in the hands of the great whig families, which had been the supporters of the revolution, and its consequent measures;....in other words, the Rockingham party.

This narrow conclusion from enlarged principles gave great offence to many friends of freedom; and the celebrated Mrs. Macaulay wrote a pamphlet expressly in answer to it, in which, with much force and spirit, she maintained her speculative notions on the great ends of government, and the equal rights of all citizens to participate in it. If it be of importance to acquit Mr. Burke of the charge of ever having been inclined to democracy in practice, certainly this publication may be confidently adduced as a proof of very different views. He was uniformly, however, the supporter of liberty, and the causes connected with it; freedom of the press, the rights of juries, and religious toleration: nor would his sincerity in these points ever have been questioned, had he not, in his last years, appeared as the champion of principles supposed directly adverse to them.

But the most lasting, as well as the strongest and noblest of his parliamentary exertions, was his opposition to the train of ministerial measures, antecedent and consequent to the American war. The whole powers of his eloquence, and the whole resources of his political wisdom, were employed first to prevent, and then to heal, the fatal breach between the mother country and her colonies; and to expose the misconduct and imbecility of those, whom he considered as the authors of the calamity. And as this period comprized the full maturity of his oratorical abilities, it seems the proper place to describe the peculiar character of his oratory.

In all the records of eloquence, an example probably is not to be found of a speaker so full of mind as Burke. Ideas and images crowd in upon him from all quarters. On every topic he not only takes in the whole compass of matter properly belonging to it, but makes excursions to a vast variety of subjects connected by the slightest associations. His diction is equally rich and varied with his matter. Figure rises after figure, image after image, in endless profusion; often splendid, sublime, and beautifully illustrative; not seldom coarse, disgusting, and puerile; for the rapidity of the current allowed him no time to select or purify. When he got up, it was scarcely possible for the audience to divine whither he would carry them; but they were sure of hearing nothing trite or common-place, and generally were repaid for a patient attention, by striking and original sentiment, or deep and ingenious observation. From his speeches may be collected masterly discussions of almost every point interesting to human society, together with a great fund of historical narration and delineation of eminent characters. In argument he is often close and cogent, sometimes lax and sophistical. In praise and invective he is equally fervid and exuberant, exhausting all the tropes and epithets of language. In him, feeling and fancy were alike potent, and daring vigour was allied with playful ingenuity.

But oratory, as it was his forte, was also his foible. He loved too much to talk, and got the habit both of rising too often, and staying up too long. His copiousness degenerated into prolixity: and, after charming and convincing hearers with the beginning of his speech, he would tire them with the end. His vivacity and irritability rendered him not enough master of himself for a senatorial debator. He was sometimes hurried into violations of prudence and decorum, and said rash things in heat, which he could not recal, and which could not be forgotten. His own party trembled to see him rise, and on many occasions would have preferred his silence to his aid. On the whole, he was not the most effective speaker of the house, though certainly the greatest genius. It may be added, that his manner was little in his favour; his voice was harsh, his tone national, his action forcible, but strained and inelegant.

POPULAR MUSIC.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE Veteran Tar, a comic opera, in three acts, as performed at the Theatre Royal, Drury-lane, adapted for the voice and piano-forte; words by S. Arnold, music by Dr. Arnold.

This little piece, though it exhibits some few marks of hasty writing, possesses some pleasing and impressive airs, and will not fail to gratify those, who are partial to natural and simple melody. In the overture, which opens with a movement at once bold and light, the doctor has ingeniously interwoven the air of "The hardy Sailor braves the Ocean," from the Castle of Andalusia, and that of "Come, cheer up, my Lads," by the late Dr. Boyce, which give it a very appropriate and characteristic effect.

The Battle of the Nile, a favourite cantata, with an accompaniment for the piano-forte; words by Mrs. Knight, music by Dr. Hadyn.

We have perused this composition with infinite pleasure: the modulation, every where, bespeaks the hand of a great master, and the expression, great acuteness and justness of feeling. The introductory symphony is conceived in a style, at once uncommon, striking, and analagous, and the transitions of harmony, and little intermezzi, which both relieve and enforce the vocal part, are managed with a skill and profundity of judgment, to which very few, besides the great author himself, can pretend.

"Ah! these were the scenes," a favourite song, written by Rannie, the music by Rose, with an accompaniment for the piano-forte, is a pleasing and interesting little ballad. The time and style of the movement is perfectly appropriate to the ideas of the poet, and the melody throughout is chaste, neat, and expressive. The words cannot be passed over, without observing, that they are elegantly conceived, and possess some highly poetical turns.

"The Devil among the Taylors," a popular dance, has been arranged in the rondo form, as an excellent exercise for the piano-forte. This plan of adaptation, as far as regards this instrument, is to be highly approved. The familiarity of the ear with the subject of the piece, naturally begets the desire of being acquainted with the adventitious part of the movement, and consequently operates as an inducement to practice.

"No, no, it must not be" is one of the most successful efforts of Mr. Hook, in the Vauxhall style. The air is highly engaging, and particularly appropriate to the words. The flute accompaniment is prettily conceived, and adds much to the general effect.

"Summer's Treasures," written by Dell, and composed by Barthelemon, is one of those sterling ballads, which not only engage at the first hearing, but improve upon repetition. The air, though far from possessing any original or striking ideas, is characteristic and interesting, and does credit to the judgment of the ingenious and well known composer.

"A Song from the French of Le Chevalier de Caucy," contains some extremely pretty passages. The general cast of the air is remarkably simple and natural, and the relief produced by the digression into the minor of the original key is happily conceived, and most excellently prepares the ear for the da capo. The bass, it must be observed, is not constructed with equal felicity, nor is the apoggio accompaniment perfectly consonant with the pathos of the expression.

"The Cottage of Peace" is a pastoral ballad, sung by Miss Gray, in the grand Caledonian spectacle, called the Iron Tower; the poetry by Upton, the music by Sanderson. This song is popular. Its style is simple and pretty, and the burden engaging and interesting. The flute accompaniment is managed judiciously, and produces, in orchestra performance, that happy and striking effect, which can only result from a thorough knowledge of the band.

"Rosy Hannah," a favourite song; the words by Robert Bloomfield, author of the Farmer's Boy, the music by his brother, J. Bloomfield.

Of this ballad, the music, like the poetry, is chaste and simple. The melody is not marked with any striking feature or character, but it is smooth, easy, and natural; and though we trace the lack of that address, which only time and experience can produce, yet the ingenuity of the composer has, in a great measure, enabled him to avoid the quaintness and embarrassment, almost inseparable from early effort.

"It is Night, and I am alone" is a song, composed by the late Mr. Percy, which is distinguished for traits of genius, and justness of conception, much above the general cast of modern compositions. The words are from Ossian, and the composer has entered into their spirit, fervour, and wild rudness, with an enthusiasm worthy of that talent and feeling, which he has already displayed, in so many similar instances. The variation of the movements produces a conspicuous and forcible effect, and the piano-forte accompaniment is judiciously and expressively constructed.

"Little Sue" is a ballad, composed by Cope, and sung by Miss Daniels, in which the composer has scrupulously attended to the turn and sense of the words, and produced all that variety and relief, intended by the poet. The descent of the voice at "O, then I'm forc'd to beg for more," is judicious, and the changes of the time at "Do, sweet Lady," and at "Remember Little Sue," are particularly proper and expressive. The words are by C. Dibdin, jun. and, by their characteristic ease and simplicity, do credit to their author.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

LONDON FASHIONS.

THE Buonapartian hat is coming into vogue; it consists of white or salmon-coloured satin, in the form of a helmet, surrounded with a wreath of laurel, and worn much on one side.

Plain white chip hats, in the Gypsy style, without any ornament whatever, tied carelessly under the chin, with pea-green or pink ribbon.

The Archer dress;...a petticoat without any train, with a border of green or blue; a blue or green saracen boddice, vandyked at bottom; loose chemise sleeves, and no handkerchief. The head-dress, a small white or blue satin hat, turned up in front.

Brown, grey, or olive silk stockings, with yellow or orange clocks, are worn by the ladies to walk in.

Feathers and flowers continue to be much worn, and wreaths of roses on the hair for full dress, in preference to more cumbrous ornaments.

Small watches are worn, by a few dashing belles, on their bosoms, not bigger than the round of an half guinea.

THE FINE ARTS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MOUNT VERNON, in Virginia, the seat of the late lieutenant general Washington, commander in chief of the army of the United States of America, painted by Alexander Robertson, engraved by Francis Jukes. Considered as having been the habitation of so great a character as general Washington, this view has an interest, which it would not derive from any other circumstance; for, as a building, it is extremely plain, and has nothing, except extreme neatness, to recommend it to attention. The foreground, which, trimmed with nice art, looks neat, smooth, and pretty in the vicinity of a gentleman's house, in a drawing, or a print, is unpicturesque. A bowling-green, shaven by the scythe, and levelled by the roller, is very proper for the purposes it is made for, but the art of Gainsborough could not make it a pleasing foreground to a picture.

New-York, from Hobuck ferry, New-Jersey, painted by Robertson, engraved by Jukes. This is a neat and pleasing companion print to the view of Washington's house; but, at first sight, would rather be taken for a view of Hobuck ferry-house, than of New-York, which, being separated from the spot where the view is taken, by the water, we do not see much more than the site of the city, and the spires of the churches.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

THE Rev. B. N. Turner, author of a humorous work, lately printed in London, entitled "Infant Institutes," and several other publications of merit, is about to publish a volume of poems, by subscription.

Mr. D'Israeli, one of the politest writers of the age, has published new editions of his "Dissertation on Anecdotes," his "Literary Miscellanies," and his Romances.

Weld's Travels in Canada, &c. have been translated into French, and adorned with charts and engravings. There are two editions; that on fine paper is charged at 30 livres.

Godwin's St. Leon has been translated into French, and, as might be naturally expected, spoken of, in Paris, in terms of commendation, except the character of Bethlem Gabor, who is justly decried, as unnatural and disgusting.

The Young Philosopher, a novel, by Charlotte Smith, is translated into French, and reviewed with applause.

LITERATURE.

To the honour of the scientific knowledge of Mr. Nathaniel Bowditch, of Salem, Massachusetts, we are informed, that one copy of his New American "Practical Navigator" was sold, in London, to two nautical booksellers, by Mr. Blunt of this town (proprietor of the work), for TWO HUNDRED GUINEAS, and an edition of 6,000 copies is now in the press; Moore's Navigator having depreciated very much in that country, owing to the numerous errors which have been produced, many of which have been fatal to mariners.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IT is common with witlings and woman-haters to compare the ladies with the feathered tribe. This expression may, without the least impropriety, be applied to the females of Philadelphia, many of whom exhibit the beauty of the peacock, the melody of the nightingale, and the constancy of the dove.

St. Domingo may cost Buonaparte more trouble than he thinks of. It is not likely that the blacks will be so fond of slavery, as to return to it from a state of liberty, merely from a desire of being equal to the free citizens of France, who have perfected their republican schemes, by a government one and indivisible.

Our republicans must feel proud on being subjected to a forced loan, but where is the money to be found? As the internal taxes are abolished, there is no other fund except one, which may be raised from the sale of the estates of aristocrats, which may be defended by the example of France. It is remarkable that this forced loan is not for the French republic, but solely for the emolument of the first consul, who is come in place of the ci-devant republic. The French seem to be a great nation of a very particular species. They are so great that they have not one farthing to buy their victuals, or pay their soldiers, but must bully other nations, like sturdy beggars. What is become of the plunder of Holland, Flanders, Germany, Italy, and Egypt? Unus Cynæb Juveni non sufficit orbis. Will he next plunder Saturn, or invade the Georgium Sidus?

A gentleman, who very frequently went to take an airing on horseback, was observed always to come home drunk, although he was never known to be intoxicated with liquor at any other time; whereupon a friend archly observed, that though he had a habit of getting drunk, it was only his riding habit.

Lord Brome, a member of parliament, once requesting leave of absence, on particular private business, just after his marriage, the wits immediately epigrammatized the simple excuse of the ardent bridegroom.

From the senate lord Brome wishes shortly to roam,
And the senate grants leave to the wishes of Brome,
Having business delectably urgent at home.

It is probable the French will not be long settled in Florida and Louisiana, before they will invade Mexico and Peru, and even the United States, if we are tardy in paying our tribute, or if we be averse to requisitions.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CHRISTIAN FORTITUDE.

The man, whom Fortitude sustains
To bear the frailties of his state,
To smile beneath a load of pains,
With soul above them all elate,
True hero-like, deserves the crown
Of merit and of bright renown.

He knows his Great Commander's will,
Who hath on trial fixt him here,
Where all is hostile, arm'd to kill,
And pois'nous objects good appear;
His dictates, therefore he'll obey,
Tho' all the world oppose his way.

Tho' fell Temptation's gilded shew
Attract his heart, his taste invite;
Tho' Passion's movements all should go
To prove the proffer'd fair delight;
Yet, trusting in his Conqueror's arm,
He stands unmov'd, secure from harm.

If Syren-pleasure spread her store,
Delicious to the wishing eyes;
And, ev'ry nerve unstrung of pow'r,
At ease he in her temple lies;
Sudden his monitor awakes,
He from her joys with horror breaks.

Now Fortitude is doubly strong :
 No more his eyes to ease incline ;
 No more his ears attend the song,
 That from Enchantment flows divine :
 But to his Object plac'd on high,
 He bends his soul....and dares to die.

What, tho' the thoughtless world should jeer
 And ridicule his lonely way,
 He smiles their grov'ling thoughts to hear,
 That never reach'd the source of day ;
 And while by impious ways they lose
 All bliss above....to that he goes.

PHILOMUSUS.

SELECTED POETRY.

JASPER,

BY MRS. ROBINSON.

The night was long, 'twas winter time,
 The moon shone pale and clearly ;
 The woods were bare, the nipping air
 Across the heath, as cold as death,
 Blew shrilly and severely.

And awful was the midnight scene
 The silent river flowing ;
 The dappled sky, the screech-owl's cry,
 The black'ning tow'r, the haunted bower,
 Where pois'nous weeds were growing.

An iron window in the tower,
 Slow creek'd as it was swinging ;
 And a gibbet stood, beside the wood,
 And the blast did blow it, to and fro,
 And the rusty chains were ringing !

With footstep quick, and feverish heat,
 One tatter'd garment wearing,
 Poor Jasper, sad, alone, and mad !
 Now chanted wild, and now he smil'd,
 With eyes wide-fixed and glaring.

His cheek was wan, his lip was blue,
 His head was bare and shaggy ;
 His limbs were torn, with many a thorn,
 For he had paced the pathless waste,
 And climb'd the steep-rock craggy.

His voice was hollow as the tone
 Of cavern'd winds, and mournful ;
 No tears could flow to calm his woe,
 Yet, on his face, sate manly grace,
 And grief, sublimely scornful !

Twelve freezing nights poor Jasper's breast
 Had brav'd the tempests' yelling ;
 For misery keen his lot had been Since he had left, of sense bereft,
 His tyrant father's dwelling.

That father, who, with lordly pride,
 Saw him from Mary sever ;
 Saw her pale cheek in silence speak,
 Her eye's blue light, so heavenly bright !
 Grow dim and fade forever !

"How hot yon sun begins to shine,
 The maniac cried, loud laughing,
 "I feel the pain that burns my brain,
 Thy sulphur beam, bids ocean steam,
 Where all the fiends are quaffing !

"Soft, soft, the dew begins to rise,
 I'll drink it while 'tis flowing ;
 Down every tree the bright rills see,
 Quick let me sip, they'll cool my lip,
 For now my blood is glowing.

"Hark ! 'tis the she-wolf howling by !
 Poor Jasper smiles to hear thee !
 For he can hide by the hedge-row's side,
 While storms shall sweep the mountain's steep,
 Then, she-wolf, can he fear thee ?

"Pale moon ! thou spectre of the sky !
 I see thy white shroud waving :
 And now, behold thy bosom cold....
 Oh ! memory sad ! it made me mad !
 Then wherefore mock my raving ?

"Yes ; on my Mary's bosom cold
 Death laid his bony fingers !
 Hark ! how the wave begins to lave
 The rocky shore, I hear it roar !
 The whistling pilot lingers.

"Oh ! bear me, bear me o'er the main,
 See the white sails are flying ;
 Yon glittering star shall be my car,
 And by my side shall Mary glide,
 Mild as the south-wind, sighing !

"My bare-foot way is mark'd with blood,
 Well ! what care I for sorrow ?
 The sun shall rise to cheer the skies,
 The wintry day shall pass away,
 And summer smile, to-morrow !

"The frosted heath is wide and drear,
 And rugged is my pillow ;
 Soon shall I sleep, beneath the deep,
 How calm to me that sleep will be,
 Rock'd by the bounding billow.

"The village clock strikes mournfully,
 It is my death-bell tolling !
 But, though yon cloud begins to shroud
 The gliding moon....the day stream soon
 Shall down yon steep come rolling.

"Roll down yon steep, broad flood of light ;
 Drive hence that spectre !...Jasper Remembers now her snowy brow,
 'Tis Mary ! see ! she beckons me....
 Oh ! let me, let me clasp her !

"She fades away, I feel her not !
 She's gone, 'tis dark and dreary :
 The drizzling rain now chills my brain,
 The bell for me rings mournfully....
 Come Death ! for I am weary.

"I'll steal beneath yon haunted tower,
 And wait the day star's coming....
 The bat shall flee at sight of me,
 The ivied wall shall be my hall,
 My priest, the night-fly humming.

"Yon spectre's iron shroud I'll wear
 With frozen spots bespangled :
 The night-shade too, besprent with dew,
 With many a flower of healing power,
 Shall cool my bare feet, mangled.

"Is it the storm that Jasper feels ?
 Ah no ! 'tis passion blighted !
 The owl's shriek makes white my cheek,
 The dark toads stray across my way,
 And sorely am I frightened.

"Amid the broom my bed I'll make,
 Dry fern shall be my pillow ;
 And Mary dear ! wert thou but here,
 Blest should I be, sweet maid, with thee,
 To weave a crown of willow.

"The church-yard path is wet with dew....
 Hence, screech-owls ! for I fear ye !
 Fall gentle showers, revive the flowers
 That feebly wave on Mary's grave....
 But whisper....she will hear ye.

"Beneath the yew-tree's shadow long
 I'll hide me and be wary ;
 But I shall weep when others sleep !
 Is it the dove that calls its love ?
 No ! 'tis the voice of Mary !

"How merrily the lark is heard !
 The ruddy dawn advancing :
 Jasper is gay ! his wedding day
 The envious sun shall see begun,
 With music and with dancing.

"How sullen moans the midnight main !
 How wide the dim scene stretches !
 The moony light, all silvery white,
 Across the wave illumines the grave
 Of Heaven-deserted wretches.

"The dead lights gleam, the signal sounds !
 Poor bark ! the storm will beat thee !
 What spectre stands upon the sands ?
 'Tis Mary dear ! Oh ! do not fear,
 Thy Jasper flies to meet thee !"

Now to the silent river's side
 Poor Jasper rush'd unwary :
 With frantic haste the green bank paced,
 Plunged in the wave....no friend to save,
 And sinking....call'd on MARY !

 "My Friend and Pitcher."

.....Licet mihi paupere cultu
 Securo cara conjuge posse frui.

TIBULL.

IN search of bliss I'd never roam
 From clime to clime, tho' I had leisure ;
 More rapture yields my peaceful home,
 Where lives my love, my only treasure.

CHORUS.

My girl so blest, by all carest,
 What transport 'tis at eve to meet her !
 My words are not with fiction drest,
 When I with praises fondly greet her.

Not all the gifts that fortune brings,
 Of titles, power, or sparkling treasure,
 If Laura soar'd on falsehood's wings,
 Would yield my soul a moment's pleasure.

With her, beneath some lowly cot,
 I wish to spend each hour of leisure !
 Then should life's cares be all forgot
 That might infringe my heart-felt pleasure.

Then hear, ye gods ! my fervent prayer !
 I ask but her !....not golden treasure !
 Her smiles can sooth the brow of care !
 Her charms bestow unequal'd pleasure !

No. XVI.

Mr. SAUNTER,

THE very respectable female correspondent, who appears in the front page of No. 15, under the signature of the letter M, and whose address to you is avowedly designed to draw your attention to a certain anonymous club, which, she informs you, has, for some time past existed in this city, has a claim to some further notice from you, than the mere insertion of her speculation in the Port Folio. Not knowing the extent of your information on the subject of her inquiry, and being myself possessed of some facts in relation to it, I presume to make a tender of them for your use, whenever you may think fit to profit by them.... Had a single epithet in this lady's essay been suppressed, it is highly probable that I should have spared myself the trouble of the relation I am about to lay before you; but, as a member of the club, which I shall take it for granted is the same to which your correspondent alludes, I could not tamely endure, that so harmless, inoffensive, and I will add modest an association, should be christened with the appellation of "intolerable."

You have heard, Mr. Saunter, of the immunity of invisibility, and can readily appreciate its value, when applied to an association of young gentlemen, be the object of their meeting what it may; for, considering the censorious temper of the times, we may say with Hamlet, "Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." This "fixed decree, which not all heaven can move," was so powerfully impressed upon the minds of the projectors of our club, that they purposely avoided the assumption of a name; nor did they, with less caution, or less reason, prescribe secrecy as a standing rule upon the members, as to the objects of the association; well aware that the prying, officious, and impertinent curiosity of the town would very soon disturb their harmony, by making them the theme of their conversation. Their own consciousness of propriety, they well knew, would be no standard for the rest of the world, and they, therefore, preferred obscurity rather than publicity, which must necessarily subject them to the malignant criticism of illiberal old men, and the frivolous title-tattle of idle women.

Having thus accounted for the motives which urged to the adoption of our plan, I proceed to an examination of some of the specific charges adduced by your correspondent against this club, which she has so good-humoredly baptized "intolerable."

We understand, that her favourite and only son has been a member of the club from the beginning, and that, since the first meeting, she has discovered a considerable alteration in his conduct towards his parents, as also an inattention to business, which excites in her mind great alarm and anxiety for his future welfare. Moreover, that he has contracted an air of pedantry, as disgusting as it is unintelligible; that he is constantly humming a song, or scribbling verses; and that, instead of the language of the shop, in which he was educated, he substitutes quotations, and scraps from Latin authors, which, to her intellect, are perfect jargon and "nonsense all."

I can easily conceive, Mr. Saunter, how aptly all these odious habits may be ascribed to an intercourse with our club; for nothing could be more natural, than that a fond, affectionate, and tender mother, observing so sudden a change in the behaviour of her darling child, should diligently seek for some immediate cause, to which it might be attributed; and, in proportion as he was reserved in his communications on the subject of the club, would her suspicion be awakened respecting it; and a very short interval would elapse between doubt and conviction, that the "intolerable club" had occasioned all the mischief of which she complains.

From an intimate knowledge of the transactions of the club, since it had a being, I can venture to assure you, sir, and through you this aggrieved mother, that her son has not contracted a single habit which she enumerates, in consequence of his frequenting our meetings. We do nothing, in the first place, that could inspire filial ingratitude or disrespect, for implicit obedience to, and acquiescence in, the orders of our officers, is one of our fundamental regulations. In the next place, sir, the musical propensities of this youth could by no means have been acquired among us; for it is well known, that a greater scarcity of musical talents was never found, in so numerous an assembly of young men: singing of songs, therefore, has, with few exceptions, been exploded from among us, by general consent. I may venture to go further on this head, and say, that, whenever an exception from this rule has been made, it has annoyed more than it has gratified, the majority of the members. Against the charge of scribbling bad verses, which is another of the offences specified by your correspondent, I am at a loss in what way to reply; for, if her son has really grown poetical of late, it may be attributed to his having so liberally quaffed from the fountain of Helicon, which is the source that supplies our club with table drink, instead of small beer. Since, then, I cannot absolutely repel this charge, I will endeavour to suggest one consolation that may probably result from it, viz. that the longer this youth continues a member of our club, the greater will be his talent for poetry, which is a genteel accomplishment, that few mothers would not be proud of in their sons, for this plain reason, that the genius of a poet must be born with him, and native genius always reflects honour, not only on the possessor, but upon those, to whom it owes its birth. I should hope to escape the accusation of pedantry, were I to indulge a quotation or two, in confirmation of my remarks; and, of all others, the Latin adage of "nascitur poeta" seems most appropriate to the occasion. Friend Alexander Pope might be brought in to my aid, if the lines from him were not so trite and familiar to every body. A partial parody, however, may render them still subservient to me, and thus you have them:

A slender poet is an odious thing,
Drink deep, or taste not the pierian spring;
For shallow draughts intoxicate the brain,
And drinking largely sobers us again.

I hope that the objection on the score of scribbling verses is thus, in a degree, obviated, and that, hereafter, we shall hear no more charges of a similar nature against us, from the same quarter. Surely this lady does not know, that the poetical department of the Port Folio is chiefly supplied from the contributions of our members.

Pedantry, Mr. Saunter, is defined by the philologists to be awkward ostentation of needless learning. It would but ill become a person, so accomplished in belle lettres, and so classically correct, as your correspondent, to denounce the retailers of Latin lore as guilty of pedantry; whence could she have derived her scraps, but from her acquaintance with Roman authors? But it seems there is one phrase, which her son often utters, and which you are called upon to translate, as she professes not to understand it. With all due submission to your superior skill in the science of translation, I venture to offer one of my own, and, for non decet rixari, I would read, "a common scold deserves to be decently ducked." The reply, therefore, of this youth to his mother's expostulation, seems to imply an opinion, that what she is pleased to call serious advice, is nothing more nor less than downright scolding and brawling, which no ingenuous youth can bear. I confess, that I cannot but admire the moderation and the forbearance which this retort exhibits. Socrates himself, when assailed with a shower of filth, &c. from the hand of his termagant wife, did not reply with more temper or coolness, "after thunder, usually follows rain."

After this vindication of the habit of retailing Latin, I am nevertheless bound to declare, that, in my opinion, nothing of this kind could have been contracted in the society of our club. We are not all scholars, and politeness towards each other forbids the use of any language, that is not understood by all. Sociability, "the feast of reason, and the flow of soul," are the characteristics of our association, and none but the fastidious and the morose would complain of a meeting of youthful companions, for such objects. "How shall we beguile the time, if not with some delight?" For "the time mis-ordered, doth, in common sense, crowd us and crush us to this monstrous form, to hold our safety up."

You may venture to proclaim, Mr. Saunter, in behalf of the Tuesday club, that the mischiefs predicted by your correspondent, as likely to ensue from it, are rather the ravings of a distempered imagination, than the semblance of reality. That, instead of making it a subject of censure, the ladies ought, most especially, to be our ardent friends and patrons; for, in the name of my brethren and co-associates, I venture to affirm, that we are, individually and collectively, very warm admirers, and passionate lovers of their sex. A truce then with railing, for, persist in it as thou wilt, "thou shalt sooner rail us into wit than holiness."

ARISTIPPUS, JUNIOR.

POLITICS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

THE fate of the United States is at length determined. That constitution, which her wise and patriotic statesmen had formed for her, is now no more; and in its place a system is erected, with characters entirely different, productive of effects directly opposite to those of the former one. When we look back on the few years, which have rolled by since the establishment of our independence, and accompany the retrospective view with a recollection of the unhappy, inactive, and impoverished state of our country at that time, and then survey the flourishing and prosperous situation of our country at this time, can we withhold our gratitude from those, who favoured that constitution, under which this state of things was produced? or deny our admiration to the system itself? A system so wise, so perfect, so just, we might suppose would have ceased only when the nation, over which it prevailed, should be swept from the face of creation. Yet, sir, in this evil hour...in this time of the tribulation of our country, has the hand of the destroyer attacked it....and it has fallen.

That the form of our government is, by the late outrage on the judiciary, essentially changed, cannot be doubted. We had a government of three separate, independent, co-ordinate, and active departments: we have now but two, and indeed one of those, deprived of its shield, will soon receive a stab from the same inveterate foes to the interests of our country, who have prostrated the judiciary. Our judges heretofore have been answerable for their conduct, to their God and their country; a consciousness of right has been with them a proof of it, and their determinations have been the result of that consciousness. But now another tribunal is to determine the propriety of the conduct of the judges, a new authority is erected to ascertain the constitutionality of laws. Congress usurps this authority, and the government is destroyed.

It may, sir, be observed by the superficial, that it is out of the power of the legislature thus to inroad on the original compact of our citizens, thus to prostrate our government. But, sir, let us, for a moment, examine the result of an opposition by the judges to the will of a legislature, whose heads and hearts are so vicious as to have projected and perpetrated this outrage, and the weakness of their power proves the extent of the conduct of congress. The judges of the supreme court, for from them, opposition must first be derived, resist this law, they continue in the old system of holding the courts, and issue a procedendo, to the circuit judges under the "Act for the more convenient organization," &c. An impeachment is the consequence. The event of an impeachment is not doubtful: the senate is to decide on its propriety....that senate, which originated the blow, confirms the impeachment, and the judges lose their offices. The rest is easy. Judges are appointed by the present executive, whose opinions three thousand five hundred dollars per annum will purchase, or mould in any form, and the triumph of the legislature is complete.

GERION.

PARLIAMENTARY ELOQUENCE.

[Many having expressed an eager desire to peruse the speeches of Mr. WINDHAM, as a fair specimen of his principles, his logic, and his eloquence, we select the following argument against a fantastic project of Fox and his party, for rewarding the hypocrisy and treason of that concomb politician, La Fayette.]

MR. WINDHAM said, that, if he had not intended to speak, he must have risen on the irresistible invitation held out to him, in the latter part of the speech of the honourable gentleman, who spoke last but two. He rose, however, not as that honourable gentleman had so pleasantly surmised, to reveal any thing that secretly lurked in the bosoms of ministers, but to tear the veil from the face of the honourable gentleman and his friends, and shew to the house and to the world what was the mysterious motive to their humanity....what it really was that put their feelings in motion.... what it was that suggested to them the extraordinary notion of selecting the marquis De La Fayette, and marking him out as an object, whose condition entitled him to the general feelings of humanity.

It was true, as the honourable gentleman had said, he had once or twice before risen from his seat, with a determination to state to the house reasons, which he thought would be found unanswerable....why the motion, as it stood in its original state, could not, with propriety, be granted. Other gentlemen, however, had caught the speaker's eye before him, and obliged him to sit down; a circumstance which, in the end, was rather favourable to his view, since it enabled him to state, with much greater force, and equal certainty of success, his reasons why the motion should not be granted, either in its original or amended state; as he, in his wish to state the question largely, would have found some difficulty in selecting the points, which it might have been necessary for him to press upon the consideration of the house, but which now lay in order before him, so that he should be able to compress them into a very narrow compass.

The house had been called upon by the honourable gentleman, in a speech of much ability, well calculated, from its style and delivery, to excite emotions of pity in their breasts, for a most extraordinary, unusual, and great interposition, on the plea of humanity. The questions that arose from this were....the weight of merit of the sufferer, the degree of humanity to which he was entitled, and the right he derived from them to be considered a fit subject for general humanity. Before he entered upon the discussion of these topics, he would say a word of the merit of this gentleman, who was the subject of the motion, as he stood with regard to this country. He had been one of the most active and irreconcilable enemies of England, in the American revolution. His visit to this country, immediately previous to that step, was, at best, not quite correct. It was hardly to be supposed, that he would designedly go there, fresh from the hospitality and civilities of this country, if he had not had some view injurious to it. He mentioned this merely to shew, that this gentleman, who had been held out as a mark for our particular favour and interposition, was, at best, a perfect stranger to us, and could be viewed by us in no other light, than as one of those, who rose and fell in the course of the French revolution.

Viewing him then only as a person bearing a share in that revolution, he conceived there was nothing to be seen in him different from those ambiguous, or worse men, who, in a spirit of perverted and unjustifiable ambition, introduced that fatal revolution into their country, and paused, when the ruin had been irretrievably done. To him, and those, who thought with him, that the authors of that revolution had been the bitterest enemies of mankind, M. De La Fayette was no object of esteem or favour; and if, as a stranger he was to be considered at all, must be considered to disadvantage. With the honourable gentleman, who made the motion, however, the marquis stood in a different situation: there were ties between them of a personal kind....for in early life a friendship subsisted between them, which the honourable general (much to his own credit, no doubt), would not suffer to be lost or obliterated, when his friend was in need and distress. While he bore this testimony to the honourable gentleman's heart, he must in justice bear testimony to his ability also; and particularly to the singular address, which he displayed in urging, with all his force, those parts, which were most likely to kindle feelings of sympathy in his auditors, while he touched slightly upon that part, which was weak and untenable, namely, the fact of the seizure of M. De La Fayette, as contrary to the law of nations. This question had been before discussed, and from the first mention of it, it had been, and still continued to be, his unalterable opinion, that whether on the point of his having ceased to act with hostility, or on the point of his having been taken up upon neutral ground, the arrest was not contrary to the law of nations or of justice: For he was taken in the character of an enemy, which he could not lay aside at will, when it served his purposes. When two nations were at war, it did not depend upon one party only when the war was to cease; nor was it competent to one country, or any individual of either country, to divest himself of the character of an enemy, or claim the privileges of peace, without the concurrence of the other. It was certain, that the friend of our enemy was our enemy, but it did not at all follow that the reverse of that was true, and that the enemy of our enemy was our friend. However the demands of personal safety, or the ruin of his ambitious schemes, had made the marquis an enemy to the men, who at that time filled the usurpation of France, his hostility to Austria was not less than before, nor was he competent to divest himself of it all at once, for his own convenience. As to the question of his being taken on neutral ground, it was one, with which neither of the contending parties had any thing to do. To the third, or neutral power, on whose territory he was taken, and to it alone, it belonged to complain of the act, as an infraction of neutrality; so that neither France nor Austria, and still less England, had any thing to do with it. Viewing the transaction, therefore, in its own direct form, and in all its relations, there was no injustice in it, with regard to the infraction of neutrality....no violation of the law of nations.

The marquis De La Fayette was, therefore, to be considered by the house (since he was forced upon their deliberations) first, as a prisoner of war, under the ordinary law of nations, and next as a stranger to England....this last no one could deny. He was not a native, nor had he been naturalized; he had never been in our service, he had never been even our prisoner; this country had no share in him or his services....he was no inhabitant of any country, which had been conquered and delivered up to the king of Great Britain; he was not one of those, who embodied in the cause of their lawful monarch and government, or joined those, who ranged under the banners of England, and were murdered in cold blood by their enemies; he never had even constructively put himself under the protection of this country; he had never been friendly to her interests. So that he was as completely separate from this country, its interests, or its favours, as any other person whatsoever on the face of the globe.

On the subject of the marquis De La Fayette's merit in the revolution, he would say but little. It had, in fact, been so tenderly relied upon by the honourable gentleman, that it was unnecessary for him to enter much into it; but never, never should be forgotten his gross and criminal neglect in June, 1789....never his conduct on the memorable 5th and 6th of October, in which there was clear and evident matter for condemnation, which, with the fate that subsequently attended him, should be an eternal lesson to all those, who, actuated by similar motives of guilty ambition, would bring ruin on their country. When at the head of the national guards, did he lead them, as was his duty, to the relief of his king? If he had not done so, what excuse could be offered for him? Would it be said, that he acted under the impression of terror for himself? If so, would they insist upon that as an excuse? or would they say, that he ought not to have risked his life? A soldier, honoured with such rank and favour, commanding the guards, could not have fallen in a nobler cause. He ought, even though certain of death, to have encountered it in discharge of his duty, and expiated, in some sort, the great calamities his ambition had occasioned. His own excuse was, that he had no command over the guards; but what could be said of a man, who, having declared that he had no command over troops, continued nevertheless along with them? He should have retired, and in repentance endeavoured to atone for the ruins he had made. But no....It was well understood what part he played, and what end he had in view. After having amused the king with a promise that there was no danger, which threw him off his guard: after the palace had been forced, and the royal family in danger, he appeared. Lulled into security by his promises, the king and queen had gone to rest....the mob burst so suddenly into the palace, that her majesty was obliged to escape undressed. La Fayette said that no farther violence would be offered; but when called for, was not in town. For how much mischief was he not answerable?

Having so far shewn the culpable conduct of M. De La Fayette, Mr. Windham said he would now go to the great act of merit, to which the friends of the marquis had been obliged to resort for want of better, and on which they seemed to lay so much reliance, as an act that was to redeem all that he had done before, viz. his merit in shaking and breaking down that constitution, which had for ages existed, and which, though abused, was yet capable of reformation. Appeal had been made to his conduct, in having saved the king from that very danger, into which his machinations had betrayed him. To all which he (Mr. W.) gave no credit, nor, he believed, would the house, or any unprejudiced, rational person....no, not an iota of credit farther than this, that his ambitious strides had brought him to a period, at which he was obliged to stop; and that he refrained from his own factious proceedings, only when a more furious faction threatened to overpower him. He would not say, for he did not believe that La Fayette wished entirely to destroy the king, or to erect a republic in the place of the monarchy, but that he wished to lower the king to a state of dependence on himself, and to be like Trinculo in the Tempest, viceroy over him. To encounter such evidence of guilt, stronger proofs than any which had been adduced were necessary. Considering the temper and opinions of the honourable gentlemen opposite to him, it appeared somewhat extraordinary that they should be advocates for La Fayette. They might be supposed to forgive him for his treachery to his sovereign the king, but how could they pardon him for the more abominable crime of treason to the sovereign people. This was one of the monstrous inconsistencies, in which the conductors of revolutions necessarily involved themselves. If La Fayette was fallen into misery, he had fallen the victim of his own act, and his own principles. He had brought himself into that state, into which all fomenters of great and ruinous revolutions must necessarily fall. He had betrayed and ruined his country and his king, and took refuge for his character and conscience in his own defeat; and claimed merit for stopping just at that point, beyond which it was out of his power to go; and then he became the enemy of those, whom he had made the instrument of his designs upon the king. He was the first to bring destruction upon the supreme power, and the first that turned against the jacobins. That he was the author of infinite calamities, no one would deny: of what his motives had been, there was no proof; but there was no more presumption in favour of his innocence, than there was in favour of any of the other persons, who were concerned in that horrible transaction.

M. La Fayette then being thus proved to be as to England a total stranger, the question, to which Mr. Windham proposed next to advert, was that of humanity, which, in point of fact, was the whole question of the night. With respect to the rigour, with which that gentleman was described to have been treated, Mr. Windham declared he believed that there was much of exaggeration in it; but, taken as a subject of humanity to work upon, he did not see how or why it should be separated as it were, and selected from all others. As the mere suffering of an individual, it must certainly excite pity; there was no case of calamity whatever, which, if seen abstracted from other considerations, but must excite the feelings of every one deserving the name of man. In this view, all cases of suffering had a right to be considered; but was every case, public or private, to draw interposition in its behalf? Did gentlemen look round, and consider the innumerable calamities that, by the wise disposition of Providence, beset human nature on every side, and offered so many subjects of appeal to our commiseration? Did they recollect how many, without crime or fault of magnitude, but merely under the influence of error, were drinking of the bitterest cup of life, to which it was impossible to extend interposition? Did they consider how many there were besides La Fayette, pining in confinement for debt or for crime? To see or think of a human creature enduring the rigours of imprisonment, or being carried to the execution of that punishment, which the laws award for the expiation of crime, abstractedly, must wring the heart of any man with sympathy and commiseration; but men should not, in such cases, consider the suffering separate from the causes and the circumstances, which occasioned it; their humanity would kindle compassion; but reason must over-rule that feeling, in consideration of the cause.

This was the reigning practical fallacy, with which questions of a very simple nature were attempted to be confounded. In the number of those, who had produced the French revolution, and followed it up with those enormities, which had surpassed all that poets had ever fancied, there were many, who, viewing their sufferings in naked abstraction, would excite compassion. For instance, that gentleman named Collot D'Herbois....he was condemned to Guiana, to which place vast numbers of the most learned and venerable men existing, the clergy of France, had also been condemned, for no other reason but because they refused to abjure their religion, deny their God, and swear and act in contradiction to their consciences. The place was chosen as that, in which human nature would most suffer, and every thing was done to render the hostility of the country more dreadful and destructive. If we were to abstract the suffering of the wretch, from the crimes that led to it, we could not but wish him rescued from such misery....We would say, perhaps, as others may say on nearly similar cases, " 'Tis true, Collot D'Herbois killed many thousand people; 'tis true, that when the guillotines were insufficient, and the executioners were fatigued with putting them to death, he ordered them, for more speedy dispatch, into a great square, where he fired upon them with cannon, and ordered in a party of cavalry to cut and trample to death the few, who had escaped the guns; but 'tis also true, that the thing is passed; and that the men are in their graves, and cannot be brought to life again. Poor Collot! he is not the better for being in Guiana....What is the use of it....Let us send for him, and bring him home....How can men of feeling think of prolonging the punishment of poor Collot D'Herbois!"

This, Mr. Windham said, was a perfect exemplification of that false humanity, by which gentlemen wished the house now to be guided; but he would tell them, that true humanity taught a different lesson, and forbid the practise of that spurious imposture under the name of it, which they advised. Mankind were not formed to pity at once the oppressed and the oppressor; the choice of the honourable gentleman opposite, was to take up and espouse the cause of the oppressor, but for his part, he would take up and espouse that of the oppressed.

He could not separate the idea of M. La Fayette from the millions who were suffering by his crimes. Did gentlemen doubt it?.....Let them look into our streets, and see men equal to La Fayette in honour, in rank, in talents, in courage, in every valuable quality of which his warmest advocates boasted his possession, exiled from home, ruined by the revolution, of which he was the leader and instigator, and involved in misery, in wretchedness, and beggary, by his crimes. Did gentlemen, who urged this measure know, or rather was it possible they should not know, that the opinion of all the best informed men in France was, that M. La Fayette's conduct to the king was cruel, fierce, and unmanly? And was it not universally known, from those, who were in the confidence of the queen of France, that that august and magnanimous personage often declared, he was the only man she could never forgive? She was often heard to say, she could forgive Barnave, nay, would interpose between him and the stroke of the executioner....but never could or would forgive La Fayette.

Having, with inconceivable ability, discussed these points, Mr. Windham said, he would now apply himself to a part, which would bring the house nearer to the consideration of the propriety of interference.

Would the house, he asked, believe, that the emperor was insensible of his consanguinity with the royal sufferers under this man's plans? Could they suppose, that that monarch, knowing all that had just been stated to be true, could fail of harbouring a just indignation against the author of his near relation's calamities and death? And were we, without knowing what his designs were, or what his actual treatment of La Fayette, to interpose and prevent his mode of treating the personal author of such crimes? Surely not;....it would be not only impolitic and impertinent as respecting ourselves, but extremely indecent and improper, as regarding his imperial majesty, to interpose in a case that lay so very near him.

In answer to an honourable gentleman on the bench behind him (Mr. Wilberforce), who had countenanced the motion by a speech and an amendment, and whose opinion it was, that it was our duty to go about Europe to dictate rules of policy, he would say, that his sentiments had overleaped the distinction made by the honourable gentleman opposite to him, for the same pitiable representation and relief which they confined to one, he would extend to all....so that, where was the work of the house in interference to stop?

While scenes of misery, in gross and in detail, surrounded us, and pressed upon our senses, whichever way we looked, how was it that gentlemen were so cold and so callous, as never to be quickened into feeling, but by the solitary case of Mons. La Fayette? In the greater instances, when the worst horrors were going forward, when our ears were constantly assailed with the cries of one half of France murdering the other, did the house forget, that the very suspicion that those sufferings were the motives to our interference, was sufficient to illegitimate all other causes of war....that this so vitiated it in gentlemen's estimation, that the whole formula of their objections construed into plainer language was, that the war was unjust and detestable, because excited by feelings for such misery and destruction!

If gentlemen wished for proper objects for the exercise of their humane feelings, let them look to 30,000 priests, pining in the prisons of France. They, however, thought more of that one man in the prison of Olmutz. There was, indeed, he said, something capricious and fanciful in their taste in objects of humanity. But of this it might be said, as of taste in other respects, to use an old Latin adage....De Gustibus non disputandum.

Gentlemen boasted pretty largely of humanity and feeling, at the expense of others. Nothing was more mean or dishonest, than to endeavour to catch reputation by a display of virtue, at another person's cost....to be courageous on other men's valour....to be generous on other men's money....to be charitable and magnanimous, at the expense of the feelings of others. Thus displayed, instead of virtues, they were vices. Dean Swift says "All men could bear the misfortunes of others, with christian-like spirit." So these gentlemen opposite were very liberal in forgiving injuries done to Austria and the queen of France. The merit of this, however, was not very striking.

Exclusive of all this, did gentlemen suppose, that M. De La Fayette was, if released, to sit down quietly, and not move in revolutions? Were there no countries besides his own in which he might display his skill in that way? Were there none caballing, that would be glad of the addition of such a clever hand? If there was a set of men, who were to be excluded from humanity, it would be the beginners of revolutions: the men for whom there should be the least tenderness were those, who first disturbed, and not those, who followed in lower ranks, at humble distance....those latter were not the greatest objects of resentment. The most just vengeance was due chiefly to those, who, abounding in all good things, and filled with spleen and impatience, drawn from the excessive enjoyments of life, with no haste to privation of their own comforts, with not one bit of nun's flesh about them, would, for their own vile purposes, sport with the happiness of mankind, and play the deep and damnable game of ambition. He would not be sorry....indeed he would rejoice, to see such men drink deep of the cup of calamity, which they had prepared for the lips of others.

On the whole, this was not a question of sentiment, but of prudence, policy, and general morality. If there were any grounds separate from those mentioned to sanction interference, he had no objections to its being done....but he would never consent, nor would the house, he hoped, in the absence of other reasons, to do an act, which would put a premium on revolution, give the sanction of example to treason, and reward rebellion.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

LORD KAIMES happily observes, that the elegance and end of female dress is better obtained by a delicate and graceful concealment of the form, than by that bold and voluptuous display, which the Parisian ladies affect. The imagination, unrestrained by reality, pictures a thousand concealed beauties, and revels in their supposed existence.

Rousseau has beautifully described these sensations, in one of St. Preux's letters to Julia.

"Be not surprised to find me so knowing in mysteries, which you so carefully conceal; this hath happened in spite of all your caution; for one sense instructs another, and, notwithstanding the most jealous vigilance, there will always remain some friendly interstice or other, through which the sight performs the office of the touch. The curious eye busily insinuates itself with impunity under the flowers of a nosegay, wanders beneath the spreading gauze, and conveys that elastic resistance to the hand, which it dares not experience.

Parte appar delle mamme acerbe e crude,
Parte altrui ne ricopre invida vesta;
Invida ma s' agli occhi il vacco chiudo,
L' amoroso pensier già non arresta.

In vain is half conceal'd the tender breast,
That gently heaves beneath th' invidious vest;
Swift through the covering darts the am'rous sight,
And the fond lover riots in delight.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

Sed turpem putat in scriptis, metuitque lituram.

.....I but forgot,
The last and greatest art, the art to blot.....

THERE are few instances of imperfection more mortifying to human pride, than those incidental ones, which occur in the most illustrious and distinguished characters. The traces of occasional oversight are most frequently discovered in those figures, whose outlines have been dashed with a gigantic sublimity; of the masterpieces of the most celebrated painters few will remain, which we can declare faultless; after those are excepted, in which some trivial oversight has been discovered, and published with all the efforts of industrious petulance. The errors of Hannibal and Charles the twelfth are such, as an inferior genius would have been preserved from, by the mere frigidity of cautious consideration, however superior the noble daring of a great mind may be to that cold and faultless mediocrity, which is approved without admiration. Though the puns of Paradise Lost, the incidental nodding of the Iliad, and the parties quarries of Somerset-place vanish before the collected splendour of the whole design, they must be regarded as infinitely more mortifying, than a series of continued dullness, or a collection of united deformity.

In such a train of reflections, I was interrupted, by an unexpected summons from my editor, who informed me, that a stranger, of a very extraordinary appearance, had, of late, made very frequent inquiries for me, and was now at his house, waiting my arrival with considerable impatience. As I am not by nature either incurious or discourteous, I followed my editor, who, after a walk of about a quarter of an hour, introduced me to a little parlour, and a little elderly man, with a very serious countenance, and exceeding foul linen.

After smoothing his approaches to my acquaintance, by some introductory compliments, he informed me, as indeed I might have guessed, that he was, by profession, an author; that he had been, for many years, a literary projector; that, owing to a kind of fatality, which had hitherto attended his attempts, and a firm resolution, on his own side, never to indulge the trivial taste of an ill-judging age, in which it was his misfortune to be born,....but he would not trouble me with a detail of the open hostilities committed on his works, by avowed criticism, or the more secret and dangerous attempts of tacit malevolence, and pretended contempt,....that he had lately hit upon a project, which, by its nature, must secure to itself the attention of the public, and which, if he had not formed a very wrong estimate of its merit, would draw his former efforts from the dust of unmerited oblivion, into general notice, and universal approbation.

"It could not have escaped an exact observer, and such a one he might, without hazarding the imputation of flattery, pronounce Mr. Griffin (whereupon Mr. Griffin bowed), that the reputation of our great tragic poet was sinking apace; and that, not so much from any radical or intrinsic defect in his writings, as from some venial errors, and incidental omissions. Our more refined neighbours had never been able to relish the low humour which pervades every scene, or the frequent violation of those unities, which they observe with so religious a regard. Mr. Voltaire, with that philosophic candour which so strongly characterized his life and writings, had abandoned his defence; and though, in some instances, he had deigned to borrow from him, had condemned him as the poet of a barbarous age, and the favourite of an unenlightened people. Even among a national audience, the most admired of his dramas were received at least without that enthusiastic applause, they had formerly excited; and we must expect, that, in another century, the partiality for our favourite poet will vanish, together with our national antipathies against popery and wooden shoes, and frogs and slavery, and that a taste for French criticism would immediately follow a relish for their cookery.

"Something must be done, Mr. Griffin, and that shortly. The commentators have done little or nothing. Indeed what could be expected from such a plan? Could any thing be more ridiculous? They have absolutely confined themselves to what Shakspeare might possibly have written! I am fully sensible, that the task of reducing to poetic rules, and critical exactness, what was written in ignorance and contempt of both, requires a genius and ability little inferior to that of the original composer; yet this is my project, which, however arduous in the undertaking, however difficult in execution, I am persuaded to attempt; and to whom can I with greater propriety.....Mr. Griffin, who himself.....so early an age.....in so extraordinary a manner.....&c. &c.

My friend continued by remarking, 'that the people of Athens allowed to the judicious critic, who should adapt a tragedy of Æschylus to the stage, an equal proportion of credit and copy-money, with the author of an original drama. Yet he desired me to observe, that the author of Grecian tragedy was far more strictly observant of poetic discipline, than the father of the English stage. In all his tragedies, there is only one, in which he has ventured to break the unity of place; an essential point, and, as my friend declared, highly necessary; though it is very natural for the spectator to mistake the stage for a palace, actresses for virgin princesses, &c. yet it is impossible for him to imagine that he is in Bohemia, when, but the act before, he was fully convinced that he was in Sicily.'

He at length concluded, by drawing out of a tin box some "proposals for publication," which he desired might be communicated to the public, through the medium of my paper; at the same time presenting me with a very copious specimen of the work he had undertaken. He reflected on the honour of such a distinction, 'but he was naturally partial to rising merit; and Gregory Griffin might see a period when he himself should exist only in his writings.'

In the course of conversation, my new acquaintance became extremely communicative; desired my opinion of a preface and dedication, and whether he should prefix to it an improved edition of Sleidan de quatuor imperiis, or Girton's Complete Pigeon Fancier; but upon recollection, resolved upon an ode which he had lately composed, On the use of Acorns in Consumptive cases.

Having occasion, in the course of conversation, to remark the number of classical scholars produced in our public seminaries, and the comparative paucity of those, who have directed their attention to the cultivation of their native language, my friend regarded the cause as extremely evident; there were several assistances which the classical composer enjoyed, which....but all these difficulties I should see obviated in his New Dictionary

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF EDMUND BURKE.

(CONCLUDED.)

MR. BURKE's principles were supposed so favourable to liberty, that, in 1774, he was chosen member for Bristol, by the zealous and spontaneous efforts of the whigs and dissenters of that opulent city. It does not appear, however, that, even in the great American contest, he ever explicitly declared himself concerning the fundamental rights of men in society. He was accustomed expressly to shun all such abstract questions, which he seemed to think dangerous, and incapable of positive decision; and his attacks upon the measures of ministers were chiefly directed against their inexpediency, severity, and partial injustice.

He very early proposed conciliation on the ground of renouncing future taxation, without discussing the question of right; though, indeed, he argued strongly against the assumed right of taxing British subjects, who were unrepresented. It is needless here to say, that all the efforts of Burke and his friends were ineffectual. The war even became popular, and Burke seemed to lose ground in the public esteem by his opposition to it. He further gave offence to many, particularly his Bristol constituents, by his support of the Irish petitions for a free trade, and of a bill for taking off some hardships and penalties, to which the Roman-catholics were exposed. He, however, recovered a large share of popularity by his famous bill of reform in the national expenditure, introduced in February, 1780. In the framing of this bill, it was wonderful what minute accuracy of research he had employed; thus usefully proving, as he also did by the general tenor of his life, that the most brilliant imagination is not in the least incompatible with plodding industry. His speech on the bill was likewise remarkable by an extraordinary mixture of wit and humour with financial detail; an alliance no one but himself could or would have made. But though the idea of retrenchment was very grateful to the nation, it was not likely to be so to ministers and courtiers; and Burke's proposed bills were rejected.

In March, 1782, an end was put to the ministry of lord North, which was succeeded by the return of the marquis of Rockingham and his party to power. Burke, in this change, obtained the lucrative post of paymaster to the forces, and a seat at the council-board. One of the first measures was the re-introduction of his reform bill, which passed, though not without considerable modifications. The death of the marquis, however, very soon put a period to this ministry; for upon the appointment of lord Shelburne to succeed him as head of the treasury, instead of the duke of Portland, several of the duke's friends resigned, and among them Mr. Burke.

The Shelburne administration did not long survive the peace; and it was succeeded by that known by the name of the coalition, as being composed in part of those former ministers, who had been the objects of such a long and violent opposition, and in part of that opposition itself. The coalition was projected by Burke, who appears little to have calculated the effect upon the public mind of such a violent shock to all ideas of sincerity and consistency. It was, however, conformable enough to his old notion of governing by great families, and certainly still further absolves him from the charge of democratical principles. This association of power was dissolved by Mr. Fox's India bill, which had the warm support of Burke, but united against it both king and people. Mr. Pitt succeeded to the helm, and dissolved the parliament. This measure was attacked by Burke with great acrimony, and he moved a set of representations to the crown on the subject, one of which seems to go further in asserting the right of innovating upon established constitutions, than his usual latitude. He says "Necessary reformatations may hereafter require, as they have frequently done in former times, limitations and abridgments, and, in some cases, an entire extinction of some branch of prerogative." The grand desideratum of so many friends of freedom, parliamentary reform, was not, however a species of alteration, which he approved; and he opposed the plan for that purpose introduced by Mr. Pitt in 1785. Such a conduct was consistent enough with the partizan of an aristocracy of borough-holding nobles.

The impeachment of the celebrated East India governor, Mr. Hastings, was one of the great events of Burke's public life. He was the original promoter of it; and private motives of resentment were thought to have united with a regard to public justice in his pursuit of that national cause. He employed uncommon industry in collecting and arranging the materials of the charge, and followed it up with distinguished perseverance and ardour. His principal speech in support of the charge, was remarkable for violence and exaggeration; and, upon the whole, he was no gainer in the public estimation by this memorable impeachment, though perhaps the enormous length of the proceedings contributed more to render it unpopular, than any well-grounded conviction of the innocence of the culprit.

The settling of the regency on the king's malady, in 1788, was another subject, in which Burke took a warm and active part. He contended vigorously against the minister's purpose of limiting the powers of the regent (the prince of Wales) and his principle that the regency was elective and not hereditary. It is well known that the efforts of the opposition on this occasion were neither successful nor popular; and Burke exposed himself to particular censure, in consequence of some very unfeeling and irreverent expressions concerning the king, which escaped him in the vehemence of debate.

The last great act of Burke's political life was the part he took with respect to that mighty event, the French revolution. Though it might be supposed that one, who had so long acted with the avowed friends of liberty at home, and had shewn such countenance to subjects, whom oppression had driven into actual rebellion, would applaud the efforts of a great nation to found a free constitution out of the wrecks of absolute monarchy; yet, on the other hand, his constant unwillingness to resort to first principles, his reverence for established forms, and all the honours and splendours of civilized society, his contempt for the vulgar, and, it may be fairly added, his strong feelings of justice and humanity, might reasonably be expected to cause him to regard first with suspicion, and then with detestation, a revolution, which soon betrayed symptoms of violence and a profligate spirit. He early manifested his dislike to it; and, in February, 1790, on a debate in the house of commons concerning the reduction of the army, in which Mr. Fox recommended a generous confidence of this country towards the new rulers of France, he broke out into a virulent declamation against the original principles and the conduct of the French revolutionists, renounced personal friendship with Mr. Fox and those, who supported the same opinions, and took his decided stand of hostility against every thing connected with the new order of things.

From that time he sat down to the composition of his famous "Reflections on the Revolution in France;" on which he bent the utmost powers of his mind. It appeared in October, and no work perhaps ever excited more attention, or produced more effect. It is, in reality, a performance of wonderful vigour, displaying every characteristic excellence of the writer, and not a few of his deof Rhimes; it was a work, which had cost him considerable labour and study. Those of his predecessors,....Bysshe, Gent, and others, were mere farragos, in which the sound only was consulted, without any nicety of taste, or accuracy of selection. This chaos, this rude and undigested mass, he had reduced to order, by selecting the rhimes proper for every possible subject, and reducing them to systematical arrangement. However, as this scheme must be unavoidably retarded by the prosecution of his former project, he should be peculiarly happy to see his system familiarly explained and illustrated in some of my future lucubrations.' This request, from an earnest desire I entertained of assisting young practitioners in the pleasing art of poetry, I immediately complied with: however, as I did not fully comprehend his system, I took the liberty of transcribing the following passages from my author's manuscript.

"For the eclogue, or pastoral dialogue, let the student conclude his lines with the rhimes underwritten, always taking care to finish his sense with the second rhyme, and at no time to suffer his verse to exceed the just measure of ten syllables. The rhimes for this purpose be these:

_____shady brake,
_____Licidas awake.
_____careless rove,
_____leafy grove.
_____fruitful field,
_____harvest yield.
_____tuneful measures,
_____harmless pleasures.
_____nymphs and swains,
_____flowery plains.
_____&c.

"Should our student turn his thoughts to panegyric, we would advise that he adhere to the endings we have here prescribed:

_____the muse,
_____a tributary—refuse.
_____good and great,
_____ordained by fate.
_____noble line,
_____race divine.
_____great—heir,
_____peculiar care.
_____&c.

"If the practitioner should perchance be possessed of a great fund of humour, and be inclined to employ his wicked wit in ridiculing the clergy, we would admonish him to adhere to the following terminations, in order as they are appointed, being careful only to confine his line to eight syllables:

_____musty,
_____rusty.
_____college,
_____knowledge.
_____farce on,
_____parson.
_____vicar,
_____liquor.
_____ease,
_____fees.
_____fire,
_____squire.
_____tale,
_____ale.
_____spouse,
_____carouse.
_____breed, _____feed."

Should the public approve of this specimen of my friend's abilities, I may perhaps, in some future paper, present them with a sample of his projected publication.

sects. A liberal antagonist will not deny that it contains much justness of argument, much profundity of observation, with extraordinary beauties of language; while a judicious advocate will confess that it is not free from sophism and misrepresentation, and betrays a heated and ungoverned imagination. The most reprehensible circumstance is, that the writer, in his zeal to deviate as far as possible from principles, which he thinks hurtful, uses arguments, which would be applicable to the defence of the most tyrannical establishment, and to the condemnation of every struggle in favour of liberty. This work had a sale almost unprecedented; and its author received the most unbounded praise from all, who were engaged in the support of establishments, and from many others, who were convinced by his arguments, and with him were shocked by the character the French revolution was daily assuming. On the other hand, it met with severe and formidable critics, and affixed, in the opinion of a numerous party, the stain of apostacy on the writer. It produced, among other replies, Paine's celebrated Rights of Man, which, for a time, seemed fully to balance its effects; but in the end, events, and the efforts of power and property, threw the preponderance in the scale of Burke; and it is not doubted that the turn he gave to the national opinions was an efficacious preparative to the ensuing war.

He followed up his attack on the French principles, with "A Letter to a Member of the National Assembly," in 1791; "An appeal from the New Whigs to the Old;" "Letter to a noble Lord on the Subject in Discussion with the Duke of Bedford;" and "Thoughts on a Regicide Peace;" with several memorials, &c. privately circulated; in all of which he displayed unabated powers of mind, together with such an earnest and inflamed zeal in the cause, as must remove all doubts of his sincerity. Indeed, enmity to the French revolution became the leading passion of his soul. He could not hear it named without violent irritation, and its successes certainly embittered and disquieted all the concluding years of his life.

Yet it must be allowed that his zeal was also invigorated by emolument. His hospitable disposition, and carelessness with regard to expence, had always rendered him a needy man; and the large pensions, which were conferred upon him by the crown, doubtless animated his love of royalty. These pensions were made a subject of severe animadversion in parliament, but he defended himself on their account with great vigour and spirit, in his "Letter to a noble Lord," above mentioned. The only other political object, which occupied him during this period, was the emancipation of the Roman-catholics in Ireland, from the disabilities they lay under, which he urged in "A Letter to sir Hercules Langrishe on the Propriety of admitting the Roman-catholics to the Elective Franchise," 1792.

He withdrew from parliament in 1794, and his seat for New Malton was occupied by his only son, a rising young man, whom his father viewed with the highest admiration as well as affection. The death of that son soon after, was a most severe stroke upon him, and hastened the decline of nature he was beginning to feel. This, by gradual approaches, brought on a tranquil termination of his life, on July 8, 1797, in the sixty-eighth year of his age. He preserved his senses to the last, and a few hours before his death caused to be read to him Addison's paper in the Spectator, on the immortality of the soul.

Mr. Burke was a very amiable man in private life, exemplary in his domestic and social relations, and greatly beloved by his friends, from several of whom he received substantial tokens of regard. His conversation was delightful, when not exasperated by inflammatory topics. He loved praise to a degree of weakness, and was not sparing in returning it. He had a very elegant taste for the fine arts, and was much attached to rural improvements, and the pursuits of agriculture. He was highly charitable and benevolent in his private capacity, and promoted many beneficent plans in his neighbourhood. The stream of his bounty latterly was directed to the relief of the sufferers from the French revolution, and he founded a school for the children of emigrants, the permanent support of which seems to have been one of his latest cares.

In addition to his literary exertions, it should be mentioned, that one of his biographers has asserted with the greatest confidence, that he was the real writer of sir Joshua Reynolds's Academical Discourses, that great artist having only contributed the general plan, and the professional observations; and indeed the finished excellence of the composition, together with the great pecuniary favours he received from this friend, might render the supposition probable; yet it is as strenuously denied by other authority. It is more certain that he had a great share in the composition of an admired account of the European settlements in America, undertaken by his cousin, William Burke. The celebrated Letters of Junius were by many ascribed to Edmund Burke, at least as a leading associate in the design, and plausible arguments have been adduced for the opinion: but this literary mystery is yet unravelled. Other anonymous pieces of the political kind are known to have employed the masterly pen of Burke, as a principal or an auxiliary.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following well-weighed remarks will be readily assented to, by the whole tribe of old fashioned politicians:

A brave people will certainly prefer liberty, accompanied by a virtuous poverty, to a depraved and wealthy servitude. But, before the price of comfort and opulence is paid, one ought to be sure that it is real liberty which is purchased, and that she is to be purchased at no other price. That liberty is very equivocal in her appearance, which has not wisdom and justice for her companions, and does not lead prosperity and plenty in her train.

Good order is the foundation of all good things. To be enabled to acquire it, the people, without being servile, must be tractable and obedient. The magistrate must have his reverence, the laws their authority. The body of the people must not find the principles of natural subordination by art rooted out of their minds. They must respect that property, of which they cannot partake. To tell the people that they are relieved by the dilapidation of the public estate, is a cruel and an insolent imposition.

We learn that Mr. WINDHAM, soon after his acquaintance with Mr. BURKE, became the most confidential friend of that great man. Like him, Mr. Windham loves a "manly, moral, regulated freedom," as the means of happiness, and therefore venerates the British constitution, as the best preserver of Freedom thus qualified. Thoroughly acquainted with the human mind, he has perceived, that the surest ratiocinative guide is Experience; and therefore Mr. Windham, like Edmund Burke, is a gallant, obstinate, determined, and persevering foe to speculative innovations. His speeches are less those of an orator, who wishes to impress your feelings, than of a philosopher, who seeks to inform, convince, and expand your understanding.

His orations are less frequent than those of many very inferior speakers, at least very inferior reasoners. He seldom speaks much, unless on important subjects; but the knowledge, the argumentation, the philosophy exhibited by him, when he does speak, renders his character very high. He is in great estimation, both by the party of which he is a member, and among those of the opposite side. From the beginning, he has always judged unfavourably of the French system, and the expanded philosophy of his friend, Burke, confirmed the conclusions of his own mind. He has uniformly reprobated the new order of France, and dreads it when practically held up as a model for Britain. On this topic, his powers fully unfold themselves; and in all the discussions on the internal state of the country, as affected by the dissemination of levelling doctrines, on a subject so momentous, he has displayed an energetic eloquence, that few could equal.

The following honourable and just testimony of the worth of the ex-secretary of state, Colonel PICKERING, we extract with chearful alacrity from the Baltimore ANTI DEMOCRAT. In this respectable journal we find many an admirable defence of upright men, and of correct measures; and the Editor of the Port Folio, both from personal and political attachment, is eager to give the widest currency to the well-earned praise of a sagacious, spirited, and steadfast statesman.

COLONEL PICKERING.

One of the most distinguished and leading traits in the character of democracy, is that of calumniating the federalists, the only true republicans of this country. Colonel Timothy Pickering, to his honour, has been one of their principal victims. It certainly redounds to his honour, for his most inveterate and bitter enemies, the hungry democrats now in power, unanimously confess that his office throughout the whole was administered with the most scrupulous honesty, and with a single eye, not to his own, but to the good of his country. Timothy Pickering was born an American patriot, and discovered this exalted feeling of the mind early in manhood. In March, 1777, the day of trial, congress resolved that an adjutant general should be appointed to the continental army, leaving the selection of the character to general Washington. Colonel Pickering was the object of Washington's choice....in the 2d volume of his official letters, page 77, we find the eulogy of Pickering: "He is," says Washington, "a gentleman of great military genius, cultivated by an industrious attention to the study of war; he possesses a liberal education, distinguished zeal, unsuspected attachment to our cause, with all, great method and activity in business." As Colonel Pickering did not enter into the service of his country a wealthy man, it was rather a misfortune to him, in a pecuniary point of view, to have been a patriot. In a service of near twenty years, he has laid up nothing, and like the rest of Washington's early friends, who stood by him in the day of battle, he is now forsaken, deserted, and traduced. Let us look round and see what description of men fill the public offices; the most prominent that offers himself to our view is, ALBERT GALLATIN, an imported patriot, half French, half Swiss, the reputed but secret leader of the western insurrection. Mr. Jefferson must either have believed there was not to be found in the United States a country-born citizen fit for the office, or was a matter of bargain between them. Give me the treasury, let me take care of your money, says Gallatin, and you shall have my interest in making you president of the United States. If Mr. Gallatin was indebted for his election to either of these considerations, how effectually must it wound the pride of a true American!

But most happily for the welfare of our common country, the evil carries with it an effectual remedy. The objects and views of these insidious characters are daily becoming more apparent to the well-intentioned part of the community, and we despair not to see in a very short period every deceitful, noisy, boasting democrat dismissed with disgrace from the service of his injured country.

An author, from whom the Editor does not often quote, has, among many false, the following just sentiments:

There is such a thing as honourable poverty.... The poverty of Cincinnatus was honourable; who impoverished himself by paying the fine which was factiously imposed on his son, and then was contented to pass his time alternately between the highest situations, and the most rigid simplicity. The poverty of a man of genius, such as Rabelais, if not honourable is interesting, when we compare his merits and worth, with that of many of those persons, upon whom Fortune has blindly lavished her favours. It is honourable, if he have declined the means of enriching himself, by the sacrifice of his INDEPENDENCE AND PRINCIPLES.

Possibly the French will demand our mammoth cheese for the first consul; and, should this be the case, how could Mr. Jefferson make it appear that he is the greatest man in America, when he is no longer in possession of the greatest cheese? It would never be believed, even in Cheshire.

As we are positive that many of our readers are partial to puns, and never look more queer than when they hearken to a quibble, we insert the following:

Mr. Wharton, an Oxonian wit, when once told that the duke of M. had disposed of a large quantity of carp and tench, at so much per pound, replied, I am not surprised at it, for I always thought him a d——nd sel-fish fellow.

How to make sentences.

A cavalcade of sentences is most striking, when a row of nouns is drawn up in the front and rear; and a period moves with a pretty ambling pace, when its several substantives are mounted on stately adjectives. To change the metaphor, words are an excellent screen to ideas. Luxuriance of branches diverts the attention from slenderness of stem; and to thicken the foliage, will be found the best method of concealing scarcity of fruit.

A drummer, executing his duty on an Irish recruit, who was to receive a certain number of lashes, the fellow, as is customary, cried out "strike high." The drummer, who was also an Irishman, desirous of obliging his countryman, did as he was requested; but the sufferer still continuing to roar out with pain, the drummer was offended. The devil burn you, quoth he, there is no pleasing you, strike where one will.

Extract of a letter from a gentleman in the country, to his friend here.

"Amid domestic afflictions, I sometimes try to comfort myself, by considering the misfortunes of others, and of the world in general. Great-Britain, the glory of kingdoms, and the seat of liberty, learning, religion, and happiness, has bowed to the power of France, and left the greatest part of Europe in possession of the Corsican chief. The United States have attained the honour of being subject to French requisitions. Buonaparte has been chosen president of the Cisalpine republic, and will, when he pleases, be chosen stadtholder of Holland and Belgium, king of Etruria, president of the Helvetian and Ligurian republics, and, perhaps, of the Iberian and Lusitanian, when these countries are revolutionized."

The burning of Princeton college is a glaring proof of the progress of revolutionary principles among us; and the late insurrection of the students at Williamsburgh may convince the most incredulous, that Citizens Giles, Munro, and the other heroes of democracy, have not preached the French doctrines in vain. It is feared that, by and by, we shall have no colleges, but that the house of representatives in congress will become the national institute, in which our youth will study republicanism, liberty, and equality.

In England, from a variety of happy accidents, their constitution is just strong enough, or, if you will, monarchical enough to permit a relaxation of the severity of laws, and yet those laws still to remain sufficiently strong to govern the people. This is the most perfect state of civil liberty, of which we can form an idea. Here we see a greater number of laws, than in any other country, while the people, at the same time, obey only such as are immediately conducive to the interests of society; several are unnoticed, many unknown, some kept to be revived and enforced upon proper occasions; others left to grow obsolete, without the necessity of abrogation.

Scarcely an Englishman, who does not almost every day of his life offend with impunity against some express law, and for which, in a certain conjuncture, he would not receive punishment. Gaming houses, preaching at prohibited places, assembled crowds, nocturnal amusements, public shows, and a hundred other instances, are forbid and frequented. These prohibitions are useful, though it be prudent in the magistrate, and happy for the people, that they are not enforced.

The law, in this case, still keeps the rod, though the child is seldom corrected. Were those pardoned offences to rise into enormity, were they likely to obstruct the happiness of society, or endanger the state, then justice would resume her terrors, and punish those faults, she had so often forgiven. It is to this ductility of the laws, that an Englishman owes the freedom he enjoys, in a manner superior to others in a more popular government. Every step, therefore, the constitution takes toward a democratic form; every diminution of the legal authority is, in fact, a diminution of the subject's freedom; and every attempt to render the government more popular, not only impairs natural liberty, but would, at last, dissolve the political constitution.

Nothing affords the Editor more pleasure, than an opportunity to quote and apply the doctrines of EDMUND BURKE, whenever they bear hard against the political visionaries of this country, as well as of France.

The new discipline of government has not the air of coming from those of many years tear and wear among mankind. They seem rather such as ought to be expected from those grand compounders in politics, who shorten the road to their degrees in the state; and have a certain inward fanatical assurance and illumination upon all subjects. One of your French doctors has thought fit, with great applause and greater success, to caution the national assembly not to attend to old men, or to any persons, who valued themselves upon their experience. I suppose all your ministers of state must qualify and take this test; wholly abjuring the errors and heresies of experience and observation.

As we are told that the right of a man is to be his own governor, and that he is to be ruled only by those, to whom he delegates that self-government, it is astonishing that we do not hear something of the rights of infants to wander from the cradle into the wide world, and the rights of boys utterly to condemn their parents and masters, and read Rochester's Poems instead of Lilly's Grammar.

Dr. Bisset, the accurate and industrious biographer of EDMUND BURKE, thus delineates the character of WILLIAM WINDHAM, Esq. a great statesman, who, it is expected, will be soon called to the councils of his country, "to dictate and to decide."

"Great minds only can derive great accessions of intellectual riches from intellectual treasures. There is a gentleman of the first talents, cultivated by literature, and disciplined by science, who has profited, beyond most men, from the examples and lessons of Burke, as his mind was more peculiarly fitted for receiving the advantages, not by nature only, but by a similar course of previous study. Mr. WINDHAM, before he entered parliament, had bestowed very great attention on letters and philosophy, and had attained uncommon excellence in logical closeness, acute reasoning, and profound investigation. Intimately acquainted with other men of letters, and a most favourite companion of the Litchfield sage, he had a mind well fitted by nature, and prepared by pursuit and habit, for receiving the wisdom of Burke."

We remember that Mr. Duane published a defence of the Princeton students, at the time of their first revolution; and we anticipate a vindication of the burning of Princeton college, and of the destruction of the college and church at Williamsburgh. In these blessed times of this revolutionary country, as changeable as the flimsy lutestring of summer wear, we have a right to expect the daily defence of whatever is atrocious, of whatever is flagitious, of whatever is scandalously conspicuous, or sordidly mean. We learn that several books are preparing, in defence of highway robbery; A Vindication of the right of being a Rascal in this free country, is in the press; and "Killing no Murder" is in a state of very great forwardness.

TO SUBSCRIBERS.

MANY of our subscribers are wholly regardless of the conditions of payment, to which a paper, like the Port Folio, free of advertisements, and conducted with great trouble and expense, must be subjected. It is not the extent of subscription, but very general and prompt payments, that must support this paper. It is presumed, that every gentleman, conscious of delinquency, either for the past or present year, will keep his original promise to the Editor.

TO READERS.

TO-DAY, we conclude the biography of BURKE. This is not the first life, which the Editor has published of that great statesman. One can never tire of the exhibition of genius, wit, and wisdom. The Editor thinks proper to add, that this well written article is entirely new, is from the pen of Dr. Aikin, and, coming from that quarter, is not without a tinge of prejudice against the just and salutary prejudices of the eloquent foe to the French revolution.

In our next, we shall present much new matter to the attention of the public.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

Norfolk, 19th April, 1802.

MR. OLDSCHOOL,

YOU will herewith find an attempt to translate the stanzas, of M. de Pils in your 13th Port Folio. If you approve you may give them a place in the next.

Yours, &c.

J. D.

LIFE's tedious journey....though the road
With cypress dark be overcast,
Yet still with passengers 'tis strew'd;
Having four inns for food and rest.

An ample stage-coach figures Fate;
Mankind, the passengers within;
Time is the coachman; to the gate
To drive them, of their farthest inn.

On this long journey, we suppose,
Man enters when he is but young,
And breakfasts at the inn with those,
With whom he yet has gone along.

About mid-day him Venus spies,
And begs that he will with her dine,
His hostess fair won't let him rise,
Till late he finds his loss of time.

Repentant for what did befall,
Ere yet the day be three-fourths spent,
He hies to Learning's famous hall,
Th'abode, he hopes, of mild Content.

Unnumber'd votaries there does view,
Who at each other's merit grieve,
Contending each with serious brow,
For two or three of Laurel's leaves.

Touch'd with commiseration just,
At the pursuits of such a groupe,
He mounts; and ere 'tis night he posts
To Friendship's cottage, there to sup.

But ere he has at this repast
Well found a solace to his heart,
The stern postillion's voice, aghast,
Him once more urges to depart.

It must be done; his soul succumbs
At the remembrance of his woes;
Arriv'dhe finds his goal the tomb,
Wherein at last he finds repose.

RETROSPECTION,

AN ODE.

AS downward on the stream of years
With constant lapse I glide,
How dark the low'ring sky appears!
How turbid rolls the tide!
Each hour the rough'ning billows flow
Involv'd in thicker clouds of woe,
On which, a sadly pensive form,
With drooping head, Dejection sits;
While gusts of passion rave by fits,
And blow a dreadful storm.

In vain with aching sight I try
The future to pervade;
No straggling beam of Hope is nigh
To light me through its shade.
Ah! then, permit me to review
The peace my youthful moments knew,
The peace I ne'er must know again;
The peace, which, too refin'd to cloy,
Possession calls consummate joy,
And Mem'ry joyful pain.

To Retrospection's piercing eyes,
In sunshine painted gay,
The scenes of former times now rise,
And now in mists decay.

My native cottage there I see,
Where in thy lap, Simplicity!
My guiltless childhood slept or play'd
In yonder fields, of thought devoid,
Or else with pleasing thoughts employ'd,
How often have I stray'd!

My parent brook I next behold,
To which I oft have run,
To view the fish their robes of gold
Shew glancing to the sun.
The copse and lawn to these succeed,
Where from my steps of eager speed
The infant linnets trembling flew:
Where, charm'd with beauty's brightest dyes,
I wont the gaudy butterflies
Unwearied to pursue.

But neither copse nor lawn delight
So much as yonder glade,
Which oft, from early morn to night,
My residence I made.
There, hid from each profaner eye,
My mimic toil I lov'd to ply,
While spires of pebbles round me rose:
E'en now methinks I busy stand,
E'en now, constructed by my hand,
The tiny turret grows.

Ah! happy view of happy years!
When Hope upon me smil'd,
Attended by her gay compeers,
Young Health, and Vigour wild:
When Fancy wav'd her magic wand,
And, instant, at her high command,
In all the rainbow's colours drest,
A thousand Pleasures o'er my head
Their variegated plumage spread,
Or flutter'd on my breast.

But Fancy now, deceitful queen!
Has from me stretch'd her flight,
And all the joyous fairy scene
Decays at Reason's light.
If Reason then can only show
My riper manhood sights of woe,
And give it o'er to sharpest pain,
Me, while the sons of Sense and Truth
Are wretched, may thy follies, Youth,
And falsehoods bless again.

THE RUSTICATED CANTAB.

I.

DREAD worthies, I bow at your shrine,
And, kneeling submissive, petition
You'll pardon this false step of mine,
And pity my dismal condition.
When ye met altogether of late,
In the room, which we term combination,
To fix your petitioner's fate,
Alas! Why did you choose rustication?

II.

That my conduct was wrong I must own,
And your justice am forc'd to acknowledge;
But can I, in no wise, atone
For my fault, without leaving the college?
Consider how strange 'twill appear,
In the mind of each fine jolly fellow,
That a cantab was banish'd a year,
Just for rousing a little when mellow.

III.

You have precedents, no one denies,
To prove it but just that I went hence;
But, surely, no harm could arise
If ye were to relax in your sentence.

No! trust me, much good would proceed
From granting this very great favour,
For, imprest with a sense of the deed,
I'd carefully mend my behaviour.

IV.

You will then have on me a fast hold,
For gratitude's stronger than any tie:
Then pray do not think me too bold
In thus begging hard for some lenity!....
But why should I humbly implore,
Since to you all my sorrow's a farce?
I'll supplicate fellows no more!
So ye reverend dons....caret pars.

V.

The lad, who good drinking enjoys,
I'll cheerfully pledge in a full can,
Rustication's quite common, my boys,
Remember Apollo and Vulcan:
These two heroes were hurl'd from the skies,
Neither forges nor music could save them,
For heartily d—ning their eyes,
Jove, a travelling fellowship gave them.

VI.

Then no longer let mortals repine,
If to grass sent from Oxon or Granja,
But stick to the blessings divine,
Which flow from a well-fill'd decanter.
When our goblets with nectar are crown'd,
And our spirits rise faster and faster,
Whilst good-humour smiles gaily around,
A fig for the fellows and master.

LIFE LET US CHERISH.

LIFE let us cherish
While yet the taper glows,
And the fresh flowret
Pluck ere it close.

Why are we fond of toil and care,
Why choose the rankling thorn to wear,
And heedless by the lily stray,
Which blossoms in our way.

When clouds obscure the atmosphere,
And forked lightnings rend the air,
The sun resumes his silver vest,
And smiles a-down the west.

Why are we fond &c.

The genial seasons soon are o'er,
Then let us, ere we quit this shore,
Contentment seek, it is life's real,
The sunshine of the breast.

Away with every toil and care,
And cease the rankling thorn to wear,
With manful hearts life's conflict meet,
Till death sound the retreat.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XVII.

THE ensuing letter was some time since received from an indignant fair one, who, by many a sly allusion to the prospectus of the Port Folio, and by many a sharp sarcasm upon the woman hater, appears to be of opinion, that the good-humoured Samuel Saunter is an enemy in disguise. Although I am reflected on with much asperity, yet, as my petticoated punisher evidently inflicts her chastisement like an upright British judge, not in malignity, but in mercy to the criminal, I have resolved, with that frank facility, which is a part of my character, to publish her ironical epistle; and, this week, suffer my numerous adversaries to partake in a general laugh, at the expense of their humble servant. At the execution of the earl of Ferrers, the London populace were of opinion, that, in the mind of the noble sufferer, the bitterness of death would be assuaged, should he be strangled with a silken cord. In like manner, if I must be a public spectacle of poetical justice, let "Constantia" be the sheriff's officer to lead me forth, and I shall fancy that her thong is of silk, and each blow as soft as her own bosom.

MR. SAUNTER,

YOUR very useful predecessors, the writers of periodical papers, have, at all times, devoted much of their talents to the reformation of women. Volumes upon volumes have been written, exclusively for our edification; essays upon essays have satirized our follies, and still we are no better than we were a thousand years ago: remonstrance and intreaty have been in vain, and even "the world's dread laugh" has been lost upon us; for we are yet in the practice of the most abominable vices, and incorrigible beings that we are! we still require "the chastisement" of your "gentle" pen. Some wholesome advice we have long expected from you, who would not depart from the good old track of your ancestors, and, in "a paper devoted principally to moral instruction," we were conscious we were entitled to very liberal notice; for, as "the influence of female principles on the character of men" is acknowledged to be "wide and powerful," it becomes the duty of every man, who can write at all, to incite us to virtue, by representing the frailties (or, if they please, the vices too) of human nature, in female forms, that we may be disgusted by their deformity.

Nor have we any right to require of superior man an example of the virtue to which he would train us; our state in society is a dependent one, and it is ours to be good and amiable, whatever may be the conduct of the men, to whom we are subjected. No doubt these scandal-loving ladies, of whom your suffering correspondents so piteously complain, have taken it into their wise heads to imagine that it might be incumbent on the dignity of that virtue, to the practice of which they have been so loudly exhorted, to condemn, perhaps in terms a little harsh, the vices of those injured gentlemen; but let them know, sir, how much they are deceived. Their presumption is a departure from that modest silence, so grateful in a woman, so enchanting to man! Hopeless, however, I fear, will be the task to persuade women, that silence is becoming; for so dearly do they love to be heard, that they would much rather talk nonsense, than not talk at all. Our curiosity too, which you have so delicately touched upon, I think you will find it difficult to suppress. Indeed, Mr. Saunter, we have heard so much, and so often, of our grandmother Eve, that I verily believe many women are become tenacious of this enormity, as their birth-right, and practice it as a filial compliment to her memory. They seem too to have picked up a foolish notion, that vice is vice, whether it wears petticoats or pantaloons: but here again how sadly are their limited understandings imposed on. Simple ones! will ye never learn to discriminate? Will you never know, that to ask questions, and to betray an anxious desire to learn the circumstances of any event, is, in man, a commendable endeavour to acquire knowledge, but, in woman, it is a mischievous and impertinent curiosity, for which they are justly reproached by the moralist, and deserve the "pointed finger of scorn?"

For these and all other faults, to which we are, as women, liable, it is very kind in you to add your mite of "gentle chastisement." Nor will you find it very laborious, if you should promise us a column or two every week for this benevolent purpose. You will receive very liberal assistance (as your correspondents seem to testify); because it is by no means necessary that your satires should be appropriate to this country; a fragment picked up by a friend in the streets of London, or even of Constantinople, would do just as well for a libel on the American women, as if it had been fabricated in the metropolis of our own follies. Our moralists, I observe, are never very nice in this particular: they think, I suppose, if the remarks, which they have culled from European writers, on the wickedness or the folly of their females, are not applicable to us now, why, they will be, an hundred years hence, when overgrown wealth and luxury shall as naturally have produced them here, as they have arisen in those countries, where these evils have abounded; therefore, in the hope of longevity to their labours, they trust they shall do good in their day, when it comes.

Go on then, sir, in your very acceptable undertaking; be not dismayed by the angry frowns of ladies, who may "smart with their wounds;" it is easy to compromise with them, by a little seasonable flattery and coaxing about their charms, and their merits, and their "influence on the characters of men." Tell them, that you do not mean to "calumniate the female character," but that it is your "duty to scourge impostors;" to make them what Nature intended they should be, all very good; and when you can persuade them to believe you, be assured they will be satisfied.

INTERESTING TRAVELS IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BÜLOW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

..... Non de illis domibus alienis

HORACE.

IT may be remembered, that, in some late numbers of this paper, a friend and classical correspondent of the Editor communicated a review of a series of letters, relative to the United States, originally written in German, by Mr. Bülow, a disbanded Prussian officer. This "Review" first appeared in the Spectator of the North, a literary journal, published at Hamburg. The American translator of this article very justly remarks, that, as a literary article, connected with the history and character of the United States, it is peculiarly entitled to notice. The picture, which this Prussian delineator, or dauber, has drawn, is, in many respects, a frightful caricature; but, as it is often eminently useful to hear distinctly the reproaches of our enemies, the Editor of the Port Folio was of opinion, that to know even the unfavourable sentiments, which a foreigner entertained of America, might interest some, and instruct others. The article, amounting nearly to a libel upon the country, was accordingly published. Meanwhile, a translation of the entire work has been faithfully made, and kindly sent to the Editor, by a man of letters, whom Learning vindicates, as a favourite, and whom the Editor is proud to call his friend. It is proposed to publish a portion; and perhaps the whole of the journal of our Prussian traveller. Amid much partiality, malignity, and misrepresentation, it contains some wholesome, though perhaps unpalatable truth, and much interesting description, conveyed in a style, far from phlegmatic. Of the translation, it only remains for the Editor to add, that, being close and literal, something of the German idiom will strike the eye, and, occasionally something of harshness in construction and sound may offend the ear. Of the opinions of this prejudiced Prussian, it is unnecessary for the Editor to express his frequent disapprobation. By publishing them in his journal, he invites the public attention, in the sure and lively hope, that many a scrutinizing eye will detect, and many an ingenious hand describe, the fallacies of an insolent and presumptuous writer. It cannot be presumed, that a mere soldier, subordinate to the severity of Prussian discipline, could correctly appreciate the blessings of republican freedom.

PREFACE.

I NOW deliver to the public the result of my observations, concerning America. I was twice there: from September, 1791, to the 23d July, 1792; and from 30th September, 1795, to 7th October, 1796.

When I returned to Europe the first time, I brought away not unfavourable ideas of America. A moral atmosphere, little agitated by the wind of passions, left me the impression of more good-nature, and more innocent manners, than we remark in the corruption of Europe. I did not consider the Americans, to be sure, as heroic republicans, but they appeared to me less selfish and malignant than the Europeans. All this was illusion, occasioned by that apparent calm in the passions. For, immediately upon my second arrival there, I found every thing altogether changed. Circumstances had brought into action that moral depravity, which existed before, without being put into motion.

Still, however, I defended, for some time, the virtue of the Americans, against the unanimous testimony of all foreigners; but at length, I too yielded to the force of evidence, and the official letters of General Washington gave me a full and clear insight into the national character of the people.

These gradations of opinion will be very easily remarked in my letters from America, which were published in the Minerva of Archenholz. The tenor of the first is far more advantageous to the Americans, than that of the following ones; and the last are by far the most to their disadvantage. However trifling, in other respects, the merit of these letters may be, it will be easy to recognize in them a sincere love of truth, which discards all other considerations, and whose only object is the information of the German public, concerning a subject, which interested or prejudiced writers have attempted to represent in so false a light.

Perhaps, however, the impression of present immorality was too lively to be described with cold impartiality; perhaps, after things have been seen close at hand, they should be considered likewise at a certain distance; and, therefore, the first months after my return to Europe, when the impressions received in America were yet fresh in my mind, were the fittest time to paint the Americans, such as, in my opinion, they are. In this work is, therefore, contained all that I can say to their advantage. That my judgments were not dictated by offended egotism; that I have never been personally deceived, or otherwise injured, by any American, is what will, perhaps, be questioned; for, at this day, no man is credited for a pure, disinterested love of truth. It will be likewise scarcely believed, that I write exempt from hatred; for truth has often the appearance of satire. I am indeed animated with hatred; but it is hatred against vice, not against individuals, only inasmuch as they are vicious.

VOL. I. PART I.

THE PEOPLE. CHAP. I.

Insufficiency of published travels, with respect to the knowledge of national character.... Doctor Schöpf
....Brissot....Chatellux....Wangenheim....Bartram, &c....History the principal test of character.... Origin.

IN order to form a correct judgment concerning a people, the impartial observer allows no great weight to the private accounts of travellers.

For, when we consider the influence which egotism generally has upon their opinions, we must acknowledge, that we are not authorized to adopt them for oracles. The circle of observation of one or a few travellers is, besides, so limited, that they cannot properly draw from it any general conclusions. And finally, how many travellers are there, guided by an accurate spirit of observation, and thereby capable of abstracting general truths? How many, impelled by a criminal self-interest, spread abroad relations wilfully false?....A concurrence of many travellers would indeed bring us near the truth; but as they so often contradict each other, there is little to be learnt from their journals.

There have indeed certainly been some travellers, gifted with genius and a spirit of observation, who have published faithful pictures of the nations which they visited. But, as even so many admirable faculties of the mind were not sufficient to procure for us true characterizing travels, unless when conducted by a rigorous love of truth, and a contempt of all personal considerations, I think I may, without offence, maintain, that they are rare phenomena, and that far the greater number must be reckoned among the class, which I have just mentioned.

Among the travellers, who have gone through the United States, and have published their remarks, Doctor Schöpf deserves to be mentioned as the man, who has painted things with the greatest likeness to the truth; and thus, in this instance too, the German nation has the merit of having done the most. Brissot, in his rapid journey through the country, either judged the people inaccurately, or purposely imputed to them other properties than those which he remarked. For one of his friends in America assured me, that, according to his own expression, he described the quakers as a model of virtue, in order to hold up to the French, at the beginning of their revolution, the image of a perfect republican for imitation. It was, forsooth, a singular idea, to consider the Pennsylvanian quakers as models for a lively and warlike nation like the French. Chatellux, who marched with the French army through part of the country, was not in a situation to make himself sufficiently acquainted with the character of the people. The remarks of a certain Italian count, and of Wangenheim, relate chiefly to inanimate nature; and those of an English officer, who settles, for instance, in the country town of Lancaster, ten thousand inhabitants, whereas it contains, even at this day, only three thousand five hundred, are equally trivial and inaccurate. The letters of an American farmer paint, with a naïveté, which forms the intermediate point between rusticity and civilization, the happy rural condition of a period, which ceased with the revolution. Finally, the writings of Americans themselves, such as Imlay and Bartram, are partially in favour of their country, at once heavy, declamatory, and ambitious to display unseasonable flowers of style. There is reason, therefore, to maintain, that what has hitherto been written of America, with respect to the character of the people, is insufficient.

We must, therefore, turn towards other sources than printed travels, for instructive information concerning the national character, and the principal of these sources can be no other than history. For as the assemblage of actions, or the life of an individual unfolds his character, so the actions of a people, which its history relates, are the best and most explicit commentary upon the national character. Are we not, for instance, sufficiently acquainted with the national character of the Greeks, Romans, and Carthaginians, by means of the history of these renowned ancient nations?

The political constitution of a people is another criterion of character, which is, however, comprized in their history. The laws, or civil constitution, come next under consideration. These, however, for the most part, pourtray the government more than the people, because, by the political institutions of most nations, their governments possess the power of legislation, and, of course, laws can characterize the people, as expressions of the general will, only where the people themselves possess the rights of sovereignty, or the legislative power. In representative constitutions, this will be, to a certain degree, the case. General usages and manners, opinions and sentiments, the modes of social intercourse, the general taste and public amusements, the judicial proceedings and characteristic anecdotes, are lastly the features, which strongly distinguish the peculiarities of national individuality.

The climate, the organization of the country, in a word, its natural constitution, are also things which are generally allowed to have a very considerable influence upon the national character. When, therefore, it can be proved, by conclusions drawn from these circumstances, that a people must have such and such properties, unless other weighty causes should counteract them, and when history supplies a confirmation a priori of this reasoning, so that the nature of the country appears in preconcerted harmony with the people dwelling in it, every one will, as I believe, readily acknowledge, that a strong presumption arises, that the conclusions could not be far remote from the truth. The origin of a people, I mean the character of their ancestors, must, for reasons which I shall set forth, be taken largely into consideration, in inquiries concerning the national character; and I shall endeavour hereafter to show why, contrary to the general opinion at this day, I venture to ascribe likewise a great influence to religion.

These are, therefore, as I believe, the data, by collecting and comparing which, a pretty accurate judgment concerning a nation may be extracted from them. These are generally the facts, upon which I shall ground my inquiries concerning the people of the United States of America. I shall begin with some general considerations; and, in order to ascend to the first sources, pay my first attentions to the forefathers of the present Americans.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS,

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

I DO not always, especially in my vacant hours, neglect a novel, merely because I am told by a dull searcher for matters of fact, that it is not legitimate history. Of the ordinary trash of a circulating library my friends will easily acquit me of the suspicion of being studious. But I have read, even for the tenth time, the pages of Fielding, the Quixote of Cervantes, and the Crippled Devil of Le Sage, as well as the record of a Mary's sufferings, and an Elizabeth's glory, by Robertson and Hume. I have seen real life, and found pregnant instruction in the Roderick Random of Smollet, the Cecilia of Miss Burney, and the "Tale of the Times," by Mrs. West. If I pick up a volume, elegantly written, sparkling with wit, true to nature, and a copy from life, what does it import me whether it was composed from monkish annals, preserved in the library of the "Faculty of Advocates," or from the hints in an Addison's pocket-book. A good story is the same, let it issue either from "knighly castles, or from ladies' bowers."

The latest Gentleman's Magazine, which my eager curiosity has obtained from London, contains the following admirable parody of the soliloquy in HAMLET. He, who remembers the lively ode of BURNS, or who adverts to the torment of a throbbing tooth, will smile at the poetical doubts suggested below.

To have it out or not? that is the question;
Whether 'tis easier for a man to suffer
The throbs and shootings of a raging tooth,
Or take up courage to sit down at once,
And by extraction end them;—a touch, no more,
And with a single shock to feel we end
The tedious aches and head-distracting pangs
That we are subject to: 'tis a relief
Most wisely to be used; perchance wrench out
A sound deep-rooted fang: aye, there's the risk;
For, from a bungler's hands what mischief follows,
When once the horrid instrument is fix'd,
Allows no pause; there's the respect
That makes our patience of so long endurance:
For who would ever be applying tinctures,
Specific opiates, poppy, mandragora,
Magnets, metallic tractors, anodynes,
The poisonous drugs of mountebanks, or charms,
That fond credulity of old women takes;
When he himself might his quietus get
For a bare two-pence in a barber's shop?
Who'd sweat and groan whole sleepless nights in pain,
But that the thought of torture worse than all,
A broken jaw! (which any mortal suffering
Would straight fall frantic) harrows up the soul,
And make us rather bear our present torments,
Than fly to others, that we never felt:
Resolution thus doth make men cowards;
And heroes, of great enterprize and valour,
Turn pale and sickly at bare sight of physic,
Whilst women, weak and delicate of frame,
Shrink not at operations slow and dreadful.
Nor fear the keenest knife.

HAMLET, III. I.

As the writer of this article has frequent occasion in the way of business to drudge through the heaviness of the modern pastoral, to laugh at elegies upon faded beauty, and to sneer at your Philanders and your Corydons, nothing can more pleasantly describe this woeful style of poetry, than the following passage from one of the gayest of the British writers.

"There are several ways of being poetically sorrowful on such occasions. The bard is now some pensive youth of science, who sits deploring among the tombs. Again, he is Thyrsis complaining in a circle of harmless sheep. Now, Britannia sits upon her own shore, and gives loose to maternal tenderness; at another time, Parnassus, even the mountain Parnassus gives way to sorrow.

"But the most useful manner is this: Damon meets Menalcas, who has a most gloomy countenance. The shepherd asks his friend, whence that look of distress? to which the other replies that Pollio is no more. If that be the case, then, Damon, let us retire to yonder bower, at some distance off, where the cypress and the jessamine add fragrance to the breeze; and let us weep alternately for Pollio, the friend of shepherds, and the patron of every muse. Ah, returns his fellow-shepherd, what think you rather of that grotto by the fountain side; the murmuring stream will help to assist our complaints, and a nightingale on a neighbouring tree will join her voice to the concert. When the place is thus settled, they begin. The brook stands still to hear their lamentation, the cows forget to graze, and the very tigers start from the forest with sympathetic concern.... By the tombs of our ancestors, my dear Fum, I am quite unaffected in all this distress; the whole is liquid laudanum to my spirits; and a tyger of common sensibility has twenty times more tenderness than I.

The Sonnets of Charlotte Smith are too monotonously mournful. They are like the ill-boding croak of the sinister raven, or like the sullen ding-dong of funeral bells. I dislike this pungent style of grief, which, like an acid onion, compels the irritated eye to weep. In America, the sources of Chagrin are sufficiently multiplied, without the fictitious sorrows of the muse. One need not be "alone and pensive" by the light of the moon to see much political and moral evil. Our "pestilence" does not content itself with "walking in darkness," but "rageth at noon day."

A discontented Englishman, migrating to America, and journalizing his voyage, thus introduces, after the manner of Brissot, Godwin, and the rest of that herd, the following commendation of a negro:

"The best seaman we had on board was a black, who discovered, in no respect, any mark of inferiority to men of a lighter complexion. His grandfather was kidnapped, when a child, upon the coast of Africa, but his father is become an independent man, and is the cultivator of thirty acres of his own property upon Long-Island, in the state of New-York, &c."

We are astonished that this writer, who is one Mr. Toulmin, a fugitive from the episcopal church, did not declare, that this sable worthy, now "an independent man," was not fully competent to any service in our church, or any office in our state. As "we are all federalists, all republicans;" as we are all negroes, all white men, this African, the favourite of Mr. Toulmin, and the new philosophy, is certainly eligible to the first stations in a commonwealth. The usual course of Nature, and a uniform train of facts are, however, militant both with the theory and the wishes of Mr. Joshua Toulmin. He may violently push up a weak man into the seat of judgment, or, with his ordaining hands, make a negro independent, but he cannot keep him so. In the turbid agitation of factious times, base and ignorant men, like the scum of the reeking cauldron, are frequently uppermost. But the laws of nature, though they may be disturbed, are never abrogated. In the hocus pocus tricks of a revolution, the merry-andrews of the show may, by their dim light, cause Plausibility to appear like right Reason, and degraded Genius and Virtue to seem "shorn of their beams." But the season of deception is short, and the phantoms of imposition flee away. Briefly to show the grossness of this Toulmin theory, we will only require this reverend friend to the rights of negroes to examine into the present history of his eleve. Mr. Toulmin describes this sooty independent as cultivating thirty acres of his own property, &c. I think the date of this possession was 1797, or 1798. I will hazard a conjecture that the negro may now be surnamed Lackland, and that, if he has not already grown weary of his galling freedom, he will, in no long time, seek the protection of a master. If this be not actually the case, it forms the first exception, of which the writer of this article has ever heard. After the character of an Ethiopian is once deteriorated by his being stolen by a Guinea captain from the shade of the palm-tree, and broiled in a rice plantation, by that worshipper of liberty, a Virginia slave holder, it is not all the Condorcets, the Brissots, the Joshua Toulmins, or the abolition societies that ever were deluded by the glare of false philosophy, who can make him free and equal like those, who have immemorially lived under another condition of society. A sober man, who remembers history and consults Experience, whose sentiments are old-fashioned, and who respects most those forms of government, which are strong and durable, cannot but deride the monstrous theories, so much in vogue, which, in the chace of visionary perfection, have wholly lost sight of truth and utility. "You think," said EDMUND BURKE* to the mountebanks of the French national assembly; "you think you are combating prejudice, while you are actually AT WAR WITH NATURE."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF CHATTERTON.

[The life of CHATTERTON, one of the most brilliant and unfortunate of mankind, will attract the attention of all, who have a heart to be touched by human miseries, or imaginations to be captivated by what is most exquisite in poetry. To the fame of this hapless youth, a crowd of judges have borne the amplest testimony. For a wonderful prematurity of talents; for an invincible industry, and a boundless invention, he has been justly considered as a dazzling miracle in the history of literature. He was a magician; and the potency of his poetical spells has confounded the reasonings, even of veteran incredulity. With the "wild wit" of SHAKESPEARE, with the sublime conceptions of MILTON, and the "long resounding march" of DRYDEN, this boy bard rushed naked into the amphitheatre of life, and sustained a brilliant part, though his spectators were contemptuous and cold. His misfortunes and his errors were manifold. Let the first be deeply deplored, and the last charitably forgiven. In the splendour of his endowments, men have nearly lost sight of all but his last indiscretion. Even the austere moralist has wept over the early grave of ill-starred genius. Like a plausible critic, Dr. KNOX has recounted his talents, and has lamented his eccentricities, like a candid friend. Dr. GREGORY has almost become his apologist; and Dr. JOHNSON, who visited Bristol to investigate his history, declared, that he was "the most extraordinary young man he had ever encountered."]

THOMAS CHATTERTON, a youth, whose early and extraordinary talents, and tragical end, have rendered him an object of much interest and curiosity, was the posthumous son of a person in humble life at Bristol, in which city he was born, in November, 1752. He was slow in attaining the first rudiments of learning; and it was not till he had been delighted with the illuminated capitals of an old manuscript, that he took to learning his letters. This circumstance, and his being taught to read out of a black-letter bible, will doubtless be thought, by the partizans of the theory of association, to have had a great share in the peculiar turn to the imitation of antiquities, which he afterwards displayed.

All the scholastic education he received was at a charity-school, where no language was taught but the mother-tongue. Here he remained some time undistinguished, except that a pensive gravity of demeanour assimilated him rather to the man than the boy. About his tenth year, a taste for reading disclosed itself, which thenceforth became a kind of ruling passion. He hired and borrowed books as he had opportunity; and, between his eleventh and twelfth year, he drew up a catalogue of those he had read, amounting to seventy, which chiefly consisted of history and divinity. It is not of the Roman republic, of the Swiss republic, and of the English republic, when the experiment was, after a long course of kingly government, fairly tried by Cromwell and fully refuted by a whole people, who joyfully received back the most dissolute of the Stuarts, had no great confidence in the magnificent promises of the prattlers about the rights of man. At the commencement of the French revolution, he saw the instability of a popular government, and he prophesied its downfall. In the nervous words of the most venerable of volumes, "He that saw it bare witness, and his witness is true." The French republic is no more, and it is not only dead, but damned, without even the chance of a requiem from the most jocund among the soldiers of Buonaparte. It was all in vain to talk to Mr. BURKE of the peculiar advantages, which the French republic, or any other republic possessed of trying the experiment upon a great scale. He was no more disposed to compliment the wisdom of a statesman, who on this idea should predict durability to the commonwealth, than to extol the delicacy and cleanliness of one, who being urged by the most humiliating of nature's necessities, should congratulate himself that he had chosen a wide and open plain as the theatre of his offensive exhibition.

* This great and good man, after reading the history of the decline and fall of the Athenian and Spartan republic; absolutely certain how soon he began to write verses, but he had certainly composed some at twelve years of age; and he now began to show that ardour of mind, and versatility of parts, by which he was afterwards so strongly characterized. In his fifteenth year, he left school, and was articulated to a scrivener at Bristol, in the lowest form of apprenticeship. Though, in this situation, he underwent much confinement, yet his leisure was great, and he employed a large portion of it in literary pursuits. It was in the year 1768, that he first began to attract notice from the fruits of his studies, but, on this subject, it is necessary to enter into some preliminary explanations.

In the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, which was founded or rebuilt by W. Canynge, an eminent merchant of Bristol, in the reign of Edward IV (the 15th century), there is a room, in which were deposited six or seven chests, one of which was called Mr. Canynge's coffer. This chest had formerly been secured by six keys, entrusted to different persons; but, in process of time, the keys were lost; and when, about 1727, in consequence of a notion that the chest contained some title-deeds, an order was made for its examination, the locks were broken open. The deeds found in it were taken away, but a number of other manuscripts were left exposed to casual depredation. Many of them were carried off; but the father of Chatterton, whose uncle was sexton to the church, was insatiable in his plunder, and removed baskets full of parchments, of which, however, he made no better use, than as covers to books. Young Chatterton is said, soon after the commencement of his clerkship, to have been accidentally struck with one of these parchments, converted into his mother's thread-paper, and, on inquiry, to have obtained a remaining hoard of them yet unused. Whatever were the fact of his first knowledge of them, he appears early to have formed the design of converting the circumstance into a system of literary forgery. In the variety of his studies, antiquities had occupied a favourite place. He dabbled in heraldry, and made collections of old English words from glossaries.

Upon the opening of the new bridge at Bristol, in October, 1768, a paper appeared in Farley's Bristol Journal, entitled, "A Description of the Fryars first passing over the Old Bridge, taken from an ancient Manuscript." This was traced to Chatterton; and, on being interrogated about its origin, after some variation of account, he at length asserted, that it came from the chest above mentioned, in Redcliffe church. He next propagated a rumour, that certain ancient pieces of poetry had been found in the same place, the authors of which were Thomas Canynge, and an intimate friend of his, one Thomas Rowley, a priest. Mr. Catcott, an inhabitant of Bristol, of an inquiring turn, hearing of this report, was directed to Chatterton, from whom he readily obtained, without reward, various poetical pieces, under the name of Rowley. These were communicated to Mr. Barret, surgeon, who was then writing a history of Bristol. They met with credit, and acquired for Chatterton the patronage and friendship of Barret and Catcott. These pieces were all written upon small pieces of vellum, and passed for the original MSS. Chatterton was occasionally gratified with money for his presents, and books were lent him for the prosecution of his studies, which began to be very multifarious. About this time, his intimate companions observed in him extraordinary fits of poetic enthusiasm, particularly when walking in the meadows near Redcliffe, and talking about, or reading the pretended productions of his Rowley. No doubt he was then labouring with that inspiration of the muse, which is scarcely a fiction in the breast of real genius.

In 1769, he made a still bolder effort to raise himself to public notice. He wrote a letter to the honourable Horace Walpole, well known for his curious researches in literature and the arts, offering to furnish him with some accounts of a series of eminent painters, who had flourished at Bristol, at the same time mentioning the discovery of the old poems, and enclosing two small pieces as a specimen. To a very polite reply, requesting farther information, Chatterton returned an answer, stating his condition in life, and hinting a wish to be freed from an arduous and servile profession, and placed in a situation more favourable to the pursuit of elegant studies. Mr. Walpole communicated the papers to Gray and Mason, who, without hesitation, pronounced them forgeries. This occasioned a cold and monitory letter from him to Chatterton, which so offended the high-spirited youth, that he immediately demanded back the manuscripts, alleging that they were the property of another. Walpole, then about to depart for Paris, neglected to send them back; and, on his return, found a very resentful letter from Chatterton, peremptorily requiring the papers, and telling Walpole, "that he would not have dared to use him so, had he not been acquainted with the narrowness of his circumstances." Walpole then enclosed them in a blank cover, and thus the correspondence ended.

His conduct on this occasion has subjected him to much obloquy, and he has been charged with suffering this flower of genius to be blighted by neglect, and even has been made remotely accessory to Chatterton's unhappy end. But to this he has very properly replied, that Chatterton could appear to him in no other light, than that of a young man, disgusted with his proper profession, and attempting to obtain his notice, by passing a forgery upon him. Whatever were the merit of the pieces, as he himself imputed them to another, they implied no singular abilities in him. The neglect of returning them was, however, a fault, though one apparently of no great consequence.

Chatterton had, before this time, commenced a correspondence with the Town and Country Magazine, and various communications from him are printed in the numbers for that work in 1769, consisting of matters relative to antiquity, of extracts from the pretended Rowley, and of pieces entitled, "Saxon Poems, written in the style of Ossian.".... He also became a very prolific writer in satire, particularly of the political kind. In March, 1770, he composed a satirical poem of 1300 lines, entitled, "Kew Gardens," the object of which was to abuse the princess-dowager of Wales and lord Bute, together with the principal partisans of ministry in Bristol; nor did he spare some of his own friends and patrons. His character, indeed, upon developing itself, did not appear in the most favourable light. His confidence in his powers rendered him proud and imperious; and some of his productions show great laxity of principle, though it is affirmed that his conduct was sufficiently regular. He had openly renounced his belief in the christian religion, one effect of which was to render the idea of suicide no longer an object of horror to him. A declared intention of this kind was the immediate cause of his leaving the service of Mr. Lambert, the person to whom he was apprenticed. Upon his desk was found a paper, entitled, "the last will and testament of Thomas Chatterton," in which he avowed his intention to put an end to his life on the following day, which was Easter Sunday, 1770. On discovering it, Mr. Lambert immediately dismissed him from his house and service, in which he had lived two years and upwards of nine months. As he did not then put his threat into execution, it is probable that it was an artifice to obtain his dismissal; especially as he had frequently before terrified Mr. Lambert's mother and the servants with similar intimations. He had acquired so little law in this situation, that he was unable to draw up a legal discharge from his apprenticeship.

London was now the great object of his views, as the only proper mart for his abilities; and an intimate friend of Chatterton has furnished us with his own account of his plans for the metropolis. "My first attempt," said he, "shall be in the literary way: the promises I have received are sufficient to dispel doubt: but should I, contrary to expectation, find myself deceived, I will in that case turn methodist preacher. Credulity is as potent a deity as ever, and a new sect may easily be devised. But if that too should fail me, my last and final resource is a pistol." This is certainly not the language of a simple ingenuous youth, "smit with the love of sacred song".... a Beattie's minstrel, as some of Chatterton's sentimental admirers have chosen to paint him. On his arrival in London, he applied to the booksellers, his former correspondents, and immediately engaged in a variety of literary labours, which required equal industry and versatility of parts. A history of England, a history of London, a magazine, essays in the daily papers, and songs for the public gardens, were among his actual or projected tasks. Above all, party politics were his darling pursuit. He connected himself as intimately as he could with the patriots of the day; and was extravagantly elated with an introduction to the celebrated city magistrate, Mr. Beckford. Soon finding, however, that money was scarce on the opposition side, he observed to a friend, that "he was a poor author, who could write on both sides;" and he was not long in adopting this prudential maxim. For a time, it appears that he indulged himself in the most sanguine hopes of attaining distinction and affluence by the exertions of his pen; and his letters to his friends were filled with visionary projects of this sort, excusable in a youth not eighteen. It is right to mention, as a proof of the tenderness of his social affections, that the prospect of being able to subsist his family, and raise them from their humble sphere, appears to have given him peculiar pleasure; nor did he omit to send them little presents out of his first gains. His taste for dissipation, however, kept pace with his hopes; and he asserts, that "to frequent places of public amusement is as necessary to him as food." Yet it would seem, that with respect to the grosser pleasures of sense, he still preserved a temperate restriction. What occasioned the very sudden change in his expectations, does not clearly appear. He probably found that he had nothing to hope from the patronage of the great, and that he must henceforth depend upon the booksellers for a scanty and hard-earned support. This severely mortified his pride, and seems to have disgusted him with his literary labours. He even wished to quit the scene of his disappointment, and made an unsuccessful attempt to obtain the very undesirable post of surgeon's-mate to the coast of Africa. The remainder of his history is short and melancholy. Falling into a state of indigence, which is not easily accounted for, supposing him to have continued his exertions even in a moderate degree, he was reduced to the want of necessary food. Yet such was his pride, that he refused, as a sort of insult, an invitation to a dinner with his hostess, on the day preceding his death, assuring her he was not hungry. This was on August 24, 1770; and he soon after swallowed arsenic in water, the consequences of which proved fatal on the ensuing day. He was then in lodgings in Brooke-street, Holborn. His remains were interred in the burying-ground of Shoe-lane work-house. Thus, a prey to all the horrors of despair, friendless, and forlorn, poor Chatterton terminated a life, which he had not enjoyed above eighteen complete years.

To enter into more minute particulars concerning the moral character of Chatterton seems unnecessary.

FROM THE MICROCOSM.

Fabula nullius veneris, sine pondere, et arte.....NON.

A silly story, without weight or art.

NOVEL-WRITING has, by some late authors, been aptly enough stiled the younger sister of Romance. A family likeness, indeed, is very evident; and in their leading features, though in the one in a more enlarged, and in the other on a more contracted scale, a strong resemblance is easily discoverable between them.

An eminent characteristic of each is fiction; a quality, which they possess, however, in very different degrees. The fiction of romance is restricted by no fetters of reason, or of truth; but gives a loose to lawless imagination, and transgresses, at will, the bounds of time and place, of nature and possibility. The fiction of the other, on the contrary, is shackled with a thousand restraints; is checked in her most rapid progress by the barriers of reason; and bounded in her most excursive flights by the limits of probability.

To drop our metaphors: we shall not indeed find in novels, as in romances, the hero sighing respectfully at the feet of his mistress, during a ten years courtship in a wilderness; nor shall we be entertained with the history of such a tour, as that of saint George; who, mounting his horse one morning in Cappadocia, takes his way through Mesopotamia, then turns to his right into Illyria, and so by way of Grecia and Thracia, arrives in the afternoon in England. To such glorious violations as these of time and place, romance writers have an exclusive claim. Novelists usually find it more convenient to change the scene of courtship from a desert to a drawing-room; and far from thinking it necessary to lay a ten years siege to the affections of their heroine, they contrive to carry their point in an hour or two; as well for the sake of enhancing the character of their hero, as for establishing their favourite maxim of love at first sight: and their hero, who seldom extends his travels beyond the turnpike road, is commonly content to chuse the safer, though less expeditious, conveyance of a post-chaise, in preference to such a horse as that of saint George.

But these peculiarities of absurdity alone excepted, we shall find, that the novel is but a more modern modification of the same ingredients, which constitute the romance; and that a recipe for the one may be equally serviceable for the composition of the other.

A romance (generally speaking), consists of a number of strange events, with a hero in the middle of them; who, being an adventurous knight, wades through them to one grand design, namely, the emancipation of some captive princess, from the oppression of a merciless giant; for the accomplishment of which purpose, he must set at nought all the incantations of the catiff magician; must scale the ramparts of his castle; and baffle the vigilance of the female dragon, to whose custody his heroine is committed.

Foreign as they may at first sight seem from the purposes of a novel, we shall find, upon a little examination, that these are in fact the very circumstances, upon which the generality of them are built; modernized indeed, in some degree, by the trifling transformations of merciless giants into austere guardians, and of she-dragons into maiden aunts. We must be contented also that the heroine, though retaining her tenderness, be divested of her royalty; and in the hero, we must give up the knight-errant for the accomplished fine gentleman.

Still, however, though the performers are changed, the characters themselves remain nearly the same. In the guardian we trace all the qualities, which distinguish his ferocious predecessor; substituting only, in the room of magical incantations, a little plain cursing and swearing; and the maiden aunt retains all the prying vigilance, and suspicious malignity; in short every endowment but the claws, which characterize her romantic counterpart. The hero of a novel has not indeed any opportunity of displaying his courage in the scaling of a rampart, or his generosity in the deliverance of enthralled multitudes; but as it is necessary that a hero should signalize himself by both these qualifications, it is usual to manifest the one by climbing the garden wall, or leaping the park paling, in defiance of "steel traps and spring guns;" and the other, by flinging a crown to each of the post-boys, on alighting from his chaise and four.

In the article of interviews, the two species of composition are pretty much on an equality, provided only, that they are supplied with a "quantum sufficit" of moonlight, which is an indispensable requisite; it being the etiquette for the moon to appear particularly conscious on these occasions. For the adorer, when permitted to pay his vows at the shrine of his Divinity, custom has established in both cases a pretty universal form of prayer.

Thus far the writers of novel and romance seem to be on a very equal footing; to enjoy similar advantages, and to merit equal admiration. We are now come to a very material point, in which romance has but slender claims to comparative excellence; I mean the choice of names and titles. However lofty and sonorous the names of Amadis and Orlando; however tender and delicate may be those of Zorayda and Roxana, are they to be compared with the attractive alliteration, the seducing softness of Lydia Lovemore, and Sir Harry Harlowe; of Frederic Freeloove, and Clarissa Clearstarch? Or can the simple "Don Belianis of Greece," or the "Seven Champions of Christendom," trick out so enticing a title page, and awaken such pleasing expectations, as the "Innocent Adultery," the "Tears of Sensibility," or the "*Amours of the Count de D," and L....y.....?"

It occurs to me, while I am writing this, that as there has been, of late years, so considerable a consumption of names and titles, as to have exhausted all the efforts of invention, and ransacked all the alliterations of the alphabet, it may not be amiss to inform all novelists, male and female, who, under these circumstances, must necessarily wish, with Falstaff, to know "where a commodity of good names may be bought," that, at my Warehouse for Wit, I have laid in a great number of the above articles, of the most fashionable and approved patterns. Ladies may suit themselves with a vast variety, adapted to every composition of the kind; whether they may chuse them to consist of two adjectives only, as the "Generous Inconstant,".... the "Fair Fugitive,"....or the name of a place, as "Grogam Grove,".... "Gander Green,"....or whether they prefer the still newer method, of coupling persons and things with an "or," as "Louisa; or, the Purling Stream,".... "Estifania; or, the Abbey in the Dale,".... "Eliza; or, the Little House on the Hill." Added to these, I have a complete assortment of names, for every individual that can find a place in a novel; from the Belvilles and Beverleys of high life, to the Humphreyses and Gubbinses of low; suited to all ages, ranks, and professions; to persons of every stamp, and characters of every denomination.

In painting the scenes of low life, the novel again enjoys the most decisive superiority. Romance indeed sometimes makes use of the grosser sentiments, and less refined affections of the squire and confidante, as a foil to the delicate adoration, the platonic purity, which marks the love of the hero, and suits the sensibility of his mistress. But where shall we find such a thorough knowledge of nature, such an insight into the human heart, as is discessary; but the character of his genius demands a further discussion. It seems agreed that its measure should be taken from the poems published under the name of Rowley; for that they are really the product of the age and person, to whom he attributed them, is a supposition now abandoned by all, who pretend to literary discernment. Their authenticity, it is true, was at first defended by great names, especially of the antiquarian class, who too often have proved the dupes to their fondness for the wonders of antiquity. But, exclusive of strong external marks of suspicion, internal evidence is abundantly sufficient to decide the question. That an unknown writer of the fifteenth century should, in productions never heard of, but made to be locked up in a chest, so far surpass the taste and attainments of his age, as to write pieces of uniform correctness, free from all vulgarity and puerility, requiring nothing but a change of spelling to become harmonious to a modern ear, and even containing measures peculiar to the present age of English poetry, may safely be pronounced a moral impossibility; that such could be produced by a boy of fifteen or sixteen is only extraordinary. "Rowley's Poems" were first collected in an octavo volume by Mr. Tyrwhit, and afterwards splendidly published in quarto by Dean Milles, president of the society of antiquaries. They consist of pieces of all the principal classes of poetical composition; tragedies, lyric and heroic poems, pastorals, epistles, ballads, &c. Many of them abound in sublimity and beauty, and display wonderful powers of imagination and facility of composition; yet there is also much of the commonplace flatness and extravagance, that might be expected from a juvenile writer, whose fertility was greater than his judgment, and who had fed his mind upon stores collected with more avidity than choice. The spelling is designedly uncouth; and strange words are copiously besprinkled, which good judges say were never the diction of any one age of English literature, but are culled from glossaries. There is no doubt that these peculiarities have thrown a veil over the defects of the poems, and have aggrandized their beauties, by referring the imagination, even of those, who were disbelievers of their genuineness, to a remote age, when they would have been really wonders. Yet they must ever be looked upon as very extraordinary productions of a boy, and will perpetuate the name of Chatterton among those of the most remarkable examples of premature genius. Of his avowed writings a miscellaneous volume was published in 1778, followed by a supplement in 1786. These, though upon the whole inferior to his Rowley, display the same versatility and quickness of parts, and are not without some passages of striking merit. It has been concluded by many of the warm admirers of Chatterton, that had he been born under happier auspices, and lived to the maturity of his faculties, he would have risen to the very first rank of English poetry. But this may be a mistaken opinion. The history of literature affords many instances of the promise of youth remaining unfulfilled in mature years; and it is not unlikely that his imagination would early have exhausted itself, without being succeeded by any other quality of the mind in an equal measure. His disposition appears likewise to have been too volatile to have allowed him steadily to have pursued perfection in any one walk. The uncommon talents and melancholy fate of Chatterton have caused many tributes to be paid to his memory, some of them in strains highly animated and pathetic. That in these poetical commemorations his merits should have been exaggerated, his faults extenuated, and his catastrophe represented rather as a stain upon his countrymen than himself, is perhaps excusable; but a deviation from truth in the sober narration of a biographer admits of no apology.

played by our novelists, when, as an agreeable relief from the insipid sameness of polite insincerity, they condescend to pourtray, in coarse colours, the workings of more genuine passions in the bosom of Dolly, the dairy-maid, or Hannah, the house-maid?

When, on such grounds, and on a plan usually very similar to the one I have here endeavoured to sketch, are founded by far the greater number of those novels, which crowd the teeming catalogue of a circulating library, is it to be wondered at, that they are sought out with such avidity, and run through with such delight, by all those (a considerable part of my fellow-citizens), who cannot resist the impulse of curiosity, or withstand the allurements of a title page? Can we be surprised, that they look forward, with expecting eagerness, to that inundation of delicious nonsense, with which the press annually overflows, replete as it is with stories without invention, anecdotes without novelty, observations without aptness, and reflections without morality?

Under this description come the generality of these performances. There are, no doubt, a multitude of exceptions. The paths, which a Fielding and a Richardson have trodden, must be sacred. Were I to prophane these by impertinent criticism, I might with justice be accused of avowed enmity to wit; of open apostacy from true feeling and true taste.

But let me hope to stand excused from the charge of presumption, if even here I venture some observations, which I am confident must have occurred to many; and to which almost everybody, when reminded of them, will be ready to give a hearty concurrence.

Is not the novel of Tom Jones, however excellent a work in itself, generally put too early into our hands, and proposed too soon to the imitation of children? That it is a character drawn faithfully from nature, by the hand of a master, most accurately delineated, and most exquisitely finished, is indeed indisputable. But is it not also a character, in whose shades the lines of right and wrong, of propriety and misconduct, are so intimately blended, and softened into each other, as to render it too difficult for the indiscriminating eye of childhood to distinguish between rectitude and error? Are not its imperfections so nearly allied to excellence, and does not the excess of its good qualities bear so strong an affinity to imperfection, as to require a more matured judgment, a more accurate penetration, to point out the line where virtue ends and vice begins? The arguments urged in opposition to this are, that it is a faithful copy of nature. Undoubtedly it is....but is nature to be held up to the view of childhood in every light, however unamiable; to be exhibited in every attitude, however unbecoming? The hero's connection with miss Seagrim, for instance, and the supposed consequences of it are very natural, no doubt: are they therefore objects worthy of imitation? But that a child must admire the character, is certain; that he should wish to imitate what he admires, follows of course; and that it is much more easy to imitate faults than excellencies, is an observation too trite, I fear, not to be well founded. A character virtuous and amiable in the aggregate, but vicious in particular parts, is much more dangerous to a mind, prone to imitation, as that of youth naturally is, than one wicked and vicious in the extreme. The one is an open assault of an avowed enemy, which every one has judgment to see, and consequently fortitude to resist; the other is the treacherous attack of an insidious invader; who makes the passions his agents to blind the judgment, and bribes the understanding to betray the heart. Such is the character of Jones. He interests our affections at the moment that his actions revolt against our ideas of propriety; nor can even his infidelity to Sophia, however ungrateful, nor his connection with lady Bellaston, though perhaps the most degrading situation, in which human nature can be viewed, materially lessen him in our esteem and admiration. On these grounds, therefore, though there cannot be a more partial admirer of the work itself, I cannot hesitate a moment to consider that "faultless monster," sir Charles Grandison, whose insipid uniformity of goodness it is so fashionable to decry, far the more preferable to be held up to a child as an object of imitation. The only objection urged to this is, that Grandison is too perfect to be imitated with success. And to what does this argument amount? truly this, it tends to prove, that an imitator cannot come up to his original; consequently the surest way to become a Jones, is to aim at being a Grandison; for according to that argument, let a man rate his virtue at the highest price, and the natural bias of his passions will make him abate something of his valuation. Hence therefore the character of Grandison is assuredly the properer pattern of the two. An attempt at the imitation of that, must necessarily be productive of some attainment in virtue. The character of Jones can neither operate as an incitement to virtue nor a discouragement from vice. He is too faulty for the one, and too excellent for the other. Even his good qualities must, on an undiscerning mind, have a bad effect; since, by fascinating its affections, they render it blind to its foibles; and the character becomes the more dangerous, in proportion as it is the more amiable.

But to return from this long digression, to the consideration of novels in general. Some of my fellow-citizens may perhaps conjecture, that I have affected to undervalue them from interested motives; and that I would wean them from their study of them, for the purpose only of increasing the demand for my own lucubrations. To wipe off any suspicions of the kind, and to prove to them that my only motives are a view to their advantage, I promise, in the course of a few numbers, to point out to the observation, and recommend to the perusal of professed novel readers, a set of books, which they now treat with undeserved contempt; but from which I will prove, that they may derive, at least, as much entertainment, and certainly much more useful instruction, than from the dull details of unmeaning sentiment, and insipid conversation; of incidents the most highly unnatural, and events the most uninteresting.

LITERARY NOTICE.

MR. JOHN MORGAN, bookseller, of this city, has just published MACKENZIE'S Voyages from Montreal, across the continent of North-America, to the Frozen and Pacific Oceans. It is with very great pleasure we are enabled to announce so early a correct American edition of this invaluable work. This edition is illustrated by maps, recommended by the well known name of Arrowsmith, and with a spirited portrait of the author, in whose expressive features may be discerned all the enterprize, intrepidity, and genius of the Scottish character. His indefatigable labour, and his useful researches, have been already rewarded, by a title from his munificent prince, and by the liberal applause of a discerning nation, quick to observe, and eager to remunerate, talents and virtue. Of this interesting traveller, the brother to Henry Mackenzie, the Addison of Edinburgh, we shall say more in our next paper, in which we shall take occasion to introduce some passages of his journal, which will amuse and edify our readers.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IT is confidently asserted, that Mr. WINDHAM, the late secretary of war, is a favourite of his sovereign, and it is anticipated, that he will soon take a very leading part in the direction of the state.

The following anecdotes we read in the Boston Commercial Gazette, a paper variegated, occasionally, with literary ornament.

Two brush-makers, who were thieving, and contriving to undersell each other, one day met, and thus accosted one the other, who had still the upper hand:

I steals the stuff to save my pelf,
And then, I makes them up myself,
So cannot think, though oft I try,
How you can cheaper sell than I.
I'll tell you, friend, the other said,
I steals my brushes ready made.

Dr. Johnson, though a profest enemy to actors yet could not refrain addressing Mrs. Siddons (when she called upon him at Bolt-court) with great politeness, and said to her, when his servant Frank could not readily get a chair, "You see, madam, wherever you go, there are no SEATS to be had."

A servant came to his master to be discharged "Why?" "Because, sir, your temper is so violent." "But," said the wit, "it is soon off." "But then it is soon on again."

ANTIQUITY OF SPENCERS.

It is not generally known, that this fashionable dress owes its origin to an ignominious punishment of great antiquity. Plutarch, in his life of Cicero, mentions, that "he never caused any man to be beaten with rods, or to have his garments rent." But we have a higher authority. "Wherefore Hanan took David's servants, and shaved one half of their beards, and cut off their garments to their middle, and sent them away." 2d Samuel, x. 4. Of late years, a branch of the Spencer family, in England, introduced this short garment, as a kind of hoax upon the bloods of Bond-street, who, as might well be supposed, were entirely ignorant of its disgraceful origin. The whim succeeded, and "spencers" became a necessary appendage to the wardrobe of every beau. With an eye to their origin, perhaps they might with greater propriety be called David's.

In page 323 of Dodsley's tenth edition of Burke's Reflections on the Revolution, we find the following memorable passage. The prescience of this sagacious statesman has been frequently extolled, but he never had a longer or clearer view of what has come to pass than when he thus predicted the fortunes of that military adventurer, who has completely abrogated every trace of republicanism in France.

"In the weakness of one kind of authority, and in the fluctuation of all, the officers of your army will remain for some time mutinous, and full of faction, until some popular general, who understands the art of conciliating the soldiery, and who possesses the true spirit of command, shall draw the eyes of all men upon himself. Armies will obey him on his personal account. There is no other way of securing military obedience in this state of things. But the moment, in which that event shall happen, the person, who really commands your army is your master, the master of your king, the master of your assembly, the master of your whole republic."

Many grumble at the paucity of our political topics, but as all possible changes have been already rung on the mammoth chief, and the mammoth cheese, the greatest subjects America affords, nothing is now left to the editor of a periodical publication, but to extol public opinion as paramount to good government, and to copy paragraphs from Mr. Duane, who gives the ton to public opinion.

Many Loungers delight when they read SHAKSPEARE to make applications of favourite passages to modern events or characters. An idler, whom I know to be the "veriest varlet, that ever chewed," has had the audacity to send me the following, and to aver they have their archetypes in America.

A Juvenile Chairman of a Committee of Ways and Means.

..... "If I know
How or which way to order these affairs,
Thus disorderly thrust into my hands,
Never believe me."

KING RICHARD II.

MILITIA SOLDIERS.

These hollow men, like horses hot at hand,
Make gallant show and promise of their mettle,
But when they should endure the bloody spur,
They fall their crests, and, like deceitful jades,
Sink in the trial.

JULIUS CAESAR.

A POLITICAL BRAG PLAYER.

How comes it, Cassio, you are thus forgot,
That you unlance your reputation thus,
And spend your rich opinion for the name
Of a night brawler! Give me answer to it.

O IHELLO.

The subsequent remark bears hard upon the disciples of the new school of politicians.

Those, whose principle it is to despise the ancient permanent sense of mankind, and to set up a scheme of society on new principles, must naturally expect that such of us, who think better of the judgment of the human race than of theirs, should consider both them and their devices, as men and schemes upon their trial. They must take it for granted, that we attend much to their reason, but not at all to their authority. They have not one of the great influencing prejudices of mankind in their favour. They avow their hostility to opinion. Of course they must expect no support from that influence, which, with other authority, they have deposed from the seat of its jurisdiction.

In the recent debate of the 5th March, in the imperial parliament of Great Britain, the erect and invincible spirit of Mr. WINDHAM was again fully displayed against that morbid desire for peace, which has of late glowed so intensely in the British bosom. After conceding that the arguments of lord Hawkesbury had been forcibly urged, Mr. Windham feared they were fallacious, and calculated to lull the nation into a fatal security. If the identical people had prophesied destruction to our commerce from the war, who now expressed their apprehensions of the effects of peace, then indeed they would have laid themselves open to an argumentum ad hominem, and their predictions would now be received with distrust. But it was a strange mode of reasoning to say, that because one had been deceived, another should, whose views were quite contrary. If our commerce had flourished in war, instead of being a proof that it would now continue to flourish, appeared to him a strong presumption that peace would destroy it. All the cause had ceased, to which its prosperity was to be ascribed, and though it might not necessarily decline, this was certainly no very strong ground of confidence. As a general principle, he allowed that commerce would find its level; but in times like these, the practise of reasoning from generals to universals was certain ruin. Nothing in history resembled the present æra; the state of the world was completely novel, and what from the beginning of time might have held true, would often now be found fallacious. One great power seemed about to rule the globe. Instead of being called upon to show why France will quickly subdue the whole of Europe, he would be justified in calling upon others to state their reasons for thinking that she will not. Of her intentions there could be no doubt. She had declared so herself an hundred times, and when her acts agreed so well with her professions, to disbelieve her was comical extravagance. She boldly and undisguisedly says she will crush you to atoms, and you reply, while her preparations are going on under your nose, "She must be joking....she's not in earnest....we know that she means us well." Such language Mr. W. declared only fit to be put into the mouth of a character in a farce. Since the time of the Romans, he maintained that no such power had existed in Europe. He did not by any means except Charlemagne, whom the person, at present at the head of the French government, seemed fondly to regard as his model. That great conqueror did not extend his dominion over more than one quarter of the globe. He allowed that, if we were true to ourselves, we might yet be saved. But he thought we would be most false to ourselves if we trusted merely to our wealth, our punctuality, and good faith, in commercial dealings. We should nourish a proud spirit of independence; we should shew the superiority in which we hold honour and glory to riches and ease; we should distinguish ourselves by a noble military ardour. Before capital and commerce were known, our ancestors thus held the first rank among the nations of Europe, and, notwithstanding the favourite doctrine of the times, it is only by arms we can regain our situation. But basely hugging our money bags, we think we may dismiss the military virtues of our forefathers, like scaffolding, although it was by these that this adored wealth was acquired, and without these we must speedily be robbed of it. He would be the last to preach despondency, but he considered it his duty, if possible, to rouse his countrymen from the ill-timed indifference, into which they had fallen, and to call upon them to resist usurpation, insolence, and perfidy. He conjured those, who talked so much of the capital of wealth, to think for a little of the capital of dominion. The latter would be found to have always prevailed. The right honourable gentleman concluded by again entering his protest against reasoning from antecedent cases, at a time when little was to be learned from experience, and things daily occurred, which it had not entered into the imagination of the most daring speculator to conceive.

The following description of a courtesan, is extracted from a very old and quaint book:

He, that keeps her company, is in the highway to the devil. To look upon her with desire begins the voyage; to talk with her mends his pace; and to possess her is to be at the journey's end. Her body is only the lees of delight; for, when you taste her, she's dead, and palls upon the palate. Her trade is opposite to that of any other, for she sets up without credit, and too much custom breaks her. She is ever moored in sin, and yet is always sailing about. At fifteen, she is the companion of brave sparks, and at thirty, she is the surgeon's creature.

It is reported of ADDISON, that, after spending the evening with Steele, Budgell, and the other contemporary wits, he would drink so much claret, as to become intoxicated and unable to speak. On one of these jovial occasions, the mellow moralist reclined his head on the table, and fell into a profound sleep: on which a bystander remarked, that, at present, Mr. Addison was neither a Tatler nor a Spectator, though he might speedily want a Guardian.

In Lilly's Grammar, every school-boy may remember to have read

"Sine Baccho et Cerere frigescit Venus."

A jovial poet of the present day has thus expanded this sentiment:

If Bacchus and Ceres were urg'd from Love's court,
Desire must frozen depart;
Roast beef quantum suff. and take tantum red port,
They steel the mainspring of the heart.

The Anacreontic bards employ a very ingenious sophistry to recomment the joys of the grape. Even the rigid may admire the brilliancy of their thought, though of their propriety, doubts may be entertained. The following is sparkling, if not solid:

When the lamp is brimful, how the taper flame shines,
Which, when moisture is wanting, decays;
Replenish the lamp of my life with rich wines,
Or else there's an end of my blaze.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO:

ODE TO HAPPINESS.

● HAPPINESS! thou precious flow'r,
Whose leaves the choicest fragrance pour,
Whose fruit is all divine;
Where is thy residence below?
In what blest region dost thou grow?
And what thy lovely sign?

Dost thou within the splendid dome
Of Wealth forever keep thy home,
And bloom and flourish there?
If so, methinks, thou lov'st to be With painful Fear, Anxiety,
And all-corroding Care.

Or, dost thou rather take delight
To climb aloft Ambition's height,
To Honour, Pomp, and Fame?
Whence far may shoot thy brilliant rays,
Commanding universal praise,
Proud Title's sounding name.

Or shall I make a true resort,
And meet thee in sweet Pleasure's court,
(Laid in the lap of Ease)
Where half the human race are found
Dancing in every giddy round
That can the senses please?

Perhaps I more success may find,
Where graceful Beauty sits entwin'd
With radiance from above;
Where, too, proud Insolence takes stand,
With others of the haughty band,
And servile dying love?

No, HAPPINESS! it cannot be....
So little they accord with thee,
Thou could'st not dwell with them:
Thy source of life too diff'rent is
From honour, wealth, or sensual bliss,
Or love, the Satyr's flame.

But thy calm peaceful residence,
Is in the virtuous moral sense,
And rectitude of mind:
Thou may'st be found in any state,
The humbly low, the idly great,
Or nowhere by mankind.

Yet there's no certain state on earth,
Can boast thy residence and birth,
Like that, where kindred souls
In wedlock's pleasing bands unite;
And live content, in love, delight,
And peace, while nature rolls.

This punning epigram in the Port Folio, on the marriage of the celebrated Hannah More

Alas! ye Muses, I your loss deplore,
Since now your favourite Hannah is no More, occasioned the following

IMPROMPTU.

WHEN statesmen, heroes, patriots are no more,
They sleep in dust, and all their deeds are o'er.
Though Hannah is no More, she still survives,
And from the matrimonial trance revives,
Still charms the aged and informs the youth,
The friend of wit, of virtue, and of truth.
Long may wise MORE with steady footsteps tread
The flow'ry paths of Love, by Wisdom led,
And for their favourite may the auspicious nine Hymen's soft bands with their own wreaths entwine,

On seraph's wings let her rapt spirit soar,
And her fame spread till Time himself's no more.

TRANSLATION

OF A GREEK ODE ON ASTRONOMY.

Written for the prize at Cambridge, 1793.

HAIL, venerable Night!
O thou, the first created, hail!
Thou, who art doom'd in thy dark breast to hide
The dying beam of light,
The eldest and the latest thou;
Hail venerable Night! O Goddess, hail!
Around thine ebony brow,
Glittering plays with lightning rays
A wreath of flow'rs of fire;
The varying clouds with many a hue attire
Thy many tinted veil.
Holy are the blue graces of thy zone!
But who is he, whose tongue could tell
The dewy lustres that thine eyes adorn?
Lovely to some the blushes of the morn!
To some the glitter of the day,
When blazing in meridian ray
The gorgeous Sun ascends his highest throne;
But I with solemn and severe delight
Still watch thy constant car, immortal Night!

For then to the celestial palaces
Urania leads, Urania, she
The goddess, who alone
Stands by the blazing throne
Effulgent with the light of deity.
Whom Wisdom, the creatress, by her side
Plac'd on the heights of yonder sky,
And, smiling with ambrosial love, unlock'd
The depths of Nature to her piercing eye.
Angelic myriads struck their harps around,
And with triumphant song
The host of stars, a beauteous throng,
Around the Ever-living Mind,
In jubilee their mystic dance begun,
When at thy leaping forth, O Sun,
The morning started in affright,
Astonish'd at thy birth, her Child of Light!

Hail, O Urania, hail!
Queen of the Muses! mistress of the song!
Forthou did'st deign to leave the heav'nly throng.
As earthward thou thy steps wert bending,
A ray went forth and harbinger'd thy way.
All ether laugh'd with thy descending,
Thou had'st wreath'd thy hair with roses,
The flower that in the immortal bower
Its deathless bloom discloses.
Before thine awful mien compell'd to shrink,
Fled Ignorance abash'd, and all her brood,
Dragons and hags, of baleful breath,
Fierce dreams that wont to drink
The sepulchre's black blood,
Or on the wings of storms,
Riding in fury forms,
Shriek'd to the mariner the shriek of Death.

I boast, O goddess, to thy name
That I have rais'd the pile of fame!
Therefore to me be giv'n
To roam the starry path of heav'n,
To charioteer with wings on high,
And to rein in the tempests of the sky.

Chariots of happy gods! fountains of light!
Ye angel temples bright;
May I, unblam'd, your flaming threshold tread?
I leave Earth's lovely scene,
I leave the Moon serene,

The lovely Queen of Night,
I leave the wide domains,
Beyond where Mars his fiercer light can fling,
And Jupiter's vast plains
(The many-belted king),
Even to the solitude where Saturn reigns,
Like some stern tyrant to just exile driv'n:
Dim seen the sullen pow'r appears,
In that cold solitude of Heav'n,
And slow he drags along
The mighty circle of long ling'ring years.

Nor shalt thou escape my sight,
Who at the threshold of the sun-trod domes
Art trembling, youngest daughter of the Night!
And ye....ye fiery-tressed strangers! ye
Comets who wander wide,
Will I along your pathless way pursue,
Whence bending, I may view
The worlds, whom elder Suns have vivified.

For Hope with leveliest visions soothes my mind,
That even in man, life's winged pow'r,
When comes anew the natal hour,
Shall, on heaven-wandering feet,
Spring to the blessed seat,
In undecaying youth;
Where round the fields of truth,
The fiery essences forever feed,
And o'er th' ambrosial mead,
The gales of calm serenity,
Silent and soothing glide forever by.

There, hireless priest of Nature, dost thou shine
Newton! a king among the kings divine,
Whether with harmony's mild force,
He guides along its course
The axle of some beauteous star on high,
Or gazing in the spring,
Ebullient with creative energy,
Feels his pure breast with rapt'rous joy possess'd,
Inebriate in the holy ecstasy!

I may not call thee mortal then, my soul!
Immortal longings lift thee to the skies,
Love of thy native home inflames thee now
With pious madness wise.
Know then thyself, expand thy plumes divine,
Soon mingled with thy fathers thou shalt shine,
A star amid the starry throng,
A God the Gods among!

EPIGRAM.

Archbishop KING, at a very advanced age, declared to Dr. HALLEY his intention to wed a young wife. The doctor made a facetious reply, and expressed a natural wish; all which is comprized in merry metre, by some wicked wag.

WITH age exhausted, and his vigour fled,
Says King to Halley, "I've a mind to wed:"
Arch Halley answer'd, with sarcastic face,
"I hope you'll make me chaplain to your grace."

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XVIII.

MR. SAUNTER,

WHEN I addressed you, on the subject of my son's conduct, it was only the hope that your remarks, on the particular object of my complaint, would effect a reform in his manners, and not, I assure you, with any design to draw your attention to a "certain anonymous club," which, without my previous information, you must have known existed in this city.

After this assurance, permit me, sir, through the medium of your paper, to offer any apology, which the club, as a body, or its members individually, may think necessary, for the improper epithet, which I so injudiciously applied to this association. It was never my wish to hold a controversy with any one, more especially with a gentleman, whose superior literature will undoubtedly place me in a ridiculous point of view; but my pride, as a mother, not as a writer, calls for some kind of reply to your "very respectable male correspondent, who appears in the front page of No. 17," to reproach me with having brought to public notice the Tuesday's club, of which he is a worthy member.

To the first charge of this anonymous defender of the anonymous excellence of the anonymous club, I can truly answer, that my letter did not arise from the malignant desire of introducing to public criticism a secret association. This club has been known for some months past; and it appears to me childish to have imagined it could have remained otherwise, when it was composed of giddy, gay, gallant, young men, and assembled at the same place, to which "illiberal old men" have so long been in the habit of resorting at midnight, to seek their "erring sons." With these advantages, the "frivolous tittle tattle of idle women" was not necessary to give it publicity, and no one will reasonably imagine this could have been the object of my letter, which their own imprudence long since effected. "Secrecy is a standing rule upon the members," but, vice versa, the members cannot all stand upon it, for it has frequently been broken, with the greatest caution.

Having thus explained the real causes of this club's being known, I hope that, in the mind of every candid member, I may be exempt from a suspicion of malice, towards a set of "harmless, inoffensive, modest" creatures, who are strictly so I believe; for, amidst the conviviality of their meetings, when the strength of their arm shall be overcome by long watching and feasting, whom can they harm? Shut up in a retired club-room, whom can they offend? When they so carefully conceal the benevolent purposes of their association from the scrutiny of the world, and doom their virtues to obscurity, who will say they are not modest? And will it be treason to add, that, with the attributes which their honourable member claims, they must be pretty boys? I recal the epithet "intolerable." It was not applied with propriety, inasmuch as this age is particularly prone to tolerating all associations of this kind, where the feast supplies the place of reason, the soul plays leo, the brightest genius swims in claret, and the worthiest fellow is he, who hails the first blush of Aurora with another bumper.

In spite of the facts, which your correspondent brings to prove, that my son did not contract any of his bad habits at that club, I will, upon the following grounds, maintain my first assertion. That a change has taken place is evident, beyond controversy; and to what can it so reasonably be imputed, as to his intercourse with young men, whose fortunes give them an elevation in life, far beyond that to which the savings of my economy could entitle him? It is not extraordinary, that, being flattered by the notice of his superiors, his vanity should be excited, and suddenly become the prominent feature in his character. This is the grand source from which flows the abundance of my son's failings, and this he never possessed to so censurable a degree, until he was enrolled a member of the anonymous club. I am, therefore, excusable for annexing some blame to this body, whose honourable attentions have made my poor boy think himself as much above his parents in mental qualifications, as some of his associates are superior to him, in other respects.

He has undoubtedly acquired all his independence and fastidiousness from that association, but how far the club has enforced rules to promote such worthiness, I am not at liberty to say; they are qualities, however, with which I would dispense in the character of my son. To be treated with reserve, is doubly mortifying from a child, with whom I have hitherto enjoyed that enviable freedom of communication, "where thought's unfetter'd, and where fancy's free." It was my "Delightful task, to rear the tender thought,

To teach the young idea how to shoot,
To pour the fresh instruction o'er the mind,
And fix the generous purpose in the glowing breast."

It was my sublimer satisfaction to reap the fruits of my labour, in an attachment, which was of a more exalted kind than merely filial gratitude. I was his chosen friend; my bosom was the sanctuary, wherein his care and pain were a sacred deposit. It has also been my misfortune, Mr. Saunter, to outlive my son's confidence in my affection.

But to return to the club. My son has mentioned his desire to introduce a taste for music into their association, and vainly imagines, by practice, to attain to that degree of excellence in singing, which will ensure to him great encomiums, for adding so agreeable an amusement to their present lists. As to the scribbling of verses, it was only mentioned in order to give you a more perfect idea of the manner in which he trifled away his time, and not as a just and sole cause of complaint. Therefore I shall say nothing further on the subject of this gentle accomplishment, only that I did not think the anonymous club wrote poetry for the Port Folio.

Having now arrived at that part of your last paper, which most particularly appears to refer to my life and writings, I shall take the liberty to observe upon the injustice of your correspondent's satire. The "ostentation of needless learning," I cannot be charged with, for I never pretended to classical correctness, or any acquaintance with Greek or Roman authors. The mere transcribing Latin sentences, which I frequently hear repeated, is no proof that I am a scholar. My not being so is a deficiency, for which the governors of my education are responsible, but which, at the same time, should shield me from sarcastic animadversion. For the very elegant and liberal translation of non decet te rixari, which your correspondent has given us, I ought to be very much obliged, as it is very much in point to prove, that it is a fundamental regulation of the club, to do nothing to inspire filial ingratitude or disrespect. If the assurance, that the "serious advice of parents is downright scolding and brawling," and that young gentlemen, who do not "retort the tart reply," are admirable for moderation and forbearance, is publicly and respectfully made, give me leave to ask, what is the standard of filial disrespect?

I am happy to find, Mr. Saunter, that you do not intend to proclaim in behalf of the Tuesday's club. And I do not know what could possibly justify our vindication of their meetings, since their sociability never extends beyond their club-room, and all female parties of every kind must yield to this association, where our "warm admirers and passionate lovers, individually and collectively," lampoon us in heavy prose or duller poetry, and every gazette in town teems with our failings, which are exaggerated by the ravings of disappointed passion. Our anonymous friends, therefore, need not arrogate to themselves greater praise, on account of excessive admiration of our sex, for they have all exclaimed,

If to their share some noble virtues fall,
Within this club-room we forget them all.

CHAP. II.

Importance of the origin, proved by reasoning a priori.

FROM whom then do the Americans descend? But perhaps it will be asked, why inferences of the qualities of the children are drawn from the character of the fathers? Has not Helvetius proved, that education, that is to say circumstances, in the most extensive sense of the word, form entirely the character of the man? Is not the opinion, that the qualities of the parent are propagated, an unphilosophic idea, which would sanction, for instance, the vain pretensions of the nobility? I beg to be allowed here to explain my ideas.

That, in general, children resemble their parents, no one, who considers the usual resemblance between them in external appearance, can deny. Whence would else proceed the characteristic features, which distinguish every people from other nations? Who cannot easily recognize a Jew? Who could mistake a Frenchman for an Englishman? And, from the resemblance of external organization, is there no analogical inference of the internal structure or composition of the mind to be drawn? Very strong reasons might be urged to prove, that the organization, or the configuration of parts, proceeding from each other, fixes the internal elements of the human form, or the character of what is called the soul. Even the idea of a breath, a wind, a thin cloud, or an airy form, containing a living being, in which the fancy forms an image of a simple soul, has extension, be that form ever so incomplete; and, therefore, souls without form, or beings altogether simple, of which no image can be conceived, are a modern discovery, and were wholly unknown to the ancients*. This opinion is grounded upon the pre-supposition, that every extended thing consists of parts, and that every thing, consisting of parts, is subject to destruction, or will be annihilated by a dissolution of the parts†. But, as the soul is immortal, it must be a simple being. It is likewise indebted for its existence, for the following

* "Thales, the Milesian, said, that water was the principle of all things, and God the intelligence, who formed every thing with water. But why unite the one with the other, if mind can exist without a body? Anaximander believed the gods were innumerable worlds; but how can we believe in any other than an eternal God? Anaximenes maintained, that air is god: but, as air has no form, how can it be God, since God must have a very beautiful form? Anaxagoras was the first, who maintained, that the order of the universe must be ascribed to the wisdom and power of an infinite spirit. This philosopher would not admit, that the spirit could be clothed with a body. But it appears to me (Cicero), that our understanding can form no idea of a pure and simple spirit, unless we add something to make it a sensible being. Pythagoras believes God to be a soul, spread over every being in nature, and that human souls are parts extracted from it; so that when these souls are severed from him, God must be torn to pieces; and when they suffer, as is the case with most of them, God must suffer in a part of him too. Besides, if the mind of man were God, why should it not be omniscient? Lastly, if this God were nothing but a soul, in what manner could he unite himself to the world? Xenophon says, that God is an infinite whole, and he adds, an intelligence. As to the intelligence, it is an error, which he commits in common with the others; but he is yet more censurable, when he maintains, that infinity is capable of sensation, and that any thing can be added to it. Parmenides has imagined something like a crown; a radiant circle, which he calls God. But where can he find the divine form in his circle? and what probability is there that it should contain life? Democritus assigns the divine attributes to the images, which make an impression upon us, and to nature, which imparts these images to us. Plato says, in his Timæus, that the father of the world cannot be named; and, in his book concerning the laws, that it is not proper to inquire what God is. When he says that God has no body, he talks of a being not to be conceived; a being without sensation, without wisdom, without enjoyment, all which are essential attributes of the Gods. He likewise says, in the Timæus, and in the treatise concerning the laws, that the world, the heavens, the stars, the earth, are God. These opinions, collectively considered, are contradictory; and separately examined, are evidently false."..... Thus we see, that Cicero holds the idea of a soul, without form, for an absurdity. (Cicero de natura Deorum.)

† Nothing is more evident, than that every thought and every propensity is infinitely divisible, as much as every line or every point of matter; and it is evident, that a man is wise, in proportion as his thoughts are divisible. The botanist sees an infinite variety of things in a plant, which, to a common eye, appears only as a single obscure object. Whence proceeds the superiority of the profoundly learned over the superficial, but from this,....that the latter deal in generalities, and the former in particulars; for the generality contains an infinity of particulars: profound thinkers, therefore, have innumerable ideas, where the superficial short way of coming to a conclusion:....Matter is extended, and, therefore, every thing extended is matter; the soul is not matter, therefore is not extended. Without further remarks upon such conclusions, I may be permitted to request the partizans of the doctrine of thinking Monades, or simple souls without form, to make it intelligible to us, by means of what points of operation, a simple soul can affect an extended body? and, consequently, how the Deity, who, according to their system, must be a simple soul too, can act upon matter? further, how, it happens, that this simple substance without form, can only think ideas that have forms? for the understanding can exhibit abstractions only under the image of a subjective form; and lastly, what becomes of this being without form (for all predicates are grounded upon the modification of forms) in the future life? It has a continued consciousness of thinking, answer the moralists. How! It thinks without the organs of thought? It were really to be wished that these gentlemen would render intelligible to us the secret of thinking without brains? Has this simple soul sensation too, without the organs of sense? does it hear without ears, see without eyes, &c.? The thing has indeed not been carried to such a pitch of nonsense. The poor, unfortunate, simple soul has been deprived, for a whole tedious eternity, of all sensation, and doomed to everlasting plodding,.... forsooth, no enviable condition! I believe the most of these poor simple souls, would prefer annihilation. These same gentlemen urge lastly, that the soul is more perfect than the body; but to possess organs is more perfect than to be deprived of them. Nay, without form, there can be no perfection, since it consists in unity and variety, or the concurrence of separate co-existing parts to the same purpose.

This absurd and senseless existence of a being without form, through all eternity, and, on the other hand, the incapacity of sensitive men to comprehend an existence in any other than the material body, which we have in this world, has introduced among Christians the monstrous doctrine, for which we can never sufficiently blush, and of which there is not a word in the holy scriptures, of the resurrection and re-union of this dust-reduced body with the soul, which, in the interval, has been no one knows where! and continued to exist, no one knows how! of a ridiculous last day, for which we wait, probably as much in vain as the Jews for their Messiah! However, heaven be praised, I have no occasion to contend against such a shameful aberration of the human mind, since, in this enlightened age, orthodox christianity so called, is either altogether annihilated, or at least so modified in the heads of men, that it may be said no longer to exist.

The same causes have produced among the pure deists so called, or natural spiritualists, an opinion, which might also furnish us some merriment; but as the followers of natural religion are philosophers, such a jest would be highly presumptuous. And as we can here make a very proper application of a common proverb, which tells us of the danger, which attends the disturbance of an hornet's nest, I shall only, with an holy fear of offending the glory of such great men, venture, with deep humility to express some timid doubts against the oracular sentences of such exalted intelligences. The deists then believe partly in a transmigration of souls from one planet to another. Thus a soul, which death has delivered from the shackles of the body here on earth, travels to Jupiter, or to another planet, where a greater have but one. Every divided thing is not, on that account, more simple, but by so much the more divisible, or complicated, as the thing divided and again divided, in the same proportion approaches to infinity.

degree of perfection prevails, there to animate another body. This is the lot of good souls; the bad therefore must, I suppose, be degraded to still more imperfect stations than our earth. It might, indeed, be questioned, why all those pleasant excursions through the universe happen exactly to begin from our earth? for no one here, as far as I know, remembers having dwelt in another planet, at least I have not yet met with a man pretending to have been a burgomaster in the moon, or an ensign in Jupiter. The excursive gentlemen will perhaps answer, it is because our planet is at the lowest station; the very worst of all bad planets. I must here honestly acknowledge, that they have substantial grounds to maintain this opinion; that such are really the appearances, and that probably the result of my researches concerning the Americans will not contradict them. But then we should not know where to banish the wicked souls; for if they should be transported to more perfect planets, they would be rewarded instead of the punishment which they deserve. Where then is our poetical justice? And that worse planets than our earth should exist, is truly hard to believe. Why then cannot these souls animate other souls in their own planet? Are not those worlds, after all, material as well as the earth? But in that case the ascension of matter to higher steps of perfection falls to the ground. And if a soul cannot exist without a material body, what body has the Deity? This pilgrimage of souls, therefore, is liable to numerous objections.

These absurdities, all which originate in the idea of souls without form, have very much increased the numbers of the materialists. But an hypothesis, which should represent the soul as an existing spirit in a perfect human form pervading the body, which internal man acts upon the external man or body, as a cause upon its effect; would, as I believe, after an impartial consideration of the arguments for and against it, perhaps withstand all the attacks of the materialists. The inference of causes from their effects, makes it necessary to ascribe to this spiritual substance such a velocity, as not to admit of space, but that it exists in space without space: the materialists themselves must allow this; since for thoughts and desires there is no such thing as space. Lastly, the tenuity of this spiritual matter may qualify it peculiarly for eternal duration. I make use of the word matter, because I speak of something formed, which at this day can be conceived only of matter. But it is by no means a contradiction to consider spiritual matter as formed, and of course extended, and yet to say it is without space; for every difficulty disappears, if we assume that the volatility or inherent activity of this matter is the cause that there exists for it no measurable extension, but only an immeasurable one, or the appearance of space, which may be expressed by saying it is a space without space.

Further, these appearances of proximity and distance among spiritual substances, must be determined by other causes than the distances in the material world, which I will call the natural world: and these causes can be no other than the affinity of inclinations and thoughts, or sympathetic attractions, which, like the attractive or repulsive power proceeding from the sun, in the natural world, probably preserve all things in the spiritual world in order.

This spiritual man dwelling in the body could itself only be a sheltering form of the life flowing from the single self-existent being, and this source of all life is the Deity. Who can be so mad as to maintain that the souls of men have life in themselves? In that case they would be God. The difference between one mind and another can be explained only by the variety of their sheltering forms. The light of the sun is unchangeable. The different organization of the thorn-bush and the vine-shrub is the occasion whence the warmth and the light of the sun produces upon the two plants such different effects.

Who can then well deny that the minds of children, that is, their understanding and will, must resemble those of their parents, and especially of the father, since the organization of the internal man determines the character of the understanding, and the tendency of the will? For the most probable theory of generation, and the most congenial to an enlightened understanding teaches us, that the soul, that is, the innermost rudiments of the human form, is wholly contained in the seed of the father, and that this soul clothes itself in the mother's womb with a body resembling him. In truth, the man is the active, and the woman the passive cause of propagation, and the active principle can alone reasonably be supposed to have the seed in itself.

This innate property of children, descending from the parents, which is sufficiently corroborated by the generally prevailing resemblance of inclinations between them, is the true idea of original sin. This doctrine of original sin, which has hitherto been an object of derision to all thinking men, because it has been wholly disfigured by the christians, is like other dogmas contained in their holy books, not only perfectly adapted to an understanding enlightened by philosophy, but it is absolutely necessary to adopt it. That by a certain Adam's having eaten an apple, all his posterity were damned, is nonsense; and who can avoid perceiving here an allegory? But that the faults and ill desires of their parents descend to the children, and that this evil, if not broken down, increases continually to the third and fourth generation, and of course that the sins of the fathers are visited upon the children, as the bible says, is what all experience confirms, and what I think I have brought strong proofs to demonstrate.

To the objection above-mentioned; that the idle pride of nobility, and the unjust prejudices against the children of vicious parents, would be confirmed by this doctrine of the propagation of qualities, this system of pure and impure races, it is necessary, so far as relates to the nobility, to say only a few words. What sort of men were the first nobles? who confers nobility? and by what means is it preserved? and if there are families, which descend from great men, and have produced a long series of them, it would still be necessary to prove that the mothers all possessed the virtue of chastity, which, as is well known, has long since grown to be a rather scarce article. Now for the unjust prejudices against the children of vicious parents.

The inclinations of the children resemble those of the parents: but man is endowed with liberty; that is, he has in himself the power, to constitute, to change, and altogether to transform into their opposites, these inclinations, which are called the character. This operation is performed by the understanding, or by truths, which have their seat in it. This, in the holy books of the christians, is called the new birth, of which however those, who at this day are called orthodox christians, carry about with them very extravagant ideas, and which the others therefore totally reject. This new birth takes place by means of a struggle of the understanding or internal man, against the evil propensities or desires, against the external sensuality or the external man, in which external principle the hereditary evil, or original sin exists; or rather it consists properly in the dominion of the sensual over the rational principle.

This struggle between truth and error, between virtue and vice, between reason and sensuality, between the internal and the external man: is what the christian system calls temptation. He that sinks in the contest becomes the slave of vice or of his desires; he that conquers, obtains dominion over the inherited evil, and over the active evil proceeding from this inherited tendency of the soul, and attains first thereby moral liberty. This internal warfare against evil is not indeed maintained by our own weapons. The goodness, which by truth contends against error and evil, flows from the source of all truth and goodness, from the moral sun, or the Godhead, as light and heat flows from the material sun upon the sheltering forms; and man is such a receiving form.

The necessity of such an influence maintained at first, as I think, by Descartes, but now generally denied, might be supported by strong proofs; but this is not the place for them. It may be seen, however, that the doctrines of the christian religion are susceptible of a rational explanation, of which, what is here said of original sin, the new birth, and temptation, may serve as an example.

This transformation of the natural man (I call the hereditary inclinations the natural man) into a spiritual man (reason, or the wisdom and knowledge flowing from it I call the spiritual man), or this new birth, can only be effected by the intervention of circumstances so various, that they cannot all be here mentioned. As therefore the circumstances, in which a man has been placed cannot possibly be known, a prejudice against the son of vicious parents is unjust, though certainly an higher degree of suspicion and distrust against him, at least until a close knowledge of his character be obtained, than against a descendant from a good family, is perfectly conformable to the dictates of prudence.

Among the circumstances, which contribute to the formation of the moral man, education and example are certainly of the highest importance. But what an education, if it be at home, and what an example do bad parents give to their children? The importance of this effective cause is, however, so generally acknowledged, and so fully appreciated, that I have occasion barely to mention it, whereas the internal organization of man, its propagation from father to son, and its importance in deciding the character, is either controverted, or altogether unknown, and therefore the subject of which I am to treat, required that I should support it by argument.

As, therefore, in the case of an individual, whose father is known, the next question would be, whether he is regenerated, inquiries concerning a nation, after their forefathers have been the subject of consideration, must have for their object the illustration of circumstances, inasmuch as they may have tended or not to effect the regeneration of succeeding generations; in order to ascertain the result of which, the confirmation or refutation is afterwards to be drawn from history.

CHAP. III.

Origin of the Americans.....New-England men..... Irishmen.

AFTER this introductory discussion, which, on account of the importance, in my estimation, of descent, though somewhat long, was, in my opinion, to the purpose, I now repeat the question, from whom do the Americans descend?

The New-England-men, who, with their colonies in Pennsylvania, on the Ohio, and in the southern states (North-Carolina), comprize perhaps a fourth part of the whole population, are, as is well-known, the descendants of those rigorous presbyterians, puritans, independents, quakers, and other fanatical sects, who, under the government of the Stuarts, as oppressed non-conformists, carried with them, to those cold and barren shores of that part of America, which they called New-England, that hatred against kingly power, as the government by which they had been persecuted, which, though weakened, continued among their posterity, and was perhaps, in our days, the cause of the American revolution. Toleration was not the virtue of these splenetic enthusiasts, although themselves the victims of intolerance; for the reigning presbyterians in the colony of Massachusetts banished the weaker quakers and anabaptists, who, therefore, fled to Rhode-Island, and there founded a colony. There could be nothing amiable in these crabbed hypocrites, for they doomed to capital punishment those, who should dance on a Sunday. Stern, hypocritical manners, calculated to gratify, under the cloak of rigour, the ruling passion of cold hearts, self-interest, and even deceit, if necessary, seems to have been a characteristic feature of these men, and indeed followed from their religious principles. It is well ascertained, that they belonged, for the most part, to the lower class of the people in England and Scotland, and probably a great number of them were tradesmen. Every one, who knows that mankind most vehemently desire what they do not possess, will acknowledge, that, in general, the external splendour of wealth dazzles the poor, more than those, who are rendered, by the enjoyment of riches, more indifferent to them. Yet the New-Englanders may boast of the most honourable descent of any among the Americans; for they maintain, that they never admitted among them transported malefactors. They have likewise always possessed the most political information. Without them, no revolution could have taken place; and they make more account of education than the other Americans. It will, however, be seen in the sequel, that they have more degenerated from the energy of their fathers than might be expected.

As for the virtuous ladies from Bridewell, and the gentlemen from Newgate, and other prisons, with whom the shores of Virginia, Maryland, Carolina, &c. were endowed, no very respectable progeny can be expected from them. The pretence that it became necessary to hang almost all those felons, thus transported from England, is scarcely credible, when we consider how large their numbers were; and that, when the means of subsistence become easier, the practice of the crimes, which are punished with hanging, grows less frequent, even when they remain lurking in the mind; and further, that, in America, hanging, and in general the punishment of offenders is extremely rare, whether from mutual indulgence, or from the principle of the common proverb, "live, and let others live." But, perhaps, in those times, the laws were more severe, and the art of living in society, in such an accommodating manner, was not so well understood*.

The lower classes of people have always poured forth in streams from Ireland to America, and I believe half of all the colonists are either Irishmen, or descendants from them. What the character of these people is, is well known in Europe. They are coarse barbarians, of whom a degree of cruelty seems to be an innate property, and whom a superstitious religion, whose priests absolve crimes, renders yet more wicked. Their poverty, which is indescribable, proceeds chiefly from the oppression of the feudal system, and is the most effective cause of the absence among them of that, which might, in an extensive sense, be called a moral education. Notwithstanding the gross ignorance of these barbarians, they are cunning enough for deception, and ingenious to the utmost, for knavish tricks. It seems to be a faculty born with them. They are especially addicted to two vices....filthiness and drunkenness. Their fair sex add to all these cleanly habits, the agreeable practice of smoking tobacco, which the men do not follow. That they are dirty, follows of course. They are also given to prostitution. An Englishman gave orders, in his will, that his Irish boors should have, at his funeral, as much corn-brandy, which they call whisky or usquebahr, as they could drink; and that knives should, at the same time, be distributed among them, as he was sure that these creatures, in the rage of drunkenness, would cut one another's throats, which he thought a desirable circumstance. Such then is the character, befitting the major part of the progenitors of the North-American republicans.

* An American will here accuse me of being dissatisfied with judicial proceedings in America, because they do not, upon all occasions, hang and break on the wheel. But I write only for those, who can read.

Of the well educated class of Irishmen, a nation which has recently made such glorious progress, shewn such admirable talents, and furnished their neighbour, Britain, with great men, whom she has appropriated to herself, here and there one has likewise found his way to America. One of them has made the Americans acquainted with their own country, by a geographical dictionary, intitled, The Gazetteer of the United States. His name is Scott; and there is no doubt but the American nation will have, in Germany, the credit of his celebrated work. In general, however, it is only the dregs of the Irish people, who emigrate to America, and what I have said above is unfortunately but too applicable to them. It must, however, be observed, that they cannot, in general, be accused of coarse manners; I have found them, on the contrary, for the most part civil: it is, in truth, the civility of a knave, willing to over-reach you.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS,

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

IMITATORES SERVUM PECUA.

I SOMETIMES relax among books, as well as men. After reading my accustomed portion of the sacred scriptures the last evening, I caught up a volume of Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son. The venerable volume I had laid by, is generally the last I take in hand, previous to my repose; but the courtly pages lay so temptingly by me, and...perhaps I had better confess the truth.... some passages in the divine writings demanded so serious a consideration, that I resolved to think on those things, at some more "convenient season," and to amuse and divert myself from the melancholy which was pervading me, by the elegant instructions of his lordship. HERE I was sure, at least, that if my heart was not cheered, my conscience would not be wounded.

Perusing the sacred and profane writers, in the same hours of retirement, gave rise to the following reflections

UPON PROVERBS.

It is astonishing to reflect, how those pithy adages and brief sentences, which convey instruction to all conditions of men, in all circumstances of life, with such force and precision, which were so long the boast of the ancient sages, and the glory of men of wit and learning, should have so undeservedly fallen into disuse, been restrained to the pulpit, or degraded into the conversation of the illiterate. But, alas! even learning has its fashions, and, like other fashions of this world, they pass suddenly away; for those excellent wise sayings, which were the perfection of eastern literature, and the pride of the Grecian porticoes, of which kings were emulous to be esteemed authors, and which philosophers viewed as their brightest wreaths of immortality, are become like a garment, which is "waxen old."

The misfortune of proverbs has been, that, from their obvious utility, they have been rendered common, and being once common, they have become contemptible. The wisest of the moderns, however, for many centuries, imitated, although they have never equalled, the more nervous ancients, in the use of adages and maxims. We find them scattered profusely in the writings of the christian fathers, and every where adorning the pages of the philosopher; nor is it indeed until near a century past, that they have fallen so generally into disrepute. At present, the polite and learned, of all countries, seem combined against them; and the late earl of Chesterfield, who has analyzed politeness, and reduced good manners to a system, it is supposed has given them their fatal stroke, by noticing the entire disuse of them, as one principal criterion of polite conversation. But, if we of this age have indeed polished our style, by their disuse, I fear we have purchased the ornamental, at the expense of the useful; and I am apprehensive the noble author has, in this sentiment, evidenced rather a sickly than a refined taste.

If to express much in the fewest words, and those the most happily chosen, be the perfection, as indeed it is the modern definition of fine writing, what literary composition shall compare with the proverbial? It is not a little curious to observe, that the whole of this graceful writer's directions for his son's conduct in life, which are truly valuable, is but a commentary upon the proverbial sayings of the inspired writers. His modish disciple does not consider, that, whilst he is assiduously pursuing his lordship's directions, he is often rigidly obeying the wise admonitions of the son of Sirach. I contend, that the wisdom of Lord Chesterfield is the wisdom of Solomon, and his sententious associates. Let his admirers seek a better origin for his follies, his frivolities, and duplicity. The only difference between the inspired penmen and his lordship, as to the truly valuable, is, that they give us at once, in their proverbial saying, the very essence of those sweets, which he presents us, diffused in copious baskets of flowers.

Does his lordship recommend a strict attention to instruction, and enforce his advice with examples of the uncourtly carriage of those, who neglect it? Does he spend pages to elucidate this? With what brevity has the proverb said, ages before, Whoso loveth instruction loveth knowledge, but he that hateth reproof is brutish.

Does he recommend the Suaviter in modo, the gentle way of effecting a purpose, or procuring friends? Has not the wise man taught us, that "Sweet language will multiply friends, and a fair speaking tongue will increase kind greetings;" and in the more familiar adage, "Soft words turn away wrath?"

Has he advised his son to associate with persons, older than himself? "Stand in the multitude of the elders," says the proverb, "and cleave unto him, who is wise." Does he recommend reserve and secrecy, in matters of importance, necessary to be concealed? The Solomon of ancient times has said, "Open not thy heart to every man, lest he requite thee with a shrewd turn;" and "A fool uttereth all his mind, but a wise man keepeth in till after-wards."

Does his lordship caution his son against trusting a man, with whom he has once been at variance? The proverb has before cautioned us, "Never trust thine enemy, for, like as iron rusteth, so is his wickedness."

Has he at large recommended a certain regular, systematic mode of doing business to effect, and instanced very great men, who, with a life of fatigue, for want of attention to this mode, have brought little to pass? We read that "There is one that laboureth, and taketh pains, and maketh haste, but is so much more behind."

Does he impose upon his son diligence in his political concerns, as a sure step to court preferment? The proverb says, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business, he shall stand before kings."

Nor are the proverbs less the text of his lordship's directions, in those things, which more particularly concern the welfare of the body. Does he warn him of intemperance, as the sure destroyer of health? Are we not warned in the Proverbs, that "Wine is a mocker, strong drink is raging, and whoso is deceived thereby is not wise?" and "Be not insatiable in any dainty things, nor too greedy upon meats, for excess of meat bringeth forth sickness, and surfeiting will turn into choler?" Nor these lesser instructions, which relate to his son's conduct in company. Is the youth cautioned of the folly of tedious and unseasonable stories? The proverb says, "An unseasonable tale shall always be in the mouth of fools."

Is the young gentleman guarded against boisterous laughter? is he directed by the courtly parent merely to dimple his features into a smile of complacency? Even for this he is indebted to the proverb, which says, "A fool lifteth up his voice with laughter, but a wise man doth scarce smile." And even an attention to those "graces," which we meet with, almost as frequently as with the beauties of style in the letters of this elegant writer; even the minute attention to dress, address, and to the numberless decencies of carriage, feature, and person, which we are told mark the real gentleman with such precision, are recommended in these uncourtly proverbs, for the preacher saith, "A man's dress, laughter, and gait, shew what he is." And as this polished instructor drew so much knowledge himself from these ungraceful adages, it would have been well if he had commented upon one more proverb, in his letters to his son: "Why wilt thou, my son, be ravished with a strange woman, and embrace the bosom of a stranger?"

Much more might be added, but the printer's boy calls, and I much fear, by tracing the sentiments of this polite writer to so unfashionable a source, I may destroy that relish for his works, which gives the true zest to most of his readers.

MACKENZIE'S TRAVELS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM our eagerness to promote the knowledge and popularity of the journal of this very intelligent traveller, we copy the following very curious article, respecting the traditions of a rude tribe:

"The notion, which the Chepewyans entertain of the creation, is of a very singular nature. They believe, that, at the first, the globe was one vast and entire ocean, inhabited by no living creature, except a mighty bird, whose eyes were fire, whose glances were lightning, and the clapping of whose wings was thunder. On his descent to the ocean, and touching it, the earth instantly arose, and remained on the surface of the waters. This omnipotent bird then called forth all the variety of animals from the earth, except the Chepewyans, who were produced from a dog; and this circumstance occasions their aversion to the flesh of that animal, as well as the people who eat it. This extraordinary tradition proceeds to relate, that the great bird, having finished his work, made an arrow, which was to be preserved with great care, and to remain untouched; but that the Chepewyans were so devoid of understanding, as to carry it away, and the sacrifice so enraged the great bird, that he has never since appeared.

"They have also a tradition among them, that they originally came from another country, inhabbited by very wicked people, and had traversed a great lake, which was narrow, shallow, and full of islands, where they had suffered great misery, it being always winter, with ice and snow. They believe also, that, in ancient times, their ancestors lived till their feet were worn out with walking, and their throats with eating. They describe a deluge, when the waters spread over the whole earth, except the highest mountains, on the tops of which they preserved themselves.

"They believe, that, immediately after their death, they pass into another world, where they arrive at a large river, on which they embark in a stone canoe, and that a gentle current bears them on to an extensive lake, in the centre of which is a most beautiful island; and that, in the view of this delightful abode, they receive that judgment for their conduct during life, which terminates their final state, and unalterable allotment. If their good actions are declared to predominate, they are landed upon the island, where there is to be no end to their happiness, which, however, according to their notions, consists in an eternal enjoyment of sensual pleasure, and carnal gratifications.... But, if their bad actions weigh down the balance, the stone canoe sinks at once, and leaves them up to their chins in the water, to behold and regret the reward enjoyed by the good, and eternally struggling, but with unavailing endeavours, to reach the blissful island from which they are excluded forever."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM WINDHAM.

[After some time, devoted to this particular object, we are at length able to give a new, copious, and minute life of Mr. WINDHAM, the disciple of BURKE, the darling of Dr. JOHNSON, and "a shield and buckler" to his country. It is delightful to preserve any memorial of one, who has such friendships and such enemies; who, to the "prisca fides" of an ancient Englishman, adds the liberal spirit of learning, and the valiant heart of a soldier; whose motto is "Odi profanum vulgus;" and who, in the dusky twilight of the political sky, urges an undaunted and right onward course; who always acts as becomes a generous spirit, in factious times; who despises the dictates of a false and reptile prudence; who remembers there is a courage of the cabinet, far more useful, and not less brilliant than that of the field; and, when enemies and conspirators are in array, would plan with the decisive spirit of an EARL OF STAFFORD, and execute with the sword of a MARQUIS MONTROSE. In fine, we may read the character of this intrepid and liberal statesman, in the following lines:

"One, who, warm and zealous for his friend,
Spite of opposing thousands will commend;
And no less warm and zealous 'gainst his foes,
In spite of railing thousands will oppose."

It is necessary to add, that, from the penury of biography in this country, the Editor has been obliged to publish a garbled and prejudiced history of Mr. Windham. It is derived from a work entitled "Public Characters for 1802," a work which, though in the main tolerably well conducted, is often diluted with lukewarmness, or tainted with Jacobinism. Its publisher is one R. Phillips, who has more than once incurred the displeasure of government, and felt the gripe of the laws; and many of its writers, though they affect the sweetest spirit of candour and impartiality, are well known to be disaffected to the ruling power. These malecontents can never forgive, in Mr. WINDHAM, his defection from their leader, Fox; and hence their absurd charge of his inconsistency, and hence their abhorrence of his strenuous and vigorous support of a war with France. His inconsistency, if it ever existed, was like that, so often urged against Burke; as such it has often been attacked, and as such it may easily be defended. The benefits of both, respecting popular governments, were effectually destroyed, by contemplating the effects of the French revolution. If Mr. Windham ever were a whig, in the vulgar sense of that word, is a problem not worth the solution. A transition from torism is rare. He, who has once supported hereditary right, seldom becomes a lawler for the rights of the mob. But, as the generous and unsuspecting confidence of youth gradually changes to caution and doubt in age, so those liberty dreams, with which boys delight themselves at school, are often forgotten, or derided, when they arrive at man's estate. Sir THOMAS WENTWORTH, whose history may be read in HUME, was, for a short time, opposed to the court of the first Charles; but, when he became the supporter of the king's prerogative, neither the "lures and ogings" of partisans, nor the terrors of a scaffold, erected by levelers, induced him to change again.]

THE lives of our contemporaries are undoubtedly interesting, but those of the statesmen, who live during the same period with ourselves, must be allowed to be edifying in no common degree. It is to them we are indebted for the prosperity or the misfortunes of our country; for the extension or diminution of our territories; for the adoption or rejection of odious imposts....in short, for all that can endear, or render life miserable. Of these men we are proud when they support the fame, the dignity, the glory of our nation; when they repress arbitrary power; when they vindicate expiring liberty; when they die with, or only live to restore the lost freedom of their native land. To such we give a generous latitude, and a liberal interpretation, in respect to their conduct; they may pause during an awful crisis; they may oppose their former friends; they may even league with their former enemies, and yet still possess the esteem of their countrymen. Of this, indeed, they can be deprived only by the most flagrant inconsistency; for they may change their opinions without losing our confidence, provided they do not profit by the change. It is then, and not until then, that the pseudo-patriot incurs our suspicions, and we begin to consider his conduct at least equivocal.

Mr. Windham was born in, and is descended from ancestors, who have been long settled in the county of Norfolk, in which he possesses a small patrimony. His family appears to have sided with the whigs, and to have given its aid in forwarding one of the darling schemes of that party....the establishment of a national militia*. One of his near relatives accepted a commission as colonel of the battalion of his native district, and seems to have been particularly anxious to establish such a system of discipline as should render the corps respectable. In order to achieve this, he actually published a treatise on the subject, in 1759, and in the preface has given a curious and interesting account of the improvements made in the fire arms used by the moderns.

After receiving the usual preliminary education at a public school, young Windham was sent to Oxford, and entered, we believe, of Brazen-nose-college, the very name of which has doubtless put many a modest youth to the blush. He had the good fortune, while there, to be placed under the care of a most excellent scholar....Winstanley, now provost of Alban-hall, and much to the credit of the pupil, he himself had no sooner risen in the world, and obtained some degree of consideration, than he procured preferment for him also, by means of his friend, the duke of Portland, the present chancellor, whose fortunes he is supposed to have followed, and whose defection from the ranks of opposition he has in some degree countenanced, by means of a similar conduct.

* This appears to be either a wilful falshood, or a strange misapprehension in the biographer. Mr. Windham's ancestors, there is good reason to believe, were loyal friends to the exiled family. My Lord BOLINGBROKE, when intriguing at Bar-le-duc, in favour of prince Charles Edward, addressed a confidential letter to Sir William Windham, containing a full development of the designs of those, who, in the language of the time, were denominated the Jacobite party. Sir William Windham appears to be one of the founders of Mr. Windham's family; a gentleman, who, as the reader will perceive, by consulting Dr. SMOLLET's continuation of HUME's history, would have done any work, rather than act with whigs, or repose confidence in a militia! He is described, with wonderful fervour, by Smollet, as one of the most active, undaunted, and eloquent members of the house of commons.——Note by the Editor of the Port Folio.

No sooner was Mr. W. released from the trammels of colleges and tutors, than he repaired to the metropolis, and soon after visited the continent....not in the splendid, gaudy, and expensive style, to which our nobility and gentry are usually accustomed....but in a manner better suited to his fortune, which was but scanty, and his future hopes in life, which were not of a nature to warrant any ridiculous pageantry.

It was not until the epoch of the American war, that Mr. Windham found means of distinguishing himself, and then only by his zeal in opposition to the existing government, as some of his late associates would affect to term it....but far more properly....in opposition to the unworthy ministers of that period. His bosom glowed with no uncommon share of indignation against those, whom he accused as the subverters of our rights, and the spoilers of our wealth....men battenning on corruption, and eager for despotism and military execution. These sentiments were uttered by him both in public and private; at county meetings, dinner parties, in the metropolis, and the country; from the tops of carts, and of waggons, to the freeholders, the mob, &c. &c.

The cause, in which he then embarked, has been long since consecrated by success, and the overflowings of a youthful bosom will of course be pardoned, nay praised, as evincing a heart exulting in the darling theme of liberty! At the period we allude to, the ex-secretary was less metaphysical than he has become since; his arguments and his language therefore, were better calculated to captivate his audience; in short, he became a popular orator....a whig....a whig too of the most determined kind....one of those capable of spending both life and fortune in the "glorious cause," in which he was engaged, and of going any lengths in support of his principles.

We ought not here to omit the mention of an incident honourable to the laudable ambition of Mr. Windham.

The reign of his present majesty has been distinguished by nautical enterprises of all kinds; and, if we have failed in other matters of importance, it must be allowed by every candid observer, that we have acted no mean part in respect to our maritime exertions. In 1773, a new voyage of discovery was projected, and entrusted to the care of the hon. commodore Phipps, afterwards lord Mulgrave. This expedition, by far the most regular and scientific of any of a similar design and tendency undertaken before that period, was first conceived by the Royal Society, and afterwards adopted by the king, with that due regard to science, which it ought ever to be the object of a great and enlightened nation to cultivate and promote. The principal object of the expedition was to investigate, whether it was practicable to navigate to the north pole, or rather to a latitude very near to it. To this were superadded certain secondary considerations....such as to ascertain the accuracy of time-keepers and pendulums....to make philosophical and astronomical observations....and to determine the practicability of a north-east passage to the East Indies: that philosopher's-stone of modern navigators!

The ships sent out on this occasion, were the Race-Horse, commanded by the officer already alluded to; and the Carcass Bomb, captain Lutwidge. Besides the necessary complement of officers and seamen, a number of scientific men, or, as the French term them, savans, were employed; and they took with them a valuable apparatus for mathematical and astronomical experiments. Two persons, both of whom have since become eminent, embarked, as we have been informed, on this occasion. The first was lord Nelson, whom we have been given to understand acted as a naval officer, and the second Mr. Windham, who was doubtless incited by curiosity alone.

Unluckily, however, for the cause of eloquence, if not of science, the future minister at war became so sea-sick as to be dangerously indisposed, and the commodore was actually under the necessity, as we are told, of setting him on shore in Norway, when he was obliged to find his way back to England in the odoriferous cabin of a Greenlandman.

Were we disposed to be jocular, we might exclaim—What have not the audience of St. Stephen's Chapel lost by this discomfited project! How many practical tropes and figures have been omitted, that might otherwise have adorned the metaphysical disquisitions of the future secretary and orator. Like Lutterel, he would have "handled the oar," and "spliced the rope," and "steered the wheel," and "taken an observation;" or like Burke, he would have harpooned a "loose fish," in the house of commons; or he would have aimed a deadly blow at the "huge Leviathan" of Bloomsbury-square; or literally pursuing the monsters of the main with the spirit of a Kentucky sailor, "he would have run down the degrees of latitude, undaunted by the rigours of either pole, in search of the grampus and the whale, and pursued his monstrous game with a zeal unabated by the scorching heats of the equator."

Mr. Windham now aspired to a seat in the legislature of his country; and it must be confessed, that in point of education, talents, and research, he was well qualified for that situation. True to his original opinions, on his entrance into St. Stephen's chapel, he sided in general with those, who had voted against the American war; but he adhered to the person, and followed the opinions of Mr. Fox with a marked predilection, and appeared to have formed so inseparable an union with that great orator and statesman, that it was supposed death alone could have dissolved the attachment.

The practical talents of Mr. Windham were not suddenly called forth, nor have they, at any one time, been employed during a period of great duration. He was deemed qualified, however, to superintend the interests of England in the sister kingdom*, and he resided there during one of those ephemeral administrations, produced by the sudden ascendancy of one party in England, and as speedily dissolved by the alternate preponderance of another.

Hopes, however, were entertained by his friends, that a more permanent and conspicuous situation might be obtained for him at home; and it was not unfair to augur, amidst the vibrations of public opinion, and the many unexpected changes that have taken place during the latter part of the present reign, that the party, which he had so warmly espoused, was likely to attain that superiority, to which it was so justly entitled, from the acknowledged capacity of its leaders.

At one period, indeed, a fair prospect of power disclosed itself to the opposition; and in case their hopes had been realized, there can be no doubt that the subject of the present memoirs would have enjoyed some high and honourable post in the new administration. But the cunning, in conjunction with the talents of Mr. Pitt, fairly outwitted his adversaries, and they were left to lament their credulity* in having trusted to the professions of a beardless statesman.

The mode, in which that gentleman came into power, has often been considered as unconstitutional, and by no one was it condemned with greater bitterness than by Mr. Windham, who seized every opportunity to censure the conduct of the premier, and render him odious to the nation.

During the unhappy illness, with which his majesty was afflicted, Mr. Windham, as usual, sided with Mr. Fox and his party; and as he always feels warmly, doubtless expressed himself on the subject of the regency, with a fervour that his enemies were tempted to stigmatise with the appellation of intemperance. Here again the minority failed in the attainment of their object, after their leader had been brought from Italy, and the nation had beheld a most extraordinary change in the deportment of the two contending parties: that headed by Mr. Pitt having boldly, and what would not have occurred had it not suited their interests.... having constitutionally insisted on an appeal in the new case of a regency, during the malady of the reigning prince, to the representatives of the people: while the opposition, notwithstanding their boasted regard for the rights and liberties of the country, took up the subject on high prerogative notions, and seemed to have changed arguments, before they had changed places with their adversaries.

In 1790, when the affair of Nootka Sound, and the armament that soon after ensued, engaged the attention of parliament and the nation, Mr. Windham expressed his opposition and abhorrence to the measures of Mr. Pitt upon that occasion. He talked loudly† of "the insulted honour of the country," "the heavy expences we were put to," the "weight of taxes we were doomed to bear," and the "certain losses we incurred for uncertain profits." He also ridiculed "the humble minions of ministerial will, phalanxed under the haughty banners of ministerial influence," and added satirically, "that it was not necessary for the people to inquire into the motives of administration for their conduct; they were supposed to be defended by the barriers of truth, and the ramparts of honour; their acts dreaded not the light, and their deeds challenged investigation....then they defy your curiosity, if you call it curiosity....but they shrink from the touch, if you but mention inquiry."

When a temporary misunderstanding with Russia took place in 1791, the subject of these memoirs once more accused the minister and his friends of conceiving too lofty notions of prerogative, and of infringing on the rights and privileges of that house. He congratulated Mr. Pitt "on his ability in seeking remote wars: Nootka and Jacotta were at no small distance, and Oczakow was very well known to be not at our doors." "War," added he "is a question of great importance to the lives of thousands; and no man or member of an assembly, who decided on it rashly, could think himself free from guilt. The general sense of the country is against the war, and the manufacturers in many places are alarmed. Of the city of Norwich I can speak more particularly," adds he, "and I know that they there dread the utter ruin of their trade." While speaking‡ on the same subject some time after, "he attacked the consistency and confidence of the minister; he accused him of having opposed the majorities of that house in an unconstitutional manner, and he replied to the question put by Mr. Pitt of 'Who is his accuser?' that he himself was both criminal and accuser."

On another occasion* he attacked his late colleagues with a vein of happy ridicule, too keen not to be felt, but, perhaps, too fine not to evaporate in a parliamentary report. After combating the attempt to preclude an inquiry, he is said to have spoken as follows:....

"This administration, which it has been the fashion to paint as a perfect paragon of purity and virtue, will now stand unmasked and exposed in their true and natural colours. The gay and embroidered suit of pretence, in which they have decked themselves, and under which they have strutted in magnificent disguise, is torn off, and they behold them in the tattered rags of their genuine deformity. They stand, like the uncased French, which the licentiousness of our stage is too apt to exhibit to ridicule....in ruffles without a shirt....in tinsel and lace on the outside....in dirt or dowlas within. They stand before their confiding majority, convicted of shrinking from trial; and when a man does not dare to stand trial, the world has a right to believe him guilty: and in this condition stand his majesty's ministers in the eyes of their majority. Let me add, sir, one word more on this serious subject. We have before us two pregnant instances of the use, which is made of these summary and shameful proceedings, which are introduced into practice for the sake of our darling revenue....that revenue, for which every thing is to be sacrificed....the citizen to be oppressed and ruined....the constitution to be violated. We see that these summary modes of conviction may be dexterously perverted into instruments of favour or of fear, as it may be the political and corrupt motive of office, for the moment, to gratify or to intimidate."

Whatever difference of opinion may be entertained concerning the recent conduct of Mr. Windham, no degree of obliquity can attach to his behaviour on that occasion, and every good man must dwell with pleasure on it. Nor ought it to be forgotten, that in a debate on the lottery-bill of 1792, he argued against lotteries in general, the disadvantages attendant on which were so great, that in his opinion they could not be compensated for by any advantage whatever in point of revenue. He remarked very justly, that the money produced could not be called clear gain, because in consequence of lotteries many individuals were rendered incapable of paying their taxes. By acquiescing in the plan, "government avowed themselves the bankers....the partners....of all the rogues and vagabonds now described†. They made war upon the morals of the people; and the progress of the unfortunate criminal might be easily traced, step by step, from the insurance office to the Old Bailey! The mischief had extended to every class. Were a committee appointed to inquire into the operations of it, they would trace it to the first floor, from that to the second....to the garret....to the pawnbroker's shop....to the Old Bailey....to the gallows....to Bedlam....or to the workhouse!"

Nor ought it to be forgotten, that Mr. Windham ably and eloquently combated the slave trade, and attacked all those base and interested motives, that would steel the heart of man against the common principles of humanity. He asserted‡ "that, independent of the solid reasoning, the eloquence, and the ability, which had been exerted in favour of the abolition of the slave trade, the bare statement of facts so enormous and atrocious, as appeared by the evidence ever to have been inseparable from that trade, was sufficient to have convinced the most obdurate supporters of African

* When Mr. Windham was about to visit Ireland, in a department (that of secretary) which was supposed to have an ex officio intimacy with corruption, he went to the Colosseum of English literature, and lamented that he should be under the necessity of sanctioning practices, of which he could not approve! The memorable reply made by Dr. Johnson, upon this occasion, has been often quoted since Mr. W. has been supposed to have changed his politics.

* This alludes to Mr. Pitt's promise relative to a dissolution of parliament.

slavery, that the continuation of so iniquitous and abominable a traffic for a moment longer, was unjust, inhuman, and not to be defended on any principle whatever." He maintained "that the slave trade ought to be abolished." "When they were told of the justice due to the West India planters, were they to forget the vast debt of justice due to their slaves? When they were offering up so much to the interest of the West India islands, were they not to recollect the sufferings, which they were entailing on the Africans for some years to come, in comparison with the sufferings of those, who had been transported long since? What relief was it for future sufferers, that so many before them had suffered? It was like one, who, being reproved for skinning eels alive, said, 'they had been always used to it.'

After much pointed reasoning, he concluded by observing, "that in comparison between the possible consequences of the abolition, he saw doubtful contingencies, evils, or disadvantages, on one side.....certain gross and scandalous injustice, shame, and disgrace on the other."

On this great question Mr. Windham was in earnest; indeed, had some others, who only pretended to support it, evinced the same warmth of conviction and the same energy of conduct, there can be no doubt but that this odious traffic would long since have been annihilated, and the plighted faith of parliament rescued from dishonour.

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AFTER a considerable, but unavoidable delay, both volumes of the very beautiful edition of Tooke's Russia, published by William Fry of this city, have made their appearance. This is incomparably the best history of an interesting epoch in the Muscovite annals; and its popularity here has been tested, by eight hundred subscribers, obtained in a very short time, and principally in the southern states. As it has been suggested, that "Secret Memoirs of the Court of St. Petersburg" is a more interesting work, nay, that even Tooke is less copious than the author of Secret Memoirs, it is proper to state, that it has long been a settled fashion among the jacobins, both of French and American birth, to vilify and falsify the character of Catharine. The motive is obvious. By exaggerating the faults of the Russian princess, they mean to inspire into their deluded votaries, the miserable populace, a blind, furious, and fanatical rage against monarchical power, and, indeed, against all power, but the brutal force of the multitude. No means are left unessayed to accomplish this darling project, which, from the commencement of the French revolution, they have cherished with parental solicitude, and which they will continue to cherish, until, by the councils of such men as BURKE and WINDHAM, followed up by the sword, and by the besom of destruction, they are no longer permitted to vex mankind.

We have been inundated with a tide of scandal against the empress of the north, and this "water of bitterness" has been variously directed, by jacobin conductors. Sometimes, as a purling falshood, it glides into our ears from the Morning Chronicle rills of poetry, and sometimes it rushes roughly on from the ditch of St. Antoine, and the filthiest common sewers of Paris. Among other lies and libels, affecting the Russian government, the anonymous author of "Secret Memoirs" proffers his detraction, and there are not wanting those, who will tell the public, that his unsubstantiated assertions are more legitimate than Tooke's elaborate history, and there are not wanting American fools, who will believe it. But, among discerning and well principled men, the reputation of Mr.

Fry's edition of an authentic work will not be depreciated by arts like these. A nameless and shameless Frenchman, of the revolutionary tribe, with his execrable jacobinism, with his lewdness of fancy, and audacity of falshood, will not supersede the well-digested and temperate work of an English gentleman, studious of the verity of his facts, as well as of the correctness of his composition. Mr. TOOKE will not be oppressed by a skulking jacobin, unless the prodigy of SHAKSPEARE be realized; unless

"The eagle, towering in his pride of place,
Be by a mousing owl hawk'd at and kill'd."

The faults and foibles of the imperial Kate were numerous, and we require no party rage to make them appear larger than life. Strict justice has been rendered to her character by Mr. TOOKE, and many other British writers. But all fanatic Frenchmen, of the new school, have described her as a prodigy of vice; and they have depicted her thus, not because she was sometimes wanton, sometimes capricious, and sometimes cruel, for Frenchmen, from sympathy, might forgive all this, but because this prodigy wore an imperial crown, and sometimes waged war, in support of her authority. Now, had she worn a bonnet rouge, and provoked rebellion against government, she would have been hailed as a Madame Montmore, or as a glorious fishwoman of the 10th of August.

It remains only to add, that this well printed edition of a first rate performance, is from the press of Mr. Maxwell, and that to its deserving publisher the writer of this article wishes all that success, which meritorious Enterprize should challenge from the public.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A VERY new and humorous essayist, after remarking, in the trite way, that the love of fame impels many great and glorious actions, declares vivaciously: "It animates the labour of the philosopher, the heroism of the warrior, the eloquence of the senator, the ingenuity of the mechanic, and the dissipation of the fine lady. It has razed towns, produced epic poems, composed sonnets, made speeches, and invented violet soap."

The pretensions of a literary adventurer, are thus stated in a new periodical work:

I stand forth unabashed a candidate for the name of author. I can shew three indisputable claims to the honour demanded; either of them sufficient to enable me to strive for the laurel crown. I am an idle man, a valetudinarian, and a humorist. Volumes might be written on each of these texts, to prove them due qualifications, to enable a man to sit at the common council board of literature.

In London, it is said by a late writer, a man may be idle without fatigue, valetudinarian without contempt, and a humorist without controul. In London, idleness may, without exertion, assume the garb of philosophy. No man is watched by his attentive neighbours, nor are his actions exposed to the critical examination of the piercing eye of curiosity.

What a late correspondent playfully alluded to, it seems is actually contemplated by the republican party. In the "National Egis," there is a proposal for the establishment of a "National Institute."

The gallantries and matrimonial connections of plants have been generally supposed to have been first applied to poetical purposes by Dr. Darwin: a writer in a late London paper has probably gone back to the oldest authority, to deprive Dr. Darwin of this credit, and notices the following passage in Claudian, as translated in the "Guardian."

Branches in branches twin'd compose the grove,
And shoot, and spread, and blossom into time:
The trembling palms their mutual sways repeat,
And bending poplars, bending poplars meet;
The distant planes seem to press more sigh,
And to the sighing alders, alders sigh.

In the Aurora of the 11th current, we read the following sentence, "Which is death, or confinement for life, the more exemplary punishment?" This is a faithful transcript, and we suppose this extraordinary combination of words to be either the new language of the new administration, or else that it is a specimen of the celebrated Columbian Dictionary.

Inscription on a monument, under the statue of Sir Thomas Parkyns, a celebrated wrestler.

Here, thrown by Time, old Parkyn's laid,
The first fair fall he ever had;
Nor Time, without the aid of Death,
Could put this wrestler out of breath.
All else he threw, and with these twain,
As soon as he gets up again.

THE SUBLIME IN DANCING.

The following is literal from a London paper.

A gentleman of merit, well educated, and properly qualified by seven of the best masters that ever trod on English ground, teaches minuets to noblemen, and real ladies only, for the sum of five guineas paid down, with all the excelled graces of the head, body, arms, wrists, hands, fingers, toes, sinks, risings, bounds, rebounds, twirls, twists, fourfold mercuries, couplees, borees, flourishes, demi corpus, curtsies à la mode, hat on, off, giving hands and feet in an advanced octagon adorned style, and divided into one, two, three, or four steps, exact to time, or bars; introducing at the same moment, the à la mode form, chassas, springs, five and nine orders of the graces, and annexed with the rigadon, Louvre, cotillion, and ancient and modern hornpipe steps, and elegant country dance positions. The said gentleman is no common dancing master, has some character to lose, THEREFORE ladies of a common capacity may soon attain to dance equal to the best French or Italian dancer in the kingdom, only for five guineas, on applying to No. 79, in the Haymarket, between ten and eleven in the morning, and four and six in the afternoon, and they will be seen only by the aforesaid gentleman himself.

BURKE presents a curious picture of the blessedness of revolutionary times, when speaking of a French statesman, who went into voluntary exile, after monarchy was destroyed.

"He was a man of honour, and virtue, and talents, and therefore a fugitive."

It is sincerely, though dubiously hoped, we may never have just occasion to suppose that the following passage is, in the remotest degree, descriptive, either of our love of change, or its disgraceful consequences:

When learning and the arts are lost in an experiment to try how well a state may stand, without old, fundamental principles, what sort of thing must be a nation of gross, stupid, ferocious, and, at the same time, sordid barbarians, destitute of religion, honour, or manly pride?

Mr. WINDHAM, the bold opposer of a French peace, is of that undaunted spirit, and of that rapid decision, which render a statesman so eminently useful in all great emergencies. His bold and generous character is drawn by a Roman poet in two lines.

Qui motus omnes et inexorabile fatum
Subiecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari.

In a late political meeting at New York, general HAMILTON, we understand, took occasion to make some remarks upon the imbecility of administration, and the portentous signs of the times. In a spirit of the clearest discernment, and in his wonted tones of eloquence and energy, he made a brief speech on the above interesting topics. His address, says the accurate editor of the New York Evening Post, was of a general nature. He took a very summary view of the leading measures and disposition of our present administration; as being excessively weak, impolitic, disorganizing, and unconstitutional, tending to expose the country to intestine discord and open invasion. It was his opinion that the peace in Europe, even if completed, could not be of long continuance, and that, in the event of a war, this country would be likely to get involved; and he then asked, what must be our situation without money in the treasury, and without a revenue? He spoke of the additional exposure, to which we should now be liable, from the French in possession of Louisiana. On the whole, he thought the present state of things, both at home and abroad, such as to justify the most alarming apprehensions. He therefore called upon the friends to good order, to stable government, to that system of measures, which had brought us to what we were, to rally on this occasion, and express their opinion by voting for a man of correct principles and sound judgment.

The celebrated Fuseli, who is endowed with the imagination of a poet, as well as the genius of a painter, thus describes one of the greatest masters of his art.

In the dawn of modern art, LIOMARDO da VINCI broke forth with a splendour, which distanced former excellence. Made up of all the elements, that constitute the essence of genius, favoured by education and circumstances, all ear, all eye, all grasp; painter, poet, sculptor, anatomist, architect, engineer, chymist, machinist, musician, man of science, and sometimes empiric, he laid hold of every beauty in the enchanted circle, but without exclusive attachment to one, dismissed in her turn each. Fitter to scatter hints, than to teach by example, he wasted life, insatiate in experiment. To a capacity, which at once penetrated the principle and real aim of the art, he joined an inequality of fancy, that, at one moment, lent him wings for the pursuit of beauty, and the next flung him on the ground to crawl after deformity: we owe him chiaro oscuro, with all its magic, we owe him caricature, with all its incongruities. His notions of the most elaborate finish, and his want of perseverance were at least equal. In his Last Supper, in the refectory of the Dominicans, he abandoned, without finishing, the head of Christ, exhausted by a wild chase after models for the heads and hands of the apostles. Had he been able to conceive the centre, the radii must have followed of course.

The Editor recollects to have nowhere read a finer picture of the magical powers of Genius, than what is exhibited in the above sketch. The curious reader, who is solicitous to read an original and bold writer, distinguished for his taste and power of execution in one of the fine arts, is referred to Lectures on Painting, delivered before the royal academy, by H. Fuseli.

REMBRANDT possessed the full empire of light and shade, and of all the tints that float between them. He tinged his pencil with equal success in the cool of dawn, in the noon-day ray, in the livid flash, in evanescent twilight, and rendered darkness visible.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[Nothing, however exquisite or faultless in writing, but may be ludicrously parodied, or burlesqued. The following very characteristic lines seem to sneer at the charming simplicity of Wordsworth's "Lyrical Ballads." Whether this species of sarcasm, applied to the elegant work in question, be fair or not, the Editor will not now stay to settle; but will only add that the subsequent stanzas are very faithfully descriptive of rustic love in New-England; and though such a passion may be derided by the refinement of the city, yet it will cause no scornful smile in

"Many a youth and many a maid Dancing in the cbequer'd shade."]

JONATHAN TO JEMIMA.

JEMIMA, won't you let me sing

A little song I have for you?

I love you so like any thing,

I vow I don't know what to do.

And yet I hate to let you know,

It makes me feel all over so.

Don't you remember t'other day,

When you was milking in the piggin,

You had a straw hat on your head,

But on your neck there was no rigging.

And yet, &c.

Well, by a tree close to the fence

I stood, and while you pull'd the teats,

I peep'd through a small knot hole there,

Till I went almost into fits.

And when you twisted round your head,

And turn'd your eyes towards the tree,

It made me feel amazing sham'd,

So plaguy 'fraid that you would see.

I look'd right at your cheek and chin,

And all from where your gown had fell,

It made me think of fifty things....

But you won't like if I tell.

And when you fill'd your piggin full,

And to the house away had run,

It almost made me cry with grief,

I was so sorry when you'd done.

I wish that I had been a weed,

That almost to your bosom grew;

Or if the cow's teat I had been,

Then should I have been press'd by you.

When I went home, oh how I felt,

So bad that I could almost cry;

I was not sorry....yet I thought

That I most certainly should die.

I did not go to bed till twelve,

I felt so droll about my honey,

And there I lay till broad day-light,

But could not sleep for thinking on ye.

I thought you would not marry me,

You're so much prettier than I;

So I resolv'd to hang myself,

For still I thought that I should die.

I took a rope and went away....

My heart was sorer than a bile....

But when I got it round my neck,

I says, thinks I, it an't worth while.

Then home I went, good Lord,

I vum I never felt so bad,

I had a nation deal of grief,

And folks all thought that I was mad.

Says mother, says she, Jonathan,
Pray what the deuce can ail you now?
Mother, says I, if you was I,
You'd feel as bad as me, I vow.

Now sister says, and mother says,
And so do all the neighbours say,
That I am sartinly in love,
'Tis every bit as plain as day.

And father yesterday declared....
Oh how it makes me blush to tell....
If somehow we could make a match,
He thinks that we might do right well.

He'll let me have a lot of ground,
A gander, goose, the brindled cow,
A pair of oxen, th' old grey mare,
Two pigs, a barrow, and a sow.

And fifty other things like them.
He'll let us have to get along:
And you can get some plates, some chairs...
And now I'm almost done my song.

IMITATION OF HORACE.

ODE IX. BOOK I.

BEHOLD, my friend, *Aschutney's mound
No more its top is white with snow;
No more with frost the woods are crown'd,
Nor streams, congeal'd, forget to flow.

No need of fire....it is not cold...
But ope your case with liberal hand;
Bring generous wine, of four years old,
And near the cheering glasses stand.

Trust to the gods all cares but these,
Let joy and pleasure now prevail;
They smooth the rough tempestuous seas,
Their fat lulls the stormy gale.

Life's common lot account as gain;
Perhaps the morrow is not thine;
Indulge no idle anxious pain,
Nor at the ills of life repine.

While hoary Age, morose and sour,
Is distant from the present scene,
Acknowledge life's triumphant power,
And court the tasses round the green.

The rural field, or gay parterre,
Where whispering lovers nightly stray,
Now call thee forth to meet the fair,
Whose social converse crowns the day.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XIX.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

ATTACHED as I am to the female sex, and habituated, as I have been, to devote my hours, and assiduously to toil for their amusement; prompted to this line of conduct, as well by ardent feelings, as by the enthusiastic veneration I bear to the age of chivalry, the pride of gallantry in me has been wounded, by my permitting "Aristippus, junior" to notice, before me, the pathetic but elegant communication of "Mrs. M." in No 15. I might, however, have found a balm for this wound, if she had been treated, by Aristippus, with that politeness and respect, which are due to a married female, who, "by her economy," has verified the maxim of a philosopher and a patriot, that "a penny saved is a penny gained." I expect confidently her pardon, however, when she finds that I shall atone, by my zeal in her defence, for the crime of delaying my attention to her heart-breaking communication.

I am, Mr. Saunter, a member of "the Tuesday club." It was early my opinion, that an association for the attainment of objects, honourable in their nature, and useful in their tendencies, should have "a name." I was fully aware, that, not in novels alone, "ORLANDO" always gained more female hearts than Peter or Sam; and believing that this just discrimination extended beyond the period of "sweet fifteen," I was anxious that our club, by its title, should gain favourable prepossessions in the public mind. My associates in the club will testify that this was strenuously urged by me. At our first meeting, I expatiated at length on the importance of a sounding name. I proved to demonstration, that the name of a certain meeting of legislators in this state, was the only barrier to public contempt; that the utility of sounding names was clearly exemplified in the "Vicar of Wakefield." I believe that my eloquence would have been successful, but, just as we were about taking the sense of the company, a merry member rose, and, in a voice, which is better known at the club than at tea-parties, loudly vociferated,

"What virtue in a name? That, which we call a rose, by any other name, would smell as sweet." Finding that Shakspeare was against me, my opposition ceased, and the "club" was nameless.

Disappointed in this important preliminary step, I resolved to exert myself to procure a secretary to the club, who should faithfully minute our proceedings. I had been too much among republicans to be ignorant, that, in a free country, there should be no closed doors, and that it would be not less unpolite than aristocratic, to keep our proceedings secret, especially from the ladies. I was the more prompted to exertion for this object, as we had no married men in the club, and as I knew that, with the ladies, a knowledge of our measures alone would secure their applause. I believed, with the ladies, that they had a right to be informed of all our proceedings; that, although wits might call it curiosity in them, it was a laudable thirst for information; and that to avoid an interference with the ladies, on their tea-party evenings, they should be consulted as to the nights, on which the members of the club might be spared. I wished also to make a virtue of necessity; for, believing that one of the members might be married before the close of the season, and knowing the frailty and wavering of a bridegroom, during the honey-moon, I wished the club to have that merit, which results from openness and candour. I therefore moved, that a secretary should be appointed, who should be ordered to present the proceedings of the club at each monthly or other meeting of the "Philadelphia Female Association." Here, I believe, I should have succeeded, but the jovial member, to whom I have before alluded, marred my schemes. He thought, that some parts of our proceedings should not be made public, and exclaimed aloud, in allusion to women,

"Constant you are,
But yet a woman, and for secrecy
No lady closer; for I will believe
Thou wilt not utter what thou dost not know,
And so far will I trust ye, gentle dame."

I have too high a veneration for Shakspeare, to oppose his doctrines; and, although it may be possible he may be wrong, I did not choose to appear vain, by opposing my judgment to his, in a public club. I yielded, and the doors were closed to all but the waiter.

As this was the result of our proceedings, I am, of course, bound to secrecy, with regard to the meetings of the club. I know well, that, as the interests of women are so intimately connected with those of our sex, they have an indisputable right to be informed of our actions. It is certainly an ordination of nature, and, in pursuance of this ordination, the ladies, by some means or other, always do find out the haunts of men. I know well too, that, like Tilburina, they sometimes "do see what is not in sight." But, if they can thus see things, which are not to be seen, they certainly can see, with much greater ease, all that is to be seen.

I regret that, by the rules of the club, I cannot be the medium of information to the ladies; but, although restricted from telling what does pass, I am at liberty to say what does not pass; particularly as our reputations suffer, in the opinions of females, from the unfortunate suspicion, that one of our members learned among us more Latin than he could from his parents, who wisely "avoided sending him to school, where his learning was to be acquired at the expense of his morals!"

I must then, Mr. Saunter, pray you to persuade "Mrs. M." that her son did not learn his Latin among us. I am sure, that the nature of our whole conversation was totally unknown at Rome. We have gained but little indeed, if eighteen centuries have not given to us new terms, and new ideas; and, although the son of Mrs. M. may tell his mother "non decet te rixari," I appeal to the candour of the ladies, whether this expression could have been learned at a male club, or whether it could ever be properly applied but at home. Mrs. M. may have reason to believe that "heu! ignave mentes" was called forth at the "Tuesday club," and I shall not contradict her, but it was certainly indecorous in her son to apply it at home. If he had heard of another maxim, he would certainly have been silent.... "Veritas non est omnibus horis loquendum."

I pray you now, Mr. Saunter, to tender to Mrs. M. the homage of my high consideration; to tell her, that I lament that the wise, but uncommon, mode of her son's education failed of its object; that, if it be possible to persuade him to associate with the ladies entirely, after his initiation in the "Tuesday club," it shall be done. Tell her, I pray you, that her laudable thirst for information ought, in my opinion, to be gratified, and that my exertions shall be used for that purpose. Tell her also, that I shall attempt to persuade my associates (what I fear will be impossible to convince them) that their evenings should be devoted to the ladies, in order that their manners may be polished, and their minds strengthened. These things shall be attempted, without fee or reward; and, in return, we will not ask, or even wish, to be admitted at the meetings of the "Philadelphia Female Association."

Germans....Hollanders, &c.

I NOW turn to the Germans, as the least numerous among the principal classes of Europeans, who peopled America. These Germans were from the most unenlightened and oppressed provinces of the German empire. In their country, the Palatinate, Hesse, and other parts bordering upon the Rhine, they belonged to the poorest class of the common people, for the prospering peasant never emigrates from Germany nor any other European country. Though among these people there was much vicious rabble, they distinguished themselves greatly by their industry above their Irish fellow-colonists, and the exports of the middle colonies might have remained, but for these wheat-producing German machines, very trifling. The only sentiment of these uneducated people was self-interest, which, always connected with frugality, their descendants inherited, excepting when they were infected by the luxury of the other colonists, or corrupted by the licentiousness of the Irish rabble. In the last case they exhibit to the eye of the European observer, astonished at such incongruities, the lamentable and disgusting spectacle of a lewd and vicious barbarian; in the former, the ridiculous one of a man rapidly risen from nothing, whose coarse outside and awkward behaviour laughably contrasts with the elegance that surrounds him. The Hollanders, Swedes, French, and others, have been too few in number to deserve a place among the principal classes of ancestors of the Americans. I say nothing of the emigrations since the revolution, because they are too recent to have given national ancestors to the Americans, of whom I am now speaking. Since that period, a very different class of men have begun to emigrate thither, and I shall speak of them hereafter in the proper place. It is however certain, that the emigrations, which gave existence to the American people, consisted of the dregs of several European nations, and consequently that no high degree of virtue and political heroism can be expected from their descendants, unless they, by the force of circumstances, have been born again and ennobled; and even if it were not allowable to call these emigrants an abominable medley. Nor do I deny, that many virtuous and respectable families likewise emigrated to America; but as they constituted only a very feeble minority, such exceptions can by no means affect the accuracy of a general result. We shall now examine whether circumstances have occurred calculated to operate a new birth upon the character of the people.

CHAP. V.

The organisation of the Country gave rise to a trading influence. Its pernicious operation upon the morals.

"IF you inhabit," says Rousseau, in the Contrat Social, "an extensive sea coast, intersected by bays and harbours, cover the ocean with your ships, and your existence will be splendid, but short." Upon such a coast were those emigrants, of whom I have just spoken, cast. What a temptation to trade by sea! especially as the soil, upon which they had to labour, was, on account of its bad quality, ill fitted for agriculture. As the bad grounds in the southern colonies were found competent to produce rice, indigo, and tobacco, the exportation of these valuable articles gave nourishment to this commerce. The hilly regions of the middle, and in part of the northern colonies, were soon wrested from the Indians, and cultivated; they gave good harvests of wheat and other grain, which, from the proximity of the West India colonies in America, which consumed without producing these articles, of course became excellent objects of export trade. But the imports, as the colonists could not possibly themselves raise the European goods, which they wanted, and the mother country carefully prevented their attempting what would have been diametrically opposite to her object in settling the colonies, of course far exceeded the exports, and principally gave life to this trade, necessarily making the planters, who were always forced to sell beforehand their harvests, the slaves of the merchant. Hence arose the predominancy of the trading interest, which has continued to this day. A general spirit of trade spread itself throughout the country, and the planters were rather sellers of raw produce than farmers. Consider how largely the organization of the country contributed to produce this mercantile spirit. For as the English colonies properly formed only a long, and proportionably small valley, between the Apalachian mountains and the ocean, while the French possessed all the lands west of the Alleghany mountains, the settlers were obliged to stretch themselves along the coast, and of course to remain always in the vortex of the commercial interest, especially as several navigable rivers facilitated the communication with the sea.

An opposite effect would have been produced if the country had extended far in land, and had possessed a fruitful soil; if it had been watered only by a single large river, the rapidity of which should have rendered the navigation inward extremely difficult, and have presented to the European settlers a small coast. Such is the nature of the country on the Mississippi, and hence the first agricultural and manufacturing states will arise there, and by the peopling of those extensive regions the commercial interest must, in case the Atlantic and western states should remain united, cease to predominate, and yield to the farming and manufacturing influence that pre-eminence, which is so conformable to the public welfare.

Every circumstance contributed, however, to invite the English colonies to speculative commerce. On the one hand, the sea gave occasion to exportations and importations, and, on the other, the Indians, from whom, as inexperienced men of nature, it was very easy to filch large tracts of land, dwelt to the westward. It may be maintained, that the colonists floating thus between Scylla and Charybdis, could hardly withstand such strong temptations to grow suddenly rich, and that their virtue necessarily went to wreck upon one of these two rocks.

Export and import trade should always rest upon the basis not only of agriculture, that is the raising of raw produce, but of manufactures, or the working up of this raw produce. In the opposite case, an order of things arises, which, as the mean proportion, or manufacture, is wanting, can furnish no solid foundation for commerce. A people without manufactures and with luxury, must always take from foreigners more than they can give in return. Hence their merchants, as debtors, are always dependent upon foreigners, and the people always dependent upon their merchants. This must, of course, make these last masters of the legislative and administrative authorities? They are however themselves compelled to prefer the interest of that nation, to which most of their creditors belong, to that of their own country, or to break off at once all connection, and thus put an end to their own commercial existence. In this situation of things, can the laws of the country be adapted to the general welfare? will not this external commerce, by inflaming the desire for superfluities, give to sensuality a preponderance, pernicious to the morals, over the rational faculties? and will not, of course, covetousness be the ruling passion of such a people? will it not be morally degraded by envy, and the whole train of selfish passions, to which the fear of concurrence necessarily connected with trade gives birth? In agriculture alone the advantage of the farmer is not injured by concurrence, but, on the contrary, prospers in the same proportion with it. It is a warning of Providence to point out the employment the most beneficial to individuals, and, of course, to states*.

Such a country was therefore not calculated to enoble the European colonists. It remains now to be examined, whether history teaches that they really were ennobled, or proves their character to be the genuine production of their origin and of their country.

CHAP. VI.

Characteristic historical Sketch.

I SHALL not at all concern myself with the insignificant history of the English colonies, until their separation from the mother country, though the progress of mechanical labours, in certain respects, would be very interesting. But the character of the colonists, considered as a nation, is unfolded only by the events of the revolution, and the annals of the United States until this time. The obscure period when these colonies originated (I call it obscure, not because it is unknown, but because its events, being unimportant, have little interest for us) exhibits the European emigrants too much occupied with the labours necessary for the sustenance of mere animal life; their minds were too much shackled by the acquisition of absolute necessities, interesting only to themselves, to unfold their moral nature in such a mere animal mode of life. Hence arose an ungenue simplicity, a compulsive absence of luxury, which deceived the author of the Cultivateur Americain, who saw the end of this period. I call it an ungenue simplicity, because, like counterfeit precious stones, they had only the external appearance of this property, and not its substance grounded in the mind, as the innocence of children is barely external, and real innocence, the fruit of wisdom, attendant upon age.

* This is likewise confirmed by the consideration, that a numerous family of children is wealth to a labouring freeholder, though an unfavourable circumstance to the welfare of a man in any other class of society.

Yet even this early period, this infancy of the colonies, is sullied with unheard of cruelties, and shameful deceptions practised upon the Indians. I will only mention the murder of so many Indians by a pack of banditti, calling themselves Paxton boys in the court-house of Lancaster, where these wild men, as they are called, fled for refuge from the tame ones, bent upon murdering them, and where they were most unhumanly butchered, in the very sanctuary of justice. So that even this kind of animal harmlessness vanished at once, whenever the gross interests of the colonists appeared to require it should be set aside. But no sooner had the colonists become sufficiently numerous to be called a people, than their character unfolded itself by their breaking away from the mother country. I am very far from disapproving this salutary revolution; it will be seen hereafter how much I am persuaded of its necessity, and how favourable to humanity its consequences appear to be; but its first motive was self-interest. The British parliament undertook to tax: and thus attacked the colonists in their tenderest part. Had the parliament prescribed to them moral laws, they would have been content to take them, for their idea of representation extended only to the right of being taxed by their representatives alone; an idea imported from England, where it is held to constitute almost exclusively political liberty. The parliament passed indeed a declaratory act, asserting a right to bind the Americans in all cases whatsoever, which rendered resistance necessary. But the troubles existed already, before this law was made, and while the only controversy was about taxation. The foundation of the disturbances was however deeper laid than in the contested right of taxation: but still in self-interest, and of a commercial nature. For England restrained the trade of her colonies, whose trade of exports and imports was carried on by the intervention of Englishmen. The merchants of the colonies could not carry their produce immediately to foreign countries, whose productions in return they were likewise obliged to purchase in England. The prospect of an unlimited freedom of trade, as the necessary consequence of a separation from the mother country, must have irresistible charms for people, whose eagerness for gain is unbounded. The measures of the British parliament furnished them with an excellent pretext to bring about a change, which they so much desired; and thus was this celebrated revolution of liberty, little more, in its embryo, than a commercial speculation of rapacious traders, whose influence in their country was predominant.

On the other hand, it is difficult to believe that the measures of the British ministry had no other object in view than to draw money from a country, which possessed little of it. It seems as if the ministers hoped that in case the American colonists should resist, their country would be very easy to conquer; and we shall soon see that this hope was very well founded. After this conquest, they would have deprived those adjudged rebels of all their laws, which they had carried with them from England, and would have set the example in America of that despotism, which they meant afterwards to introduce into England, and which, in our days, another minister has introduced there. This subjection of America would furthermore have increased their power to an irresistible degree, by the numerous distributions of lands and offices, which it would have occasioned. Thus, abominable as the motives, which men in power assign for their conduct, appear, their concealed intentions are commonly still more detestable.

The conduct of the American people during the revolutionary war, will be the principal test of their character, and this will be found accurately delineated in the official letters of general Washington; a document, of which the subtlest law-quibbler cannot deny the competency. The facts contained in these remarkable letters shall be the polar star of my inquiries.

CHAP. VII.

Continuation of the characteristic historical sketch.

AT the breaking out of the war, in the year 1776, it was very easy to collect a considerable number of armed men; for they thought it would be easy to drive away the English from the country, that is, from Boston, and that would put an end to the whole business. The general sentiment was, "Let us drive away these Englishmen, who come to demand taxes." The New-England militia too behaved with great bravery before Boston. But this transient energy was very soon evaporated; for as the winter season drew near, no one would serve any longer, and general Washington found himself in the unexampled embarrassment, of having to levy a new army, at two paces distant from the enemy, and he could scarcely, with inexpressible pains, prevent his own troops from deserting him altogether. The English had the complaisance to suffer this before their eyes, without attacking him, though they might at one stroke have destroyed the whole military power of the Americans. They had even the complaisance to leave Boston, which shews in no advantageous point of view the military sagacity of that nation. The Americans were totally destitute of powder, arms, and all the necessities of war. At the beginning of the war, this was in some measure excusable, but these same articles, and magazines, were equally wanting the next year, which is by no means to the honour of a government and people, who would fain have worked out their liberty without making any sacrifices. In the same next year, considerable numbers of the militia were again prevailed upon, by the promise of large pay, to devote themselves for a short time to the service of their threatened country: but after being everywhere beaten near New York, as soon as it began to be cold they immediately returned to their homes. They came without arms, though they had muskets at home. Half the troops of the army were unarmed; yet it was necessary to furnish arms to these militia men. There was a want of powder; yet it was necessary to supply the militia with some of the little there was; and when the time of service of these patriots had expired, they carried home with them to shoot squirrels this powder, and these muskets, which belonged to their deeply distressed country. It was thus that the North American soldiers of liberty behaved.

General Washington thought he could defend with only a land force, New York, against a force both by sea and land, which, on the part of so well informed a commander, is scarcely credible. He would infallibly, with all his militia, have been made prisoner in New York, had the English general with more activity made himself master of the post of Kingsbridge. General Lee, who, from enthusiasm for the American cause, had abandoned the prospect of splendid advancement, and an income of 1000*l.* sterling in England, arrived just in time to make general Washington see the danger of his situation, and to draw the troops away from New York island. This general Lee rendered other services to the Americans; but he must have starved with hunger, or begged his bread without obtaining it, as he says in his Memoirs, if a certain Mr. Morris had not assisted him. That he had caballed against general Washington, to deprive him of the chief command, was an offence against general Washington, which your men in power, who love the possession of authority, never forgive; but it was no offence against the state, which he believed himself able to serve better than general Washington; a question, which still remains undetermined. Besides, a rotation in the supreme command followed of course from his republican principles. His offence at the skirmish of Monmouth is yet very problematical; at least he justifies it, as it seems, completely in his letters, and it is indeed astonishing how it could give occasion to a court-martial, and yet more wonderful how this court-martial decided. That the congress ratified the sentence is less surprizing; for this congress, which bore little resemblance to a Roman senate, consisted of the humble servants of general Washington. It is therefore ascertained that general Lee, happily for himself, died early enough to escape indigence, but late enough to exhibit the ingratitude of the Americans in an odious light. I hold it indeed for certain, that all intelligent military men, who read his justification, contained in the Memoirs of General Lee, will be of opinion, that his conduct at the distant cannonade and light skirmish of Monmouth, which all the Americans call a battle, was not only free from faults, but altogether worthy of an able general, well endowed with the talent of the military coup d'ail.

I return to the campaign of 1776. General Washington, notwithstanding all the representations of general Lee, could not prevail upon himself to abandon Fort Washington, situated upon New-York island. The Hessians took this fort by storm, and made two thousand prisoners; besides a great deal of artillery and warlike stores. This shews what would have been general Washington's fate, had not his guardian angel Lee persuaded him to withdraw from New-York. Indecision, with such a mass of information as general Washington possesses, can only proceed from a disagreement between the light of the understanding and the energy of the will, or from a clearer perception of the disadvantages of every resolution, than of its advantages.

It was contrary to all military evidence that general Washington believed he could maintain himself in New-York, and even upon Long-Island. Of the detachment upon Long-Island he lost 3000 men; the rest ran away. It must be imputed to the English generals as a fault, not to have taken them all. It was believed that the members of congress with the army, being ignorant of military affairs, were the causes of the resolution to defend New-York. But from the official letters of general Washington, now published, it appears to have been his own idea.

In the retreat from New-York to beyond the Delaware, the whole American army, excepting about three thousand men, dispersed themselves. These three thousand men deserved, like the three hundred Spartans, statues to their honour, while the shameful dereliction of their standards at the moment of the greatest danger, brands the American people with shame. The surprise of Trenton was for the Americans, what the Thermopylae were to Greece. This surprise is one of the most skilful and boldest enterprizes of our century. It is, however, surpassed by the undertaking at Princeton, and both events are sufficient to raise a general to the temple of immortality; especially when, as in this case, he is contending for the welfare of his country. General Washington confesses himself, that the war would have been at an end, if he had had only six hundred men fit for action, to march with him to Brunswick, where the magazine and warlike chest of the English army lay, without a guard. But his men were too much exhausted; and besides, adds he, in his letter, which marks his excessively cautious character, always finding obstacles, the success would have been uncertain. What a coldness of character must that be, which can resist the temptation to destroy an army of nearly thirty thousand men, with a couple of thousand, by a march of a few miles, and a blow, which could not fail! The destruction of the English army was inevitable; for they would have been hemmed in upon the sea-coast, destitute of every necessary, in the barrenest part of New-Jersey, and must either have laid down their arms, or taken to their ships! What an immortal glory would not general Washington have acquired!.... Was it really impossible to prevail upon his troops, by holding up before them such a splendid prospect, to march a few miles further? Did general Washington not remember Cæsar's maxim, that "nothing is done while ought remains to do"? Or were his troops utterly incapable of proceeding two steps further? A supposition not easily to be imagined.

(To be continued.)

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AFTER finishing a long scientific octavo, one must be sometimes less surprized by the gin-horse assiduity of the author, than plagued by his fantastic ingenuity, in contriving the ramifications of his subject. I devoutly hope, however, that such may not be deemed the ingenuity of a gentleman, who was a passionate architect of systems, an imitator of Sterne, and has left me a specimen of his passion and imitation, in the two hundred and seventieth page of a manuscript on courting. I am the more solicitous on this head, because I shall keep back every other page of this excellent and rare treatise, in which many descriptions of people are interested, unless the following passage gain high and continued laud, for its philosophy, its truth, and its Latin, all of which are humbly submitted by

MOLLIS.

"I give you my word, madam, there is nothing, in the whole vocabulary of ventriloquism, half so expressive as a sigh. Now, it has always been my way of thinking, that a man might look any thing out of his eyes, and a woman too, saving your ladyship, without the least counsel of the heart. All above the thorax has so little commerce with the arteries and veins, that lead in and out of that great repository of feeling, that, nine times out of ten, they play you false: nay, it is the province of education to strike out the residue, and to deny honesty even its solitary tythe. I wouldn't, by the golden thigh of Pythagoras, I wouldn't believe you the sooner, because you look'd and talk'd fair, than I would.....no matter what. But, when a man swears that he loves you, and brings a deep, long-drawn sigh for his voucher, I defy Pyrrho, and Berkley, and the whole court of king's bench, with

Lloyd, lord Kenyon, at its head, to say it is not evidence. It stands to reason, madam, and has, ever since Abelard lost his Eloisa, which, according to the best chronologies, was about the year 1142. "And pray what has Abelard to do with the subject?" I could have sworn you would have asked the question. Nothing, madam, upon my honour, more than you or I have.

"Your ladyship will please to observe, that a sigh may be considered historically or geographically, physically or technically; any way, in fact, but politically. A political sigh is nothing more than a grunt; I could tell it as far as I could hear it. In the third chapter of Genesis, it is demonstrated historically, if it be not an interpolation, which God forbid, that Adam was the very first sigher; and, in geography and physics, we might speak of the island of Chios, of a high and dry soil, that sublimates the affections, and opens all the avenues for their expression. But technicallyoh! what a feast for Linnæus or; technically, there is the sigh of Love, the sigh of Hope, the sigh of Despair, the sigh of Regret, of Remorse, and lastly of a full stomach, as you may find in Dr. Willich's Lectures on Diet and Regimen, passim.

"Now, madam, I hold that the sigh of Love, not being the sigh of Despair, is the gentlest, sweetest, easiest sigh, that a christian can expectorate. I answer not for a mahometan, whose love is quotidian; nor for a Jew, whose love is mercenary; nor for an Indian, who, according to the best authorities, has no love at all; but, for the christian sigh, I call the eighth Harry to witness, that there is nothing so heart-easing to the lover, nor any thing in the argumentum ad faminam that so completely shuts up the valve of controversy. The traits of this sigh, sir, are remarkable,.....Caput proclinationum, oculi firmiter intenti, distensio pulmonum et contractio foveolis, miraque titillatio præcordiorum..... 'Tis as plain, in fact, as Diego's nose.

"The sigh of Hope. Oh! how well do I know its characters! When I have wiped away the cold death-drops that chased each other down the forehead of my friend; when I have composed the features of his cherished face, distorted by the last agony; when I have turned to his desolate little flock, clinging in mute terror round their mother Almighty Father! with what a full suspiration have I ejaculated, "We shall meet again!"

"The sigh of Despair, madam, is of no particular character; and, with all my skill, I have been very grossly cheated in it. It is but two nights since, as I am told, that I saw it slipping out between the labials of a young swain, who, from his emotions, I concluded had only taken his coffee too hot; and I could be sworn that the despair of that tall statesman, who has looked to preferment for the last lustre, is deemed, by half the company, nothing deeper than a touch of the cholice. The general description of it might be "Frons corrugata, oculorumque sclerotica denudata, os apertum, amplificationis thoracis cordisque palpitatio convellens." But of this, may it please your worships, I am not well convinced.

"The sigh of Regret is a pitiful little thing, that most commonly debarks against the fan of a faded coquette, and is not of course, easily analyzed.

"But worse than plague, pestilence, or famine, battle, murder, or sudden death, is the sigh of Remorse. It twists the whole pulmonary chest, ma'am, to so villainous a degree, that my father has often said, that he knew nobody, who could bear it, but Powell the fire-eater. It is as legible too as the hand writing on the wall. Your ladyship saw it. I wish the congregated hosts of earth had seen it struggling in that wretch, who could plant a prostitute in the seat of his wife, and throw her, with her helpless orphans, to the street.

"The last sigh, as an author, I have not had much opportunity to study; but, for its genius, I can recommend the curious to the superintendants of any poor-house in the country. I believe it to be, however, suspiratio crebra, per dentes oclusos, omnivoresque ejecta, vino ferinaque penitus saturata."

[The Editor omits no pains, or eagerness of research, to obtain whatever is rare and precious from the cabinet of Genius; and he is more especially curious to preserve, in his Port Folio, those works of the great masters, which are correct in their design, as well as brilliant in their colours. Whatever has been executed by EDMUND BURKE is of this description; and, in the following letter, the reader will discern both the true and the beautiful.]

AN ORIGINAL LETTER

FROM EDMUND BURKE TO MR. RIVAROL.

Not published in any edition of his works.

SIR,

I AM much obliged to you for your very polite and flattering attention to me, and to the piece, which you are pleased to regard with so much indulgence. It is an endeavour very well intended; but, I am conscious, very inadequate to the great interests of this kingdom and of mankind, which it proposes to assert.

I have seen, though too late to profit of them, your brother's admirable Annals, which may rank with those of Tacitus. There is, indeed, a strong coincidence in our way of thinking. I ought to be very proud of that circumstance. If I had seen his performance before I had written on the same subject, I should rather have chosen to enrich my pamphlet with quotations from thence, than have ventured to express the thoughts, in which we agreed, in worse words of my own.

I thank you too for the elegant poems, which you have done me the honour to transmit to me with your letter. So far as I am capable of forming any judgment upon French poetry, the verses are spirited and well-turned; and the author possesses the art of interesting the passions, which is the triumph of that kind of eloquence.

I wish, without disguising my real sentiments, I could go as far in my approbation of the general tendency of one of these pieces, and of the policy of such publications at such a time as this. Forgive me, sir, if I take the liberty of suggesting to your superior judgment, as well as to that of the emperor's advisers, that it is not very easy to suppress (by the methods lately used) what you call "the monkish fury," without exciting fury of another kind; a sort of fury, which will, perhaps, be found more untractable than the other, and which may be carried to much greater lengths. In such a dilemma, it would not misbecome a great statesman seriously to consider, which (of these furies) he has it in charge to support, and which is more fatal to the country, which it is his duty to preserve in peace and prosperity. That fury, which arises in the minds of men on being stripped of their goods, and turned out of their houses by acts of power, and our sympathy with them under such wrongs, are feelings implanted in us by our Creator to be (under the direction of his laws) the means of our preservation. Such fury and such sympathy are things very different from men's imaginary political systems concerning governments. They arise out of instinctive principles of self-defence, and are executive powers under the legislation of nature, enforcing its first law. This principle princes and commonwealths (whatever they may think their rights), cannot always attack with perfect impunity.

If princes will, in cold blood, and from mistaken ideas of policy, excite the passions of the multitude against particular descriptions of men, whether they be priests or nobility, in order to avail themselves of the assistance of that multitude in their enterprizes against these classes, let them recollect, that they call in the aid of an ally more dangerous to themselves, than to those, whom they are desirous of oppressing.

The Netherlands have been but newly recovered to the emperor. He owes that recovery to a concurrence of very extraordinary circumstances; and he has made great sacrifices to his object. Is it really his interest to have it understood, that he means to repeat the very proceedings, which have excited all the late troubles in his territories? Can it be true that he means to draw up the very same flood gates, which have let loose the deluge that has overwhelmed the great monarchy in his neighbourhood? Does he think, if he means to encourage the spirit, which prevails in France, that it will be exerted in his favour, or to answer his purposes? Whilst he is destroying prejudices, which, under good management, may become the surest support of his government; is he not afraid that the discussion may go farther than he wishes? If he excites men to enquire too scrupulously, into the foundation of all old opinion, may he not have reason to apprehend, that several will see as little use in monarchs as in monks? The question is not, whether they will argue logically or not, but whether the turn of mind, which leads to such discussion, may not become as fatal to the former as to the latter. He may trust in the fine army he has assembled; but fine armies have been seduced from their allegiance, and the seducers are not far from him. He may fortify his frontier; but fortresses have been betrayed by their garrisons, and garrisons overpowered by the burghers. Those of the democratic faction in the Netherlands have always an armed ally more conveniently situated to assist them, than the emperor is conveniently situated to assist himself. Would not prudence rather dictate to that great sovereign, the surest mode of fortification; would not prudence direct him, I say, to fortify himself in the hearts of his people, by repairing, rather than by destroying, those dykes and barriers, which prejudice might raise in his favour, and which cost nothing to his treasury, either in the construction or the reparation.

It were better to forget, once for all, the Encyclopædia, and the whole body of the economists, and to resort to those old rules and principles, which have hitherto made princes great, and nations happy. Let not a prince, circumstanced like him, weakly fall in love either with monks or nobles; still less let him violently hate them. In his Netherlands he possesses the most populous, the best cultivated, and the most flourishing country in Europe; a country, from which, at this day, and even in England, we are to learn the perfect practice of the best of arts, that of agriculture. If he has a people like the Flemings, industrious, frugal, easy, and obedient, what is it to him, whether they are fond of monks, or love ringing of bells, and lighting of candles, or not? A wise prince, as I hope the emperor is, will study the genius of his people. He will indulge them in their humours; he will preserve them in their privileges; he will act upon the circumstances of his states as he finds them; and whilst thus acting upon the practical principles of a practical policy, he is the happy prince of an happy people. He will not care what the Condorcets and the Raynals, and the whole flight of the magpies and jays of philosophy may fancy and chatter concerning his conduct or his character.

Well it is for the Emperor, that the late rebellion of the Netherlands was a rebellion against innovation. When, therefore, he returned to the possession of his estates, an event, which no man wished more sincerely than I did, he found none of the ancient landmarks removed. He found every thing except the natural effects of a transient storm, exactly as it was on the day of the revolt. Would the king of France, supposing his restoration probable, find his kingdom in the same condition? Oh! no, sir. Many long, long labours would be required to restore that country to any sort of good order. Why? because their rebellion is the direct contrary to that of Flanders. It is a revolt of innovation, and thereby the very elements of society have been confounded and dissipated. Small politicians will certainly recommend to him to nourish a democratic party, in order to curb the aristocratic and the clerical. In general, all policy founded on discord, is perilous to the prince and fatal to the country. The support of the permanent orders in their places, and the reconciling them all to his government, will be his best security, either for governing quietly in his own person, or for leaving any sure succession to his posterity. Corporations, which have a perpetual succession, and hereditary nobles, who themselves exist by succession, are the true guardians of monarchical succession. On such orders and institutions alone, an hereditary monarchy can stand. What they call the democratic royale in France, is laughed at by the very authors, as an absurd chimera. Where all things else are elective, you may call a king hereditary; but he is, for the present only a cypher; and the succession is not supported by any analogy in the state, nor combined with any sentiment whatsoever, existing in the minds of the people. It is a solitary, unsupported, anomalous king.

The story you tell of the Chartreux, in the time of Charles V may be true for any thing I know to the contrary. But what inference can be drawn from it? Why should it be necessary to influence the people, at such a time as this, to rob the Chartreux, who had no hand in that murder? Were the Chartreux, that I have seen at Paris, employed in committing or meditating murders? Are they so at Latrappe, or at the grande Chartreuse, or any where else? Inferences will be made from such a story. I don't mean logical, but practical inferences, which will harden the hearts of men, in this age of spoil, not only against them, but against a considerable portion of the human race. Some of these monks, in a sudden transport of fury, murdered somebody in the time of Charles V. What then? I am certain that, not in the time of Charles V, but now, and at all times, and in all countries, and in the bosom of the dearest relations of life, the most dreadful tragedies have been, and are daily acted. Is it right to bring forth these examples, to make us abhor those relations?

You observe, that a sequestration from the connexions of society makes the heart cold and unfeeling, I believe it may have that tendency.... though this is more than I find to be the fact, from the result of my own observations and inquiries; but, to the theory, it seems probable: however, as the greatest crimes do not arise so much from a want of feeling for others, as from an over sensibility for ourselves, and an over indulgence to our own desires, very sequestered people (such as the Chartreux), as they are less touched with the sympathies which soften the manners, are less engaged in the passions which agitate the mind. The best virtues can hardly be found among them, but crimes must be more rare in that form of society, than in the active world. If I were to trust to my own observation, and give a verdict on it, I must depose, that, in my experience, I have found that those, who were most indulgent to themselves, were (in the mass) less kind to others, than those, who have lived a life nearer to self-denial. I go further. In my experience, I have observed, that a luxurious softness of manners hardens the heart, at least as much as an overdone abstinence. I question much, whether moral policy will justify us in an endeavour to interest the heart in favour of immoral, irregular, and illegal actions, on account of particular touching circumstances, that may happen to attend the commission or the punishment of them. I know poets are apt enough to choose such subjects, in order to excite the high relish arising from the mixed sensations which will arise in that anxious embarrassment of the mind, whenever it finds itself in a locality, where vices and virtue meet near their confines....where

Mire sagaces falleret hospites
Discrimen obscurum.....

I think, of late, that the Parisian philosophers have done, upon a meditated system, what the poets are naturally led to, by a desiring of flattering the passions. To you, as a poet, this is to be allowed. To philosophers, one cannot be so indulgent; for, perhaps, ladies ought not "to love too well," like the Phedras and Myrthas of old, or the ancient or modern Eloises. They had better not pursue their lovers into convents of Carthusians, nor follow them in disguise to camps and slaughter-houses. But I have observed, that the philosophers, in order to insinuate their polluted atheism into young minds, have systematically flattered all their passions, natural and unnatural. They explode, or render odious, or contemptible, that class of virtues, which restrain the appetite. These are, at least, nine out of ten of the virtues. In the place of all these, they substitute a virtue, which they call humanity or benevolence. By this means, their morality has no idea in it of restraint, or indeed of a distinct, settled principle, of any kind. When their disciples are thus left free, and guided only by present feeling, they are no longer to be depended on for good or evil. The men who, to-day, snatch the worst criminals from justice, will surrender the most innocent persons to-morrow.

I assure you, sir, that this letter has been written six weeks ago, given to be copied, and I really thought sent to you. Looking on my papers, I found my memory had betrayed me, and that you have an apparent reason to complain of my neglect. You have, in the late events, done yourself great honour, as I hear. Do not be discouraged. The value of such services will, one day, be known and acknowledged. I have the honour to be, with most sincere respect,

Your most obedient and humble servant,

EDMUND BURKE.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. WILLIAM WINDHAM.

(CONCLUDED.)

A GREAT event....no less than that of the French revolution....contributed not a little, about this period, to make an entire change in the politics of the nation. But no body of men experienced a greater shock than the opposition. They had been lessened indeed, by a few occasional desertions; but the crisis alluded to thinned their ranks, dispelled their consequence, and spread terror and dismay among their adherents.

So early as 1790, Mr. Burke had declared, "that his honourable friend (Mr. Fox) and he were separated in politics forever." He even withdrew his name from the "Whig Club;" and, after exclaiming, "I quit the camp! I quit the camp!" passed over to the enemy! This gentleman became the precursor of many others, not a few of whom, it is to be hoped, were actuated by honourable motives, and not attracted by the wealth, the splendour, the titles and the power, which were now within their grasp.

Mr. Windham did not declare himself so early as Mr. Burke; he however evinced a marked hostility to Mr. Grey's efforts for a reform, in 1792, and made a solemn declaration, "that whenever, and in whatever shape, the motion for a parliamentary reform was brought forward, he must oppose it." He, at the same time, said, "he would unite with those, who were determined to set their faces against every endeavour to subvert the true principles of the constitution;" he however explained, "that he did not mean to make any improper allusion to the motives of his honourable friends."

On the motion for an address on his majesty's speech, at the commencement of the session of 1792, the subject of these memoirs observed, "that, strange as it might appear, he should vote this night with them, whose measures he had uniformly and conscientiously reprobated, in opposition to those, whose political sentiments, on almost every other occasion, were in unison with his own." He then added, "there was a well founded alarm gone abroad, not, as has been alleged, from the conduct of the officers of government, but from those, who were sworn enemies of all government. The whole was a well arranged plan for overturning the British constitution; and, with regard to the combined armies that marched towards the capital of France, he believed their motives were "good," and therefore he wished them success, and so he should, "had their motives been ever so bad; that, which they opposed, was worse than any consequence that could have resulted from their success."

It may now be fairly assumed, that Mr. Windham had chosen his side in this grand contest; and it must be allowed, that he spoke out, and, by so doing, acted far more honourably than many of his new friends. Accordingly, in June, 1793, when Mr. Fox made a motion respecting the war, the purport of which was, to present an humble address to his majesty, "to restore the blessings of peace," Mr. W. remarked, that he had yet to learn any rule, by which a country was to be called upon, at the beginning of a war, to state definitively, what are the precise objects of that war, or what the precise situation in which it ought to desist from it. He observed, with great nicety of distinction, that there had been a disavowal of any intention, on our part, to interfere, for the purpose of establishing in France any particular form of government; but he, at the same time, conceived it to have been the avowed purpose of the contest, to bring about the establishment of such a government in that country, as we might safely treat with; and we were "to prosecute the war, until we could make peace with safety."

It is to be remarked, however, with regret, that, in proportion as the scene thickened, his enmity against his ancient friends became greater; we accordingly find that, in a debate, or rather conversation about the *voluntary subscriptions, which were considered as unconstitutional by the members of opposition, he professed to dread "the proffered services of those late coming, and self-called champions, who now come forward in defence of that constitution, which they have attempted to deliver over without remorse, to the savage knife of every audacious reformer." He, at the same time, added, "that their conduct was at least equivocal, and that their past actions gave no weight to their present professions."

When the session of 1794 was opened, by a speech from the throne, an amendment was moved by the opposition, and a respectable, if not a numerous minority, voted against the continuance of the war. It now began to be perceived, that, in the contest with France, little was to be expected, and that the golden hopes of conquest, entertained both by ourselves and allies, must end in disappointment. The new secretary at war, however, saw things in a different point of view. He heard, with surprise and grief, the arguments in support of the amendment.

* March 28, 1794. It is to be observed, that, on this and all other occasions, the speeches are either extracted or copied from the published debates.

"What was their obvious tendency? Submission, humiliation, degradation, before an inveterate and insolent enemy! The war, it is true, had been unsuccessful, but it had been so only compared with the wishes, the hopes, and the force of the confederacy. All that could be said with truth was, that the war, hitherto, had only been a negative success.

"..... A right honourable gentleman, in a book, which he would advise all, who heard him, once more to read, had predicted the evils that must necessarily ensue from the doctrines of liberty, equality, and the rights of man. It was his fate not to be believed at the time, and afterwards to be found completely right. Thence came the opinions of those, who, having favoured the French revolution at its commencement, could not, so soon as others, detach their affections from a system, that led to massacre and ruin. The imaginations of the people at large, as he and those, with whom he had now the happiness to act, contended, were still amused by a numerous and active party, infected to the bone with French principles, and intent on the subversion of the British constitution. Societies, formed by this party, had propagated doctrines, the most hostile to the interests of this country. But it was said, the members of these societies had been acquitted by the verdict of a jury; and gentlemen talked of their innocence, in a tone of exultation. He wished them joy of the innocence of an acquitted felon!

"He maintained, that our interference in the internal affairs of France was wise and just. The advantages of war or peace were not to be estimated by the territory or the trade we might gain or lose. No nation could say, 'Let us be disgraced, provided we grow rich.' Peace was not more likely to be obtained for our asking for it. If it were, what would then be the situation of the country? A situation so awful, that he durst hardly contemplate it. The intercourse between the two countries must then be opened; the French would pour in their emissaries; and all the English, infected with French principles, whom we had now the means of excluding, would return, to disseminate their abominable tenets among our people. A jacobinical club would be erected at every one's door, and a convention might even be established in the neighbourhood of that house. In this situation of danger then, shall we send a submissive commission to them? If the aggression of the Spaniards at Nootka Sound, a place scarce marked in our maps, called forth the threatening vengeance of this country; if our own territories are not dismembered, our resources almost untouched, and those of our unprincipled enemy absolutely exhausted, should we give up a war, in comparison of which, all former wars were as children's play, while all peace must be our ruin? The moment peace was concluded, they would go among our poor, among our labourers, among our manufacturers, and teach them the doctrine of liberty and equality. They would point out the gilded palaces of the rich, and tell them, that these ought to be plundered and demolished, for the benefit of the poor.

"Such a peace would be worse than any probable effect of war. But of the future events of war, we had no reason to despond. Exertions, greater than the country could make at any former period, were now so lightly borne, as hardly to be felt. Who could say he had felt them? Had the poor felt them, except in a few particular and local instances? What member of that house had deprived himself of any of his wonted gratifications?

"The cause for which they were fighting, it had been said, would animate the French, and render them invincible. Where had this invincible courage appeared? In what instance, in what quarter had the courage of our soldiers and seamen been inferior to theirs? Sorry he should be, if we could not do, for the best of all causes, what the French could do, in support of every thing the most flagitious. The French emigrants in our service had, in every instance, displayed a valour and perseverance, not surely to be exceeded by their infatuated countrymen, against whom they were reduced to the necessity of taking up arms.

"He dwelt on the unimpaired resources of this country, compared with the unnatural and unsound resources of France; whence he inferred, that, whatever present appearances might indicate, we must be ultimately successful in what the speech from the throne had so truly denominated the deliverance of Europe.

"It was not the character of Englishmen," he added, "to despond; they had met France single-handed in her proudest day; what then can hinder us, unimpaired, and assisted by the greatest part of Europe, to go on with the war against a nation, whose capital is with accelerating velocity wasting away, and its debt increasing to a height, which it is impossible it can bear? With such a pandemonium, is it possible for us, for a moment, to think of treating? They were bleeding to death, we were scarcely scratched."

It must be frankly confessed that Mr. W. at this period was very unpopular, and that the hatred evinced to him now led many into extremes. He was not only accused of having deserted a barren opposition, for the sake of the productive emoluments of office, but he was, at the same time, considered by some as utterly devoid of any principle. The manly manner, in which he expressed, or at least hinted, his generous sympathy towards the house of Bourbon, and the zeal, which both Mr. Burke and himself had evinced, to affix a determinate principle to the war, by a bold and unequivocal declaration on this subject, was supposed to give umbrage even to his new associates in the ministry, who preferred an undefined system of hostility, and lavished both blood and treasure without any fixed object, on which the public mind could rest. Nor were the opponents of the secretary at war content with the openings, which he sometimes afforded them, amidst the sallies of indignation, or the surmises, which they deduced from the warmth of his temper, and the violence of his zeal: they went still further, and attached sayings and maxims to his name, which he never uttered, and which, had they been suffered to remain uncontradicted, might have blackened his character with the world in general, and hurt him greatly in the opinion of his constituents.

We accordingly find that, in the debate for the suspension of the habeas corpus (a measure, to which he was of course friendly), Mr. Windham found it necessary to vindicate his character from a falsehood, everywhere circulated, purporting that he had exclaimed in the house of commons, "Perish our commerce!" On this Mr. Hardinge rose in his place, and fathered the expression. He observed that, in justice both to the right honourable gentleman and himself, he was anxious to declare, "that the sentiment alluded to, relating to the commerce and constitution of the country, had come from him, and not from Mr. Windham: nor was he ashamed now to repeat, that if the unfortunate difficulty should ever arrive, when he must sacrifice either the one or the other, he would again say, 'Perish commerce....live the constitution!'"

About this time occurred the equally famous and unfortunate expedition to Quiberon, and while it tended to damp the exertions of ministry, was supposed by some to reflect but little lustre on the discernment of those, who planned and counteracted the attempt. It was said that the emigrants had always been kept in the back ground, while there was a possibility of their acting with energy and effect; that they were now brought forward merely by way of making what, in the military phrase, is termed a diversion, that De Puisaye, who headed them, was utterly unacquainted with military affairs; and, in addition to this, was not to be trusted, having before acted a double part, and carried arms on both sides of the question, during the revolutionary disputes in his native country. Certain it is that the conduct of this chief was equivocal, and that he was preferred to better, abler, and more gallant men, such as the brave and unfortunate Sombreuil; but, on the other hand, it was never urged that this preference amounted to any thing more than an error of judgment, and every one acquainted with the subject of these memoirs will readily allow that he must have felt the unhappy fate of the slaughtered nobility, with a poignancy inferior to no man in the kingdom.

It so happened, however, that Mr. W. on this occasion, once more afforded an opening to the asperity of his enemies; for when the house sat in a committee on the *army extraordinaries, after explaining that the emigrant corps had been raised during the marches and counter-marches of the armies on the continent, and that therefore regular returns were not to be expected; he unfortunately added, "that the deficiency of men in proportion to the officers arose from this, that being formed during the heat of the campaign, no provision was made for filling up those, who were killed off!"

The same idea might surely have been expressed in a less objectionable manner; but in its present garb it appeared too gross even for those bred up to war, and fleshed in manslaughter. General Tarleton seized this opportunity to express his abhorrence of the whole transaction. He also objected to the late expeditions to the coast of France as ill-timed:

"While France was distracted by insurrections in various parts of the republic, and Toulon in the hands of this country, the expedition alone could have been plausible. The troops employed were prisoners of war taken out of confinement, and little affected to the cause. The sacrifice of such men might perhaps by some be thought even meritorious. The officers were men of honour; but the commander, Mr. Puisaye, was a person neither of experience in war, nor of a military character. The event of this expedition was equally calamitous to those engaged in it, and fatal to the reputation of this country; but in justice to the individuals, who had thus perished, from the reliance on the British nation, he could not mention without respect and compassion the dignified resignation of the bishop of Dol, and the premature fate of the gallant Sombreuil and his brave companions.... But why talk of pity to men callous to every feeling of humanity; to men, who, with all the coolness of philosophy, could talk of the emigrants killed off; who seemed to delight in blood, and glory in devastation?"

When the opposition found themselves baffled and frustrated upon all occasions by large majorities, they determined for a while to avert their attacks from the war itself, but to fasten on the means, by which the ministry were supposed to be able to carry it on. Mr. Harrison having moved, in the house of commons, on March 13, 1797, "That the extent of supplies, voted to government since the commencement of the present war, having caused so heavy an increase of taxes, it is the duty of this house to enquire whether some relief to the burdens of the people, or provision for further expence, may not be obtained by the reduction of useless places, sinecure offices, exorbitant fees, and other modes of retrenchment in the expenditure of public monies." Mr. Windham spoke against the motion, which had also been objected to by Mr. Pitt and Mr. Rose, both of whom possessed sinecures!

* Dec. 2, 1795

† It ought to be mentioned to the honour of Mr. Windham, that notwithstanding the above philippic, this very general was sent soon afterwards to Portugal, in a military capacity! It at least serves to prove, that if Mr. Windham be at times warm he is not rancorous.

He considered it as "calculated only to attract the notice of certain descriptions of persons out of doors, by raising an idle and empty clamour against sinecure places. Gentlemen ought to recollect where they were; that they were sitting as statesmen in parliament, and not haranguers at a public-house. Let them learn to suit their opinions to their situation, and not cut off all rewards. It had been said, that since Mr. Burke's retrenching regulation, a great deal of fresh patronage had been growing up. Well, what then? Is it not necessary to inquire whether there be not a better regulation of business by the increase of expense, than could be balanced by the diminution?"

"Then came in its turn before the house the subject of the calamity of this country. He agreed with gentlemen that this country was in a state of calamity, though he differed from them about the cause, and as much about the remedy. The calamity was felt; it was felt by all Europe; it was a calamity, which the pernicious doctrines prevalent in France had occasioned all over Europe, and which it became all Europe to repel, but to which the speeches of some gentlemen, who favoured this and the like motions too much contributed; the effects of which were, the enormous acquisitions and arrogant pretensions of our enemies, to be conquered by manful exertions, and not by the mean and miserable savings of the ends of candles, and the parings of bits of cheese*."

"If there was any waste in any public department, the house should meet it fairly; but they should not practise so mean and shabby a delusion on the public, as to hold up the savings of a few sinecure places as a resource to lessen the public burdens; for he verily believed that the fee-simple of all such savings would not amount to a farthing a head to all the inhabitants of London."

"If ministers had conducted the war improperly, let the house say so, and impeach them at once; but this is not the way. By attacking the property of a placeman, you attack all species of property. Let men of property be cautious how they act in giving such opinions, for there is a close connection between the clamour against public offices, and the confiscation of private property."

Few, it is apprehended, are willing to go so far in behalf of sinecure places, and Mr. W.'s best friends will perhaps differ with him on this question. Indeed the opposition papers took care to ring the changes upon it, as well as upon another expression that occurred soon after, when he asserted, "that the restoration of monarchy was wished for by the enlightened majority of the French nation, whose opinion was smothered by tyranny and oppression, and the debates of whose councils could assume no tone of freedom but under the protection of field-marshal Suwarrow."

It has already been observed that the secretary at war's conduct has been far more candid than any of his late coadjutors, and he continued to evince the same sentiments, so long as he remained in office.

There can be no doubt, therefore, that although the cabinet did not act up to the full extent of his sentiments, yet that all their active operations experienced his support. The expedition to Quiberon was supposed to have originated with him, and the invasion of Holland could not fail to obtain his unqualified assent. Indeed about that period, he spoke out more than usual; and when the bill was debating, which enabled his majesty to accept of the services of an additional number of militia, he asked

"If we could be safe while such a republic as that established in France continued to exist? It had ever been his opinion," he added, "that there was no safety for this country or for Europe, with such a power in the midst of it. If France, animated by principles, which distinguish her republican government, was suffered to retain the dominions she lately possessed, all the means of defence, which we could boast, would be imperfect for our safety. He would repeat, and state fairly, that both the reduction of France, and the total overthrow and destruction of the French government were his object, and the object of those, with whom he acted."

We have thus given a pretty regular detail of Mr. W.'s public conduct. On all occasions, in which party zeal is not called forth, he appears in a very amiable point of view; but neither as a politician nor a patriot, hath he of late years (at least according to the oppositionists) added much to his celebrity. Like a certain bishop, he has engendered a host of enemies, in consequence of the occasional irritability of his temper, and, like all men in a similar situation, each of them has at times been either mistaken or misrepresented. The right reverend father in God, after a severe rebuke from the head of the house of Bedford, explained away the odious proposition, "that the people had nothing to do with the laws but to obey them!" The right honourable ex-secretary, who represents a large manufacturing city, which has been scratched by the war, was far more successful, however, in refuting the impudent accusation about "perish our commerce!"

They are both equally detestable in the eyes of the "jacobins," who, by way of punishing their supposed ambition, earnestly wish that the former may never become the apostolic successor of Thomas à Becket, although they would have no manner of objection, perhaps, to his experiencing a similar fate; while, in respect to the latter, they hope, that after beholding a number of his countrymen "killed off" by the war, and many "acquitted felons" set at liberty by the verdict of a jury, he may remain forever in the vale of oblivion, and only be permitted to dream of the "cheese-parings" of office!

But irony apart, if Mr. W. has failings like other men, it must at the same time be allowed, that he has virtues peculiar to himself. He possesses great learning, much general knowledge, a happy choice of words, and is capable of giving a luminous classification to his arguments. In addition to this, he is warm in behalf of those, whose interest he espouses, and steady and sincere in his private friendships.

He has lived in habits of intimacy with many men of great eminence in the literary world, and his attachment to Mr. Burke, during the latter part of his life, had something filial in it. He also cultivated the regard of Dr. Johnson, consoled him in his disappointments, visited him in his illness, had his own servant constantly in attendance upon him, during the malady that terminated his life, and we have been given to understand, it was in the arms of this person, that the great lexicographer of the English language resigned his breath†!

* Sept. 26, 1799.

† As secretary at war, Mr. Windham is entitled to great praise. He was daily to be met with at a fixed hour, when every military man, or any other individual whatsoever, who had business at his office, was sure of obtaining an interview, and of experiencing the utmost attention and politeness.

The clerks in his department (more especially the inferior ones) enjoyed repeated marks of his regard, he having twice

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

IN former times, says a French journal, it was the practice in France to excommunicate moles, field-mice, and other vermin that did injury to the crops. Before they were excommunicated, they had an advocate assigned to plead their cause. There still is extant a sentence of the official of Troyes, in Champagne, dated 9th July, 1516, in proof of this singular superstition. It is as follows: "Parties being heard on the complaint of the inhabitants of Villenose, we admonish the moles to be gone within six days, and in case of their failing so to do, we declare them cursed and excommunicated."

The general in his proper place....When general Bernadotte was in the camp at Dijon, a person asked him if it was true that his health would not allow him to follow the army? "What do you call following the army?" replied the general, "I never followed the army; I always marched at the head of it!"

When the princess of Hesse D'Armstadt brought her three daughters to the empress of Russia in order that she might chuse one of them for the wife of the grand duke, the empress decided instantly in favour of the second. When her majesty was asked the reason of this sudden preference, she replied, "I observed the three princesses from my window, as they descended from their carriage. The eldest made a false step; the second stepped down in an easy and natural manner; the third leaped out." Though this was a very singular manner of forming an opinion, it so happened, that the first was awkward, and the younger too forward.

Extra Time Match....Cornet Sampson, of the 11th light dragoons, has engaged to walk ninety miles in twenty-one hours and a half, for 1000 guineas. He has fixed upon the same ground, on which Mr. Barclay performed his match, and is to walk before the 24th instant. He is a gentleman of low stature, very light made, and about 22 years of age....York Herald.

Dignum, the singer, was talking in jest of setting up his carriage, and pleasantly asked a friend for a suitable motto, which should indicate that he made his fortune by singing. His friend gave him, out of Horace,

DIGNUM laude virum
Musa vetat mori.

The change in the female dress of late must contribute very much to domestic quiet. No man can surely now complain of petticoat government!

French Anecdotes.....We extract the following from the "Nouveaux Melanges" of madame Necker.

Mons. Dufour was one of those men, who were to be found in all places. Darboulle said one day, increased their salaries during his short administration, and thus exempted them from many pecuniary difficulties resulting from the late unexampled rise of provisions.

In consequence of his official arrangements, business was transacted with greater expedition than before, and two hours saved daily: the officers and soldiers of the army have also experienced many benefits that have ensued in consequence of his regulations.

It was formerly impossible to receive any intelligence at the master-marshal-general's office, respecting the fate of a poor soldier, without a fee being extorted from his wretched relatives; this odious custom was abolished by him.

It has been lately asserted in the French papers, that Mr. Windham countenanced and even employed the assassins, who attempted the life of Bonaparte: but however violent his zeal may have been, no Englishman can ever believe him to have been capable of so base, treacherous, and immoral an action.....EDITOR.

* From the report of the commissioners of public accounts, some time after presented to the house, it appeared that one clerk in Mr. Windham's office, from these candle ends and cheese parings, had an income of eighteen thousand pounds sterling a year.

† June 7, 1799.

"I cannot tell what the d—l is become of Dufour...I have met him but three times to-day."

Count D'Argenson, the minister of Louis XV, after he had been turned out of office about an hour, wrote to Jeamel, the intendant of posts, to which place he had himself appointed him, "My dear Jeamel, if you still remember there is such a person in the world as D'Argenson," &c.

Madame De Maintenon, when at Fontainebleau, observed some carps in clear water, "Poor creatures," said she "they are very thin; but it is a dreadful thing to be taken out of one's primitive mud."

The great advantage derived from crossing the breed of cattle, has induced a similar experiment upon oysters. A gentleman has imported several of the Carlingford, and other famous Irish oysters, which he has laid down in the beds of the English natives and meltons. The produce of this Union is said to be of superior taste and flavour. This fact strongly proves the truth of Tilburina's observation in The Critic, that "an oyster may be crossed in love."

ANOTHER WALKING MATCH.

On Sunday, Marshall, a butcher, of the age of 60, undertook to walk thirty miles in six hours, for a considerable wager, and very large sums were depending. The place he chose for deciding the bet, was a mile of the road on the other side of Lea bridge. He started at seven o'clock in the morning, walking one mile in and one mile out, till he performed the task, which he did with ease in eleven minutes less than the time allowed.

GENERAL ORDERS.

Camp of Venus, May 1, 1802.

Whereas the province of Fashion, belonging to our royal denesne, being at this time invaded by our mortal enemies, the Wantons, who, having stormed the fort of Modesty, and trodden under foot the standard of Shame, have erected on its ruins the banners of Impudence....and fearing our holy temple of Chastity may be razed to the level of Lewdness, and understanding that General Nakedness has broken his neutrality, and gone over to the enemy, and that he has erected, in many parts of the country such enormous Breast-works as was never before seen....we command all our forces to parade immediately, properly armed and accoutred, with squibs, pasquinades, &c. and to cut, fell, root out, and destroy said Breast-works, and to annoy the enemy as much as possible.

Should that immodest general sound a retreat, we command our band, called the Bashfuls, to pursue him to capitulation, and that he be banished to the desert of Darkness, and be kept confined to the chamber of Matrimony.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

[The following, at once loyal, poetical, and just, is the production of an American clergyman.]

OCCASIONED BY

LORD NELSON'S VICTORY AT THE NILE.

O'ER the ocean triumphant, see Britain's flag fly,
To the nations around bearing mandates of joy:
She bids them still hope, soon their fears shall be o'er,
And the tyrants they dread shall be heard of no more.

Tho' cruelty, pride, and rebellion advance,
With the engines of hell, and the demons of France,

To Religion and Virtue, oppress'd in despair,
Her thunders proclaim their redemption is near.

At the sound, honest Loyalty raises his crest,
And Truth her broad shield braces firm to her breast;

While Liberty, grasping her spear with a smile,
Feels her fetters unlock'd, by the heroes of Nile.

O Britain! no period thy deeds shall efface, While the moon rolls her orb, or the sun holds his place;

Father Time, while his scythe sweeps o'er earth,
air, and sea,

But gathers a harvest of laurels for thee.

As he passes along, his loud accents proclaim
Thy long streaming glories, thy wisdom, and fame:
When Chaos, he cries, shall all order confound,
And Anarchy swell her dark deluge around,

Great-Britain's the ark, high o'erbraving the flood,
Bearing all that is glorious, and precious, and good;
To the light of her, Liberty, Piety, Fame,
All nations shall come to rekindle their flame.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE VARIETIES OF MELANCHOLY.

WHEN I go musing all alone,
Thinking of divers things foreknown;
When I build castles in the air,
Void of sorrow, void of care,
Pleasing myself with phantoms sweet,
The time, methinks, runs very fleet;
All my joys to this are folly,
Nought so sweet as Melancholy.

When I lie waking all alone,
Recounting all the ills I've done,
My thoughts on me then tyrannize,
Fear and sorrow me surprise.
Whether I tarry still or go,
The time, methinks, moves very slow;
All my griefs to this are jolly,
Nought so sad as Melancholy.

When to myself I talk and smile,
And time with pleasing thoughts beguile,
By brawling brook, or hedgerow green,
Unheard, unsought for, and unseen,
A thousand joys my soul possess,
And crown my heart with happiness;
All my joys besides are folly,
None so sweet as Melancholy.

When I lie, sit, or walk alone,
And sigh aloud with grievous moan,
In some dark grove or dismal den,
With discontent and fairies, then
A thousand miseries at once
My heavy heart and soul ensconce;
All my griefs to this are jolly,
None so sour as Melancholy.

Methinks I hear, methinks I see
Sweet music's wond'rous minstrelsy;
Towns, palaces, and cities fine,
Now here, now there, the world is mine.
Rare beauties, gallant ladies shine,
Whate'er is lovely or divine;
All other joys to this are folly,
None so sweet as Melancholy.

But when, methinks, I hear and see
Ghosts, goblins, fiends; my phantasy
Presents a thousand ugly shapes,
Headless bears, black men, and apes,
Doleful outcries, dreadful sights,
My sad and dismal soul affrights.
All my griefs to this are jolly,
None so DAMN'D AS MELANCHOLY.

Methinks I court, methinks I kiss,
With glowing warmth, my fair mistress.
O, blessed days! O, sweet content!
In Paradise my hours are spent.
Still may such thoughts my fancy move,
And fill my ardent soul with love;
All my joys to this are folly,
Nought so sweet as Melancholy.

But when I feel love's various frights,
Deep sighs, sad tears, and sleepless nights,
My jealous fits, my cruel fate,
I then repent, but 'tis too late.
No torment is so bad as love,
Nought bitterer to my soul can prove;
All my griefs to this are jolly,
Nought so harsh as Melancholy.

Friends and companions, get ye gone,
'Tis my desire to be alone;
Ne'er well, but when my thoughts and I
Do domineer in privacy.
No gem, no treasure like to this,
'Tis my delight, my crown, my bliss;
All my joys to this are folly,
Nought so sweet as Melancholy.

'Tis my sole plague to be alone;
I am a beast, a monster grown;
I shun all light and company,
I find them now my misery:
The scene is chang'd, my joys are gone,
Fears, discontent, and sorrows come;
All my griefs to this are jolly,
Nought so fierce as Melancholy.

I'll not change life with any king;
I ravish'd am; can the world bring
More joy than still to laugh and smile,
And time in pleasant toys beguile?
Do not, oh! do not trouble me!
So sweet content, I feel and see
All my joys to this are folly,
None so divine as Melancholy.

I'll change my state with any wretch
Thou canst from goal or dunghill fetch;
My pain's past cure, another hell
I cannot in this torment dwell.
Now desperate, I hate my life,
And seek a halter or a knife;
All my griefs to this are jolly,
Nought so damn'd as Melancholy.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XX.

MY ardent love of miscellany is to-day abundantly gratified, by having an opportunity to variegate my paper with poetry and prose. It is the determination of my correspondents to give celebrity to our city clubs, and I have no doubt that, by future ages, they will be compared to the symposia of the Greeks, the revel of the Romans, or the petite soupers of Madame Tallien.

SIR,

As I find your correspondents are determined to pursue me with great severity, on account of my complaints against a certain club, of which my son is a member; and as one seems to doubt my assertion, with respect to his acquired talent for poetry, I take the liberty of offering to you some lines, which he dropped from his pocket, and which, with my usual "thirst for information," I read over. From its many imperfections, I conclude it is his first attempt, and should not expose it to you, but I earnestly hope you will discourage any similar exertions.

As strolling one day, alone in the park,
There chanc'd to pass by a wit, and a spark.
I follow'd behind them, and heard the spark say,
Dearest joker, how brilliant you are ev'ry day!
I wish in my soul to possess such a spirit,
And feel that I've wit, unexcited by claret.
Now why, my good friend, can you not impart
Some thought to my head, some warmth to my heart?
The other stopp'd shortly and gaz'd on the youth,
Then clasping his hands, exclaim'd. "On my truth,
Thy head ne'er was form'd for wisdom's great weight:
Your eye is too light, your nose is too straight;
But come, never mind, I've a plan now in view,
Shall yield you some learning, some gaiety too.
We'll hie to the inn, and make an appeal
To all the young men, who think or who feel."
Accordingly then they ended their walk,
In order, they said, to have a "good talk."
In silence, produc'd by very deep thought,
Now onward they march to their place of resort:
They beckon all young men they meet on the way,
To follow them in, and hear what they'll say.
Now round the great tap room, all seated in state,
Much joy in each heart, some sense in each pate,
Most fondly expecting high bliss to create;
When loud the wit hems, and opens his soul,
Harranguing awhile, sans any controul.
"And now, as I have you for once in a meeting,
I pray ye consider my wishes here greeting;
That as the young men of this famous city
Are not very learn'd, and few of them witty,
That we (precious few) who sometimes can think,
Should teach the young dogs...to smoke and to drink;
To feel the great bliss sociability gives,
And teach them 'tis pleasure for which a man lives.
Now least the fond fair, who always will rule,
Should try to molest and break up our school,
Let's swear by our faith to meet here together
One night in the week, in all sorts of weather."
Then he calls on them all as lovers and men,
The folly of women to try to restrain.

"There's a paper," says he "set up in this place,
For which we will write, to keep from disgrace."

So charming a thought, so worthy a plan,
Soon won the accordance of every man.
Another rose up with "Damme, I swear
If a lady offends me, I'll publish it there."
Then gravely arose a youth of more mind,
In whose honest heart no malice we find,
And pulling his cravat, and shaking his head,
Prepar'd for debate, and thus wisely he said:
"I'll offer some rules to govern your club,
But I won't stoutly swear like yonder young scrub.
To one steady union we all must agree;
For who blames the club, as a member blames me:
If each individual by this will abide,
No lady or writer our club will deride.
Agreed then, agreed...come here, take my hand,
"Divided we fall...united we stand."

Great joy overflow'd every heart at the sound,
And constancy, honour, they vow'd all around.
But next arose one, more anxious for fame,
And wish'd that their club should boast a great name.
"A name, my good man? I ne'er before spoke,
But surely you mean what you say for a joke.
Imprudent and rash you certainly are,
Our system of virtue to wish to declare.
Should the women discover our club has a name,
They'll make it a point our club to defame;
Our actions once known, be they ever so good,
Their envy and malice we ne'er can elude:
Let's then in the moonshine most guardedly keep,
And riot in joy while all the world sleep.
Forbear then, forbear, nor wish for a name,
We'd best to oblivion resign our fair fame."

They all were exceedingly pleas'd with the plan,
And swore to much secrecy, every man.
When, yet still in order, their feasting begins,
All smoke, eat and drink; some talk, and one sings.
And now for a winter they often renew
The laugh of the giddy, the wit of the few.
One night in the week they dissipate care,
And wine flows in bumpers; they toast to the fair,
Whose dress and whose follies they well may reprove,
Since claret now blinds them, and supersedes love.
But while they thus riot in bacchanal joy,
A letter is brought their peace to destroy.
Its tenour is rudely complaining of them,
For spoiling the son of one Mrs. M.
At once they arise, their vengeance to swear,
In very harsh words, on th' insolent fair,
Who gay clubs and grave clubs has rudely revild,
And charg'd upon them the faults of her child.
The president orders each into his seat,
And begs that more gently a mother they'll treat.
One roars for a pen to answer her letters,
To teach the respect she owes to her betters.
Aristippus now rises, with very grave air,
Bids he may be suffer'd to answer "that there."
The answer accordingly forthwith is written,
And handed around to see if it's fitting:
One puts in a word...another a line,
"Till all swear at once" that paper is mine."
The Lounger is call'd, the letter to print,
And vows on his honour he'll ne'er give a hint,
That a club of full twenty, and full grown young men,
Their talents unite in the answers to

MR. SAUNTER,

The encouragement, which you have given us poor females to make known our grievances, and the very respectable example of your correspondent, M. emboldens a forlorn fair one to paint her situation, which is a truly delicate one; arising from the same source as M's, that vile barrier to all social intercourse, the Tuesday club. You must know Mr. Saunter, I had, or imagined I had, a lover...a young man, whose society I prized above all others, and whose time and attentions were wholly devoted to me. On a sudden, he became neglectful and assumed a manner remote from that modest simplicity of character, which had been his greatest recommendation. I do not say I should have married the dear creature, had he continued his attentions, but possessing many of those agreeable qualities, which constitute the beau, I wished to have retained him in my suit. I fear I have injured my cause by this acknowledgement, and shall incur the censure of coquetry. But with the hope that I shall escape the imputation, I will proceed. I traced this favourite youth in his wanderings, in expectation of meeting with a rival, whom I was prepared to attack with all the woman's vengeance.

By a most singular and fortunate accident, I discovered he had not fallen in love, but what is worse for himself, I fear, he had fallen in with the Tuesday club, and had actually become an anonymous member.

I am happy they have had the consideration to become an anonymous club, as it is most probable they will stand in need of "a good name" at the period of the dissolution of their partnership. After I had discovered where my rambler had withdrawn himself, I imagined he would devote to me the rest of the week; but, alas! I find the Tuesday club have adjourned meetings for the other six days. For, as their favourite and appropriate song says,

"Which is the properest day to drink,
Saturday, Sunday, Monday?" &c. &c.

So they, in adopting it for the motto of the society, declare

"Each is the properest day we think,
Why should we name but one day?"

As my lover has never been made a mason, he has not been much in the habit of secret-keeping. I have therefore drawn from him some important facts, relative to this hardy club. Although I have perceived a sensible alteration in my beau, I have not the same faults to combat like those M. complains of, as I never could accuse him of having too much learning, he has neither "drank deep" or even "tasted the Pierian spring." The most striking difference I have discovered since my swain's admission into this new school is an intolerable ease of manners, which amounts to rudeness. When I chide him for neglect of me, he tosses up his glove, whistles a tune, or replies with a fragment from Shakspeare, "If it were so, it were a grievous fault."

I sympathise sincerely with your exemplary correspondent, M. I think her situation much more deserving serious consideration than mine, as I by no means despair of replacing my lost Strephon; but the alienation of such a son as she describes is truly a misfortune. I beseech you, dear Mr. Saunter, as you go your rounds "with measured steps and slow," to meditate for a moment on what I have here related; and, as I have still some regard for the "dear perfidious," drop a timely hint, and I may reclaim the truant.

DIDO.

....."Revenge is sweet."

MR. SAUNTER,

The numerous letters and communications you have received from ladies, breathing a spirit of animosity to those social and convivial institutions called "clubs," have at length provoked to revenge a number of hearty old fellows, who have for many years enjoyed the pleasures of such an establishment. As long as the ladies employ their literary talents in "weaving delicate ditties," and love sonnets, they may, uninterrupted, interest the sympathetic, and amuse the love-lorn with their compositions. Sometimes, indeed, with impunity, they may indulge themselves by giving to the world "in fine-spun verse," their upbraidings of an inattentive or neglectful lover; or, "in numbers smooth invite to love" those, whom they wish, to enslave. But when they assume a right to scrutinize the conduct of the gentlemen in general, when they venture to scrutinize their converse around the social board, and even to question the propriety of forming convivial associations, they must not expect to pass unnoticed.

At the last meeting of the "Gay club," Will. Whattle appeared for the first time with a clouded countenance. With folded arms, he sat silent for some minutes, and we all felt the deprivation of his jests, "which were wont to set the table in a roar." The sombre humour of Will. diffused itself over us all, and the sparkling glass went round sub silentio. At length Will. rose from his chair, and taking from his pocket a Port Folio, and some manuscripts, addressed the president.

In a solemn and sensible manner, he contended for the propriety of jovial associations. He alluded to their antiquity; and informed us of the clubs, of which sir Roger de COVERLEY and Dr. JOHNSON were members. He detailed the motives, which induced the formation of the "gay club," and eloquently enlarged on the harmony and enjoyments of its members. The eye of Will. now kindled with anger, and "determined revenge" sat on his brow. He took up two or three late numbers of the Port Folio, and with suitable emphasis read the papers addressed to you by ladies, containing abuse and misrepresentations of the various clubs, which exist in this city. "The cause of this calumny," said Will. "may readily be discovered; the objects of these female scribblers are known to me. They arise from a wish to have our constant attendance at their tea-parties, and altogether to debar us the enjoyments of the festive board and social gaiety. To prevent the continuance and repetition of these attacks, and effectually to punish their authors, I have digested a plan, which I submit to the consideration of the "gay club."

"PLAN.

"For the purpose of inflicting punishment on the female detractors of convivial associations, and fully to establish their superiority over tea-parties, &c. let two members of the "gay club," to be called the tea-party committee be charged with the following duties. Let them regularly attend every "tea-party," and be mindful of the conversation, which circulates among the members. Having, at the expense of the club, provided memorandum books, let them note down every sentence, every word they hear, and carefully describe, by copious annotations, the attitude and air of all who speak or smile. Let them deliver monthly to the president their memoranda and observations.

"Let two members be appointed, in the same manner, to note the conversations and conduct of each member of the club at its meetings, and deliver monthly to the president their memoranda and observations. Let these reports be enclosed to Mr. Samuel Saunter.

"By these means," continued Will. "every one will be in possession of the necessary materials for comparing the merits, and deciding the superiority of either of the associations. The tongue of slander will thus be silenced, the effusions of the envious will be seen no more, and our convivial enjoyments will cease only with ourselves."

An unanimous resolve took place, approving of Will.'s propositions, the tea-party and club committees were appointed, and I was directed to communicate our proceedings to you.

CHAP. VIII.

Continuation of the historical sketch.

The successes of Trenton and Princeton, with their consequences, made no favourable alteration in the state of American affairs; on the contrary, the danger became greater than ever. General Washington remained, as appears by the above-mentioned official letters, the whole winter of 1777 through, with about seven or eight hundred ill-armed, ill-fed, half-naked men, opposed to the whole British army, which undertook nothing against him. Warlike talents are here out of the question; for, with so great an inequality of means, no skill can avail. No! it is a miracle, an immediate operation of providence, which carried through this revolution, so beneficial to the rest of the world, and especially to Europe. How is it possible otherwise to account for the fact that the English undertook nothing at all? for they had only to march forward, and the war was at an end. It looks like the history of Senaccherib's army acted over anew. General Washington sent out officers to raise recruits; they went home to their relations, topped away for a while upon their pay, and when the time for returning to the army drew near, resigned their commissions without raising a single soldier. What a want, not only of patriotism, but of all human feeling! These people must have been mere animal bodies, without souls.

The men, who enlisted, were mostly Europeans, especially Irishmen; and perhaps, upon examination, it will be found that incomparably the greatest part of the handful of men, who fought at Trenton and Princeton, and stood it out the winter through, were Europeans. Here you have then a nation, whose liberties were vindicated by the arms of foreigners; for are we not authorized so to judge, when we see how averse the American militia were to use their arms? they never did use them, until they had stipulated enormous pay for a short time of service; so that they seem to have intended, instead of serving the state, to enrich themselves at its expense. There is no doubt but that they applauded, with perfect self-complacency, their own address in making their private interest of the distressed condition of the republic, and in lining well their purses at the cost of their unhappy country.

When the danger was distant and the weather fine, they were more easily persuaded to march into the field. But the difficulty increased in proportion to the unfortunate situation of affairs, so that the American people seem to have taken the resolution to declare in favour of the strongest party, and to side with the best luck; and this upon an occasion, in which they were so deeply interested. No magnanimous sentiment! no provident wisdom! and what was their conduct at the army? at sight of the enemy, they almost always took to flight; they seemed to be there only for the purpose of giving to the regular troops the example of the most extravagant want of discipline. They squandered the powder, which was so much wanted. They destroyed the tents, and all the warlike implements put into their hands. They deserted by multitudes; that is, they went home when they pleased. It must be observed, that those, who in time of peace had been captains, colonels, &c. in the militia, often hired others to take their places, when the time to go into the field came. But the hired colonels, captains, &c. generally ran away, on the march to the army. Add to this, that these national militia-men received a threefold higher pay than the regular troops. All this taken together constitutes an order of things truly singular. General Washington writes, that even among the regular troops many officers left the camp without leave, went home, or elsewhere, very coolly received their pay at their places of abode, and vegetated in their usual animal stupidity, without a thought of returning to their standards, and without the smallest punishment. The New-England militia, who fought general Burgoyne, constitute, however, an honourable exception. At the beginning of the campaign, indeed, they always ran away before the English and German troops; they deserted forts and entrenched positions, and left magazines in the lurch; but as the danger grew, they all flew to arms. They fought the enemy with great bravery, and at length compelled an army of European warriors to lay down their arms. This splendid campaign is indeed chiefly to be ascribed to the activity, the valour, and skill of general Arnold; and Kosciuszko, afterwards famous in Poland, is said to have had, as an engineer officer, a large share in the contrivance and execution of the operations.

CHAP. IX.

In Continuation.

This capture of general Burgoyne rendered America independent; for, without that event, France would hardly have declared herself in favour of America; and without the support of France, this independence would probably not have ensued, considering the nerveless languor, into which, during the last years of the war, the Americans sunk. Religious enthusiasm contributed likewise to make these militia-men from the northern parts of New-England braver than the rest of the Americans; for they were often heard in the midst of battle to sing psalms. This confirms what I have said above, that among the Americans, the New-Englandmen have shewn the most energy; but Washington's letters furnish proofs of what I added, namely, that they had lost much of the energy of their fore-fathers. For all that I have said of the American militia, applies likewise to those from the southern parts of New-England; and Burgoyne was vanquished only by the northern inhabitants of that country. Yet even these, after the capture of the English, fell back into their usual apathy, in which they have remained to this day. It cannot, therefore properly be maintained, that general Washington's military operations liberated America, if those in connection with the French army are excepted: for those of the northern army, under general Gates, contributed most to that event. Yet, probably, without Washington, and had not this sharp-sighted man incessantly led the congress by the hand, the cause of the Americans would have failed. This congress were continually committing the grossest blunders; and then Washington was obliged, in his letters, to show those senators the right way. But he always did it with great prudence; for these rulers, unused and ignorant how to command, still cherished their authority. Washington therefore cautiously avoided all appearance of ascendancy, which proves his knowledge of mankind. He appears a greater commander in his letters to congress, than in his warlike operations. Here he had to struggle against astonishing obstacles, and an unbounded weakness of means. Why did he not incessantly harass the English camp? Why not take refuge in inaccessible posts, whenever the enemy attempted to attack him? Why not then appear suddenly like a Sertorius, upon the flanks or in the rear of the enemy, to cut off his provisions and intercept his convoys? Why not employ his whole force with great activity as light troops? The answer to all this is easy, when you read, that his soldiers having no shoes, though accustomed to wear them, would all have run away, if he had marched much; that the government and the people, for whom these unhappy soldiers fought, suffered them to be in want of the most necessary clothing and provisions; that the Americans, not to let slip such a fine opportunity to enrich themselves, sold them strong liquors, and even necessities, at enormous prices; that they refused those warriors, fighting for their liberties, in the coldest winters, even a shelter in their houses; that most of the troops were Europeans, who were therefore not impelled by the love of their country to take arms; that they had only to go over to the English, to put an end to their misery, and enjoy a much better condition; and that, consequently, general Washington was obliged to spare his troops, who were thus overloaded with vexations, as many difficulties as possible, in order to keep together a number sufficient to delude the enemy with the appearance of an army.

CHAP. X.

In Continuation.

We must add further, that from the want of a military hospital, the wounded had before them the prospect of a certain death; and it will be readily conceived how much general Washington was obliged to spare his soldiers. The inactivity of general Washington was therefore grounded upon the circumstances, and when they permitted, he was immediately active, as the affairs of Trenton, Princeton, and Germantown prove. In this last action, the extraordinary circumstance must be mentioned, that the Americans took to flight, just as the English began to give way. He did not, indeed, create a new mode of warfare adopted to unexperienced troops and the nature of the country. He adhered closely to the modern practice; but I believe he had to do with people, and was under circumstances, which did not admit of invention. He peculiarly possessed all the qualities requisite to command Americans; for a hundred others in his situation, amid so many obstacles, and so much ignorance in congress, would have lost both patience and courage. He was master of the art, not of guiding the general opinions of the people, which perhaps was not practicable, but of discovering and following them. His military knowledge is unfolded, as I have said above, more in his letters to the congress, than in his actions, for the reasons I have given. His reasoning, concerning the conquest of Canada, which the congress would foolishly have undertaken, without possessing the means to accomplish it, is admirable and worthy of a master.

He never was jealous of the merit of his subordinate officers, such as, for instance, Steuben, who introduced the discipline, baron de Kalb, another Prussian officer, the marquis de La Fayette, and others. The Americans were, however, always jealous of the foreigners, who rendered them services. General Washington dared not give a command in the army to general Steuben, on account of the envy and dissatisfaction, which it would have excited among the American officers, who yet did not understand the business. They were perpetually caballing, and disputing about rank. The mismanagement of congress, which was continually raising new armies, was indeed the cause of this. This brings to mind the exclamation of the younger Cato, when the leaders of the wretched remnant of Scipio's army after its defeat, still contended for the command, before the very walls of Utica, "Is it surprising that the republic should be overthrown, when the rage for power divides us, even in death!" May the shade of Cato forgive me, for mentioning him upon this occasion! I shall further observe, that the struggles for rank among the Americans, proceeds more from the emoluments connected with it, than from the desire to command.

In all that I have said of the Americans, and their conduct during their war for liberty, the official letters of general Washington to congress shall be for me, what the bible was for Luther, who, whenever objections were made to him against his doctrines, held it up, and exclaimed, "there! there it is!" And I confidently believe, that neither Americans, nor men possessed of the Ameriko mania, can except against the accuracy of this authority. I am very much astonished that the Americans do not seem to notice that these letters are indeed no monument to their glory, and that they can mention them without blushing. Perhaps it is because every individual shares but a very small portion of the national shame. At the beginning of the revolution, Washington wrote to his friends, "our want of virtue is the only reason that makes me despair of the successful issue of our undertaking." See upon this subject "Letters of General Washington, to several of his Friends, in June and July, 1776," which were republished in Philadelphia, in 1795. The second volume, containing the co-operation of the French, or the history of the war, from the year 1779, has not yet come to my hands. Although a document of such importance as these letters is wanting to elucidate the history of those years, it may however be taken for granted, that the Americans were much indebted to the French; though, as we shall see hereafter, they were never very solicitous at a subsequent period, to discharge any tribute of gratitude.

The languid imbecility of the Americans, in the last years of the war, and their want of credit in Europe, would have made it impossible for them to obtain money by loans, without the guarantee of France. For the paper money, the only internal spring they had, to carry on the war, had so depreciated, that in the year 1780, sixty-five paper dollars were given for one in silver, and immediately after, the rate was at a thousand for one. This utter incapacity, amid such a want of all the means to carry on war, must finally have reduced America again under the yoke of an implacable British minister, if France had not hastened to her aid. Thus the Americans are indebted to this power for all that they possess.

I find in the history of Soulés, that Washington, in order to testify to count Rochambeau his veneration for France, and his gratitude for the benefits received from that kingdom, conducted the French commander through his troops drawn up in two lines, completely clothed, armed and accoutred, for the first time since the revolution, partly by the clothing and arms sent over from France, and partly by the magazines taken from the English army under Cornwallis, of which the French corps had generously given to the Americans their part of the booty, which belonged to them in common.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEL.

THE elaborate works of Sir WILLIAM JONES, another name for learning itself, are of late almost constantly in my hands. His extensive views into all the recesses of science, his felicity in taming Oriental wildness, by the rigid discipline of his classical versions, the stately march of his Ciceronian period, his technical accuracy, and musical diction, all challenge the profound attention of the delighted reader. In various parts of his work, he has amused himself with translating from the poets of Persia, who sing the praises of love and wine with no less felicity than ANACREON and HORACE. We copy the following stanzas, in the hope that "P. D." our ingenious correspondent, will render them still more melodious, by the charms of his poetry.

The rose is not sweet, without the cheek of my beloved;
the spring is not sweet, without wine.

The borders of the bower and the walks of the garden are not pleasant, without the notes of the nightingale.

The motion of the dancing cypress and of the waving flowers is not agreeable, without a mistress, whose cheeks are like tulips.

The presence of a damsel with sweet lips and a rosy complexion is not delightful, without kisses and dalliance.

The rose garden and the wine are sweet, but they are not really charming, without the company of my beloved.

All the pictures, that the hand of art can devise, are not agreeable, without the brighter hues of a beautiful girl.

The following is a description, in the highest style of Oriental luxuriance, and the curious reader will discern its alliance, both in imagery and expression, to the Song of Solomon:

It was the hour, when the Pleiads appeared in the firmament, like the folds of a silken sash, variously decked with gems.

I gently drew Fatima towards me by her curled locks, and she softly inclined to my embrace: her waist was gracefully slender; but sweetly swelled the part, encircled with ornaments of gold.

Delicate was her shape; fair her skin; and her body well proportioned: her bosom was as smooth as a mirror.

She turned aside, and displayed her soft cheek; she gave a timid glance with languishing eyes, like those of a roe in the groves, looking tenderly at her young.

Her neck was like that of a milk-white hind.

Her long, coal-black hair decorated her back, thick and diffused, like bunches of dates, clustering on the palm tree.

Her locks were elegantly turned above her head; and the riband, which bound them, was lost in her tresses.

She discovered a waist, taper as a well twisted cord; and a leg white and smooth as the stem of a young palm, or a fresh reed, bending over the rivulet.

She dispenses gifts with small delicate fingers, sweetly glowing at their tips, like the white and crimson worm of Dabia, or dentrifices, made of Esel wood.

The brightness of her face illumines the veil of night, like the evening taper of a recluse hermit.

On a girl like her, a girl of a moderate height, between those, who wear a frock, and those, who wear a gown, the most bashful man must look with an enamoured eye.

In the following, we discern the grosser philosophy of Bacchus, which is described and practised by most of his jovial votaries in Persia. In a voluptuous climate, and under fragrant bowers, the supine Asian has few ideas of enjoyment, beyond that narrow catalogue, which a sensual mind can conceive.

Were it not for three enjoyments, which youth affords, I swear by my prosperity, that I should not be solicitous how soon my friends visited me on my death bed.

First, to rise before the censurers awake, and to drink tawny wine, which sparkles and froths, when the clear stream is poured into it.

Next, when a warrior, encircled by foes, implores my aid, to bend towards him my pacing charger, fierce as a wolf among the Godha trees, whom the sound of human steps has awakened, and who runs to quench his thirst at the brook.

Thirdly, to shorten a cloudy day, a day astonishingly dark, by toying with a lovely delicate girl under a tent, supported by pillars.

A girl, whose bracelets and garters seem hung on the stems of osber trees, or of ricinus, not stripped of their soft leaves.

Suffer me, whilst I live, to drench my head with wine, lest, having drunk too little in my life time, I should be thirsty in another state.

A man of my generous spirit drinks his full draught to-day; and to-morrow, when we are dead, it will be known which of us has not quenched his thirst.

I am delighted to discover, that my partiality for Dr. ROBERTSON'S History of Scotland, in preference to either of his other historical labours, is confirmed by the opinion of the most respectable body of critics in England.

"Whether we consider our author with regard to the accurate order and disposition of his matter, the acuteness and penetration of his researches, the weight and solidity of his reflections, or the force and energy of his expression, we shall find him equally worthy of attention and applause. We may safely recommend this work, as THE MOST COMPLETE OF ALL MODERN HISTORIES. It is not a dry narrative of events, destitute of moment; nor is it a mere frothy relation, all glow and colouring."

Tumbling over the leaves of a new book, sent me by an European correspondent, I find the following observations upon the late rage for German plays:

The recent introduction of the German drama, may be considered as a phenomenon in the world of dissipation. That the good sense of the English nation should tamely submit to this revolution of taste, is altogether inexplicable.

When the Stranger was introduced to the public, many of our fair dames welcomed him to this hospitable metropolis. Their sympathy for the poor adulteress, so ably defended by Kotzebue, was a striking proof of their sensibility; and, from the recent instances of crim. con. it may be conjectured, that the system of our male and female marriage haters is daily obtaining new proselytes.

But the triumph of Kotzebue was incomplete, till the appearance of Pizarro. That renowned Spanish warrior was conjured up from the "pale nations of the dead," to conquer a country, which the armada had assailed in vain. The extraordinary effects of this melange of tragedy, farce, and pantomime, were indescribable. Multitudes crowded to the theatre, where they were amused by elegant scenery, thunder, and lightning; while the sonorous rant of Rolla, and the drawling whine of Cora, excited universal sympathy. Seized, as it were, with a general hysteric affection, the ladies blubbered, to the great detriment of their eyes; while the men*, animated by the bombast of Rolla, gazed with ardent sensations of heroism. So easy is it to be benevolent....when there is nothing to be given, and so undaunted is true valour....when there is no danger nigh! As Kotzebue eloquently pleaded the cause of the adulteress in the Stranger, so, in his Natural Son, or, as it has been called by an English playmonger, his "Lover's Vows," he has placed a kind unwedded fair one in an equally affecting and amiable point of view. The Noble Lie, written by the same dramatist, is another proof of the felicity of his invention, in the extenuation of guilt.

LEVITY.

[The habit of minute analysis, so long in vogue among the German commentators, who, in their drowsy criticisms, are most prolix in the explication of trivial passages, is admirably ridiculed by a recent essayist. The following will largely contribute to the merriment of the reader, and we shall next week follow up this ludicrous criticism, with another of the same class of humour, from the pen of GEORGE CANNING, Esq.]

"Peter Piper pick'd a peck of pepper;
If Peter Piper pick'd a peck of pepper,
Where's the peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd?"

THIS elaborate composition, though not long, combines many extraordinary merits, and one may discover in it strong principles of elocution, deep inquiry, and accurate conclusion. The usual point in repeating it, is not to affix the true meaning to every word, or to observe the logical manner in which the inquiry and result are founded on the premises, but to rehearse it three times, without drawing breath. Undoubtedly, as an exercise of this kind, the difficulty of pronouncing the words with sufficient rapidity to perform it within the compass of time that a human being can exist, without repeating the act of respiration, renders it an useful lesson in the art of elocution. Had Demosthenes, at four years old, been accustomed to recite this composition thus, he would not have been necessitated, in his ripe years, to resort to the toilsome expedient of filling his mouth with stones, and declaiming to the angry billows.

The first circumstance, that strikes the eye or the ear of common observers in this charming composition, is the frequent occurrence of the letter P, a figure now well known by the name of alliteration, and thought to add no small beauty to the finest poems; but I doubt whether any modern poet ever had so full a command of this admirable figure, as this author. I know not whether it would be allowed to be a poem, yet I think it has all the inherent qualities of poetry. Break the lines as you please, the mutilated fragments are still "disjuncta membra poetæ." Nay, so perfect is the harmony, that even putting the last half of the line first does not injure it, as the author has shown in the last line, to prove his wonderful powers of arrangement, where the peck of pepper precedes Peter Piper! The two first lines evidently correspond in termination; and the close of the third line has that full, sonorous beauty, which leaves the ear and mind perfectly satisfied.

Let us now examine the art of the author in raising a strong interest in the mind of the reader. We are at first simply told the fact, according to a well known critical rule, that narrative should be clear and concise. To this rule the ingenious poet has well attended, and, in the circumstance related, we find such an air of historical truth and verisimilitude, and such unadorned conciseness and inimitable brevity in the relation, that we sit down contented, nor suffer a doubt to arise of the credibility of the information received...."Peter Piper picked a peck of pepper." Good!....Here is the simple fact related; and though an inquiring mind may immediately busy itself in calculating how many pepper corns would go to fill a peck measure, or perhaps some malevolent cynic would ask, with a sneer, whether Peter Piper had employed himself upon pepper ground or whole, black or white, and so forth, the candid reader would recollect, that it is the business of an author to record the grand facts, and those, which put you at once into possession of the hero's character, without descending to the minutiae. No one can retain even a momentary doubt of Peter Piper's diligence, industry, and application, and no one but must regret, that talents so conspicuous were devoted to the occupation of picking pepper, rather than writing commentaries upon Shakspeare.

Peter Piper thus introduced to our acquaintance, we set him down as an industrious picker of pepper, and feel satisfied with every thing, but the brevity of the apologue. Immediately, however, follows a line, which informs us there is yet more to come. The emphatical "if," at the beginning of the second line, or middle division of the poem, rouses all the inquiring faculties of the mind. A doubt is raised, a fact, so clear and indisputed, falls at once into uncertainty, by the magic virtue of this little "if." Touchstone, indeed, allows "great virtue in your if;" but the virtue he discovers was of the composing and healing kind; whereas, in this instance, the application of the word rouses all the tumultuous passions, and confidence is as severely shaken, as when a late ingenious and noble author promulgated his doubts, as to the personal and mental deformities of Richard the third.

"What!" exclaims the candid reader, "and is it then possible that Peter Piper did not pick the peck of pepper?"

"Possible," returns the cynic; "it was hardly possible he should have done it. I told you before, if the author wished to gain credit for so improbable an achievement, he should have specified the peculiarities of the pepper, whether black or white, whole or ground: that is the way to obtain belief. For my own part, this statement only confirms the doubt I before entertained, 'If Peter Piper picked a peck of pepper?' Yes, yes, the author here wishes to come off handsomely; he knows he can bring no proof of his assertion."

Not so, however, feel the generality of mankind; only here and there a Zoilus, who dares to cavil at what gives universal pleasure. I must confess, on considering the third division of this little composition, that the author has shown more skill in touching the passions, than in distributing poetical justice. The mind is left in a melancholy mood, on reading the conclusion!

"Where's the peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd?"

"Aye, where indeed!" exclaims the insulting cynic: "I defy any one of you to produce it;....and now what becomes of your assertion?".... "Where indeed!" laments the candid reader.... "Oh that the belief of such industry should fall to the ground, when assailed by such a question!"

Be that as it may, this pathetic apostrophe appeals forcibly to the feelings, and leaves the mind impressed with that tender melancholy, which is so favourable to virtuous emotions, that I should not wonder, if many ardent individuals were to sally forth true knights errant in the cause, determined to find the peck of pepper, or to die. I should not be surprised, if the very identical peck of pepper, with the initials P. P. on the corner of the bag that holds it, were to be found in the same iron chest, that contained the Shakspeare papers. I was hinting this idea to a friend of mine the other day, a man of great critical acumen, and, after deliberating a long time, he replied, I should rather think it probable, that in that chest might be discovered the other half of this exquisite composition, for I have long been of opinion, that it is but a mutilated fragment. The author has displayed such admirable talents, that I cannot believe he would have left a piece of such merit so imperfect, as to end with a note of interrogation. I cannot help fancying that the other half has been destroyed, by the malevolence of some enemies to literature and good taste; though perhaps a copy may, by good fortune, be found in some of those repositories of ancient works of merit, whence, every now and then, some happy being has the privilege of selecting some to improve the world. Indeed, this little peice has before now employed my thoughts, and I once had an idea, that it originally ran as follows:

"A peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd;
If a peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd,
Where's the peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd?"

To say nothing of the beauty, which inverse construction bestows on poetry, the uniformity of endings for a long while induced me to think this the true reading; but, since the idea of a second part being somewhere to be met with, has occurred to my mind, I have abandoned this novel arrangement of the lines; for I cannot but acknowledge, that there is something inexpressibly melodious and pathetic in the double endings of the two first lines, according to the common reading.

Having thus critically considered this inimitable poem, as within all the rules of rhetoric and poesy, let us ascend to a higher grade of analysis, and exhibit it as a perfect model of a logical syllogism.

With good reason, the dialecticians of ancient times assimilated logic to a closed and firmly compacted hand. If the justness of this comparison be admitted, then it may be affirmed, that no proposition in Euclid ever more resembled the clenchedness of the fist than this poem,

Peter Piper pick'd a peck of pepper.

Now it is in vain to consider these memorable lines as tricked out with the delusive charms of eloquence. There is in them nothing gorgeous, nothing periphrastic; they relate a plain fact, in plain terms. The fact is simply the picking of a peck of pepper. A peck of pepper was picked, surely some one must have picked it; a peck of pepper picks not itself. Who then picked it?.... Plainly Peter Piper. In this, there is nothing but what is absolutely necessary for the elucidation of this important truth. A peck of pepper is pickedwho picked it? Not John Piper, nor Thomas Piper, but plainly Peter Piper.

Where's the peck of pepper Peter Piper pick'd!

Still argumentative, still logical. The middle term is indeed omitted; but what man does not at once perceive the nature of its syllogistic form? What mind does not feel, that, if a peck of pepper once be picked, to have been picked it must have been, and to have been, it must have had place to be in! Where is it then? Here, and here alone, is displayed some eloquence. To the question where, no answer is returned. Where is it?....Gone! No one is able to say whither! Gone, destroyed, hidden, perished! Gone with the years beyond the flood! It was once said, by a learned sergeant, who practised in other courts than those of Westminster, we mean the learned sergeant Kite, that the word demonstration came from Demon, the father of lies. With that personage probably remains the peck of pepper; and with you, ye courteous and critical readers, we trust remains a clear conviction of the logical skill demonstrated in this celebrated effort. At any rate, we shall say no more, for, as we have so fairly sent the peck of pepper to the devil, perhaps the vexed critics may be for sending us after it.

FESTOON OF FASHION.

[Under this head, we shall occasionally arrange whatever good-naturedly derides fashionable folly, no less than whatever describes faithfully fashionable dress.]

PARISIAN FASHIONS.

Turbans have taken the place of oblong caps, for full dress; they are made of gold and silver.

Brocaded Materials, for half dress, of plain muslin, sometimes ornamented with pearls.

Pearls are likewise worn through the hair.

Full-dressed hats are made of rose-colour satin, and marigold velvet.

Black crape and velvet hats are very common.

For undress, mob caps, with ends to tie under the chin, trimmed with lace, and round caps ornamented with fancy trimming, continue in vogue; sometimes a handkerchief, en marmote, to tie under the chin, is put on the latter.

Spencers are made of black cloth, with velvet collars.

Black crape robes are still in fashion for full dress, or late for half dress.

Robes are made of a slight India clouded silk.

Instead of long Cachemire shawls, silk or woollen shawls, seven quarters square, are worn.

It is extremely fashionable to wear the end of the shawls towards the left shoulder, instead of the middle of the back.

Gentlemen's coats are very short and loose, the collars are merely turned over; round concave middle-sized buttons of yellow metal are put on the facings at each side.

The Parisian ladies sport an arrow, studded and tipped with diamonds, as the ornament of their head-dresses. This arrow is, no doubt, directed against the hearts of their admirers; and indeed the contrivance is ingenious, for if the shaft should miss the aim, the diamonds, we should think, are likely to produce a very powerful impression!

The walking amusements of the present day deserve great encouragement. The training for a match may do a man good all his life. The grand pedestrian principles we see are the salutary ones of temperance and exercise!

THE PIN.

[FROM A PARIS JOURNAL.]

Our neighbours, the English, if we may judge from their marriage contracts, are, or at least were, the greatest consumers of pins in the world. Nothing is more usual than for a lady of fashion to be allowed a thousand pounds sterling a year (24,000 livres tournois) for the single article of pins. Historians relate, that in those days, when pin-money was first introduced, the English ladies consumed a vast number of pins to fasten their clothes. In process of time, however, the consumption of pins has decreased, and in the exact proportion with the diminution of drapery. At Paris, God knows, a husband will not be ruined by the expense of pins. Now-a-days, an elegante makes almost as little use of a pin as of a needle.

But yet allow me to tell your dames of fashion, for whom pins have become useless, that a pin in place may sometimes be of importance to the reputation of your charms! Little do you think how much even a beauty may be indebted to a pin! Little do you consider how many vows, how many addresses depend upon a single pin! Take out that solitary pin, which, strange to tell, has found its way into your robe; take out that pin, and the loves and desires, which hover round what it mysteriously conceals, disappear. The imagination droops its wing. The illusion vanishes. Pleasure is disappointed, and flies in search of new deceptions. Ah, madam! learn to conceal with grace! and remember that your charms soon lose their power, when you display their utmost force. Above all, know that there are some pins, which you should rarely unfasten!

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

"A MARVELLOUS Pleasant Love Story" has a very alluring title, and if it be constructed upon the plans of Mrs. Ratcliffe it will be sufficiently marvellous, and may seem pleasant. Love stories, however, have nearly lost their interest in this stocial age, and our young men yawn over the delicate distresses of Damon and Delia.

The prolific muse of CUMBERLAND has brought forth another dramatic offspring, which is already named, and is to be ushered into the world by one of the managers of the London theatres.

Literary Leisure, or the recreations of Solomon Saunter, has just appeared in London. This is another addition to the copious catalogue of periodical works. It appears to be the work of a juvenile writer; but many of the essays will not disgust the veteran critic.

The criticisms on Miss Baillie's "Series of Plays" are liberal and accurate, and the humorous sketches are often hit off with the comic effect of a Bunbury's pencil.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

The signing of the definitive treaty, is one of the most momentous incidents which has occurred for many years in European history. This specious semblance of peace on paper, will be quickly metamorphosed into a fury

With Ate by her side, come hot from hell.

A fury who will not only strive to deface whatever is fair and excellent in Great-Britain, but who will extend her baleful influence over the Atlantic, and taint and mildew our own country. Melancholy reflexions, naturally arising from such sure presages, founded on the immensa cupido of France and Buonaparte, and the NOTORIOUS IMBECILITY OF OUR OWN GOVERNMENT, might be extended through many a warning page of this paper; but the Editor abstains, for the present, from farther speculation on this eventful treaty, as he finds the subject so concisely, wisely and justly treated in an article in the New-York Evening Post, that it would be a wide departure from modesty in him to attempt the expansion of a subject at once succinctly and completely discussed by a sagacious politician.

DEFINITIVE TREATY OF PEACE.

As the ratified articles do not materially differ from the preliminary, all remarks which we deem material have been already anticipated in our former "Reflexions on the peace." The great mountain of delay has at length brought forth a mouse; and those among the English whose pride could not but expect an amelioration of the terms have been greatly disappointed. The French negotiators seem to have lost nothing of their usual dexterity. Perfect harmony and sincerity and good faith are promised in abundance on both sides, while, in effect, the embers of war are carefully kept alive in several articles of the treaty, which wants reciprocity, the chief basis of good faith and the only pledge of real harmony. To France, the Batavian republic has, in reality though not in form, been given up, bound hand and foot: The Cape of Good Hope being restored to that republic in full sovereignty as before the war, is substantially placed in the hands of Buonaparte. The possessions of Portugal are to be left entire; so says the preliminary, and so says the ratified article on that head; but it will be observed that the ratified article marks out new limits to Portuguese and French Guiana, in which it may be supposed the French negotiators have not forgotten themselves. Spain, as well as the Batavian republic, have been made use of as sponges in the great consul's hands, with which he has absorbed all the conquests of England, to be squeezed out again as it may suit his caprice or convenience. How far indemnity for the past has been obtained by this treaty, is a subject for Englishmen alone to discuss; but that of security for the future against the encroachments of France, belongs to every part of the world, whose independent existence is threatened to be swallowed up by that enormous, ambitious, insatiable power. The seal of the great consul is already stamped on the fate of Europe; and it is an awful consideration for America that some of the mischievous broods of evils, moral and political, which, generated by the French, have insinuated themselves into every European nation, to propagate in turn, should have found their way into this country, as precursors to the arrival of our intended neighbors in Louisiana.

Americans! you have wept over the ashes of Washington, but your tears were those of pride, and sorrow at his loss. Is not the time fast hastening when those tears will stream afresh at beholding the sad, the deplorable consequences of departing from all his advice, and decrying all his measures, for the purpose of introducing a wretched, visionary, sickly system of politics, calculated to enervate the strength, and destroy the credit of the country? and to hold out a lure to the first bold adventurer who lands on our shores, or the first domestic demagogue whose ambition looks to avail itself of a civil war? Do you discredit this foreboding? God grant you may never have occasion to remember it.

The road to Gretna-Green is still passable, notwithstanding the immense fall of snow in that quarter. This is, no doubt, owing to the passengers, who are generally in a melting mood.

The progress of dramatic invention seems not to have been very rapid, for the last century. At the commencement of it, the wits were ridiculing those writers, who gained their bread by barbarous and bloody murders; and in our days, poets have taken to the same expedients, with the difference of having their murders acted on the stage, instead of being bawled in the streets.

A gentleman relating one night at a coffee-room in Oxford, that Dr. —, of Brazen Nose college, had put out his leg in crossing a kennel, five surgeons immediately set off for the doctor's apartments, but returned dismayed, saying no such thing had happened: "Why (replied the gentleman) how can a man cross a kennel without putting out his leg?"

A new fashion of visiting cards has appeared at Paris. Instead of the name, the card contains an engraved portrait of the visitor.

The new planet, discovered by Piazze, the astronomer, at Palermo, in January 1801, was first seen in England, on Thursday last, at two o'clock in the morning, by the astronomer royal, Dr. Maskelyne, at Greenwich.

A very fickle character being surprised in the act of hanging himself, was interrogated by the person, who discovered him concerning the cause of this rash action. Only from a love of change, he replied.

The London wits, alluding to the partiality of the town to Cooke's Iago, declared, on a late occasion, that it was impossible for John Bull to expect good entertainment at Covent Garden, when there was no Cook there.

A poor sweep travelling through Stretton, near Burton-upon-Trent, last week, being benighted, knocked at the door of a farmer, and begged he might sleep in the stable till the approach of day, but was refused. The labourer, however, hearing the answer, and having more humanity than his master, suffered him to take his repose upon some straw in the barn. It happened about two o'clock in the morning, two villains came with a horse and cart, with an intent to rob the barn, and having nearly filled one bag, said, 'twas a pity they had not engaged another man to hold the candle; the poor sweep hearing this, and imagining the men belonged to the house, rushed from the straw, and exclaimed, "O, I'll hold the candle!" The villains, at this unexpected answer, and the appearance of his black face and white teeth, hastily decamped, leaving horse, cart, and bags, at the disposal of the supposed devil.

Though liveries have not yet been formally restored by law in Paris, there is a dress, by which servants are obviously enough distinguished, and the first consul has now given the example of rendering this splendid. His liveries, or perhaps we should say, the costume of his servants, are sky-blue, with a plain gold lace; those of Madam Bonaparte, light green and gold.

The number of persons burned to death has greatly increased since the introduction of light clothing. Ladies are forced to a nearer enjoyment of the fire, and the thin muslin transparency is in a blaze in a moment.

The ladies, who were sold in Egypt, were Abyssinian women, to be employed as domestics. The price was very low, and every French soldier had his domestique. The discipline in the English army was too strict to allow such amorous handmaids.

The brewers of port wine in England seem not such skilful adepts, nor such extensive dealers in the home commodity, as was experienced about half a century since, at which period the following remarkable occurrence took place:—An information having been given to some excise officers, that a very large quantity of port, not having paid the duty, was deposited in a particular cellar, they repaired to the spot, and seized upwards of fifty pipes. The owner, who had made near a plumb, by what he hesitated not to stile vinum supernaculum, determined to stand suit with the officers. On the matter being brought to issue, he irrefutably proved, that there was not a single drop of Oporto wine in the whole quantity seized; but that his supernaculum was entirely composed of rough cider, and British spirits, coloured with the wood called red saunders, which gives a brisk and beautiful tinge, by being previously put into spirits. The excise officers were of course nonsuited.

A gentleman, who had been looking over some valuable rings the other day, at a fashionable jeweller's, literally walked away with one of the value of 100 guineas. The poor goldsmith vainly attempted to overtake him, on the full run, and calling out, "Stop thief!" as loudly as possible. A person, who heard the hue and cry, and was observing the amazing rate, at which our pedestrian kept moving, would have stopt him as the thief alluded to; but he was intimidated by the gentleman's appearance, and his vociferating "Keep off, sir, I am walking for a hundred."

An actor of some humour, whose name we shall not now mention, was lately pressed by his tailor for the payment of a large bill. The debtor declared himself to be, in the modern phrase, in a state of impecuniosity. The tailor very modestly asked for a bond, which the other expressed his readiness to grant, provided the matter was kept a secret! When the bond was brought, it was indignantly tore, and thrown in the tailor's face. "You rascal," said the indignant comedian, "you promised to keep the secret, and now your paper begins, 'Be it known to all men by these presents!'"

The following article from a Paris paper, presents a vivid picture of the luxury of tepid bathing, a grateful and necessary practice, to which many of our dear countrymen, to the disgrace of their own purity, and to the scandal of the physician, are utter strangers. Fas est et ab hoste doceri.

Amongst the novelties of Paris are the thermæ, or hot baths. They are formed in a very long vessel, which floats upon the river near the second arch of the pont royal. In this structure there are one hundred and forty baths in two stories, each story being bounded by a gallery for promenade. In these baths, when you have sat as long as you please, you ring a bell, and whatever refreshment you desire, is floated to you upon a cork salver. If you desire perfumes, you have them, and you then retire to dress in a room, which pertains to each bath. The price for this indulgence, refreshments excepted, is 15d. English. The baths are open night and day.

Miss Baillie having written "A Series of Plays" intended to illustrate the progress of passion, is thus complimented in a late miscellany.

From the Blue Beards, the Pizarros, the Castle Spectres of the English stage, from the wild ravings of the German Drama, and the lax morality thence inculcated with our theatrical exhibitions, from the mummary of pageantry, the cant words of comedy, it is a welcome relief to turn to the page where the powers of the mind find real exercise, where the feeling heart subscribes to the truth of the portrait, where the powers of a Siddons will find adequate employment, and where the embellishments of poetry are made subservient to the noblest purposes.

A new writer thus justly describes the plays of Kotzebue.

To paint the wild ebullitions of high-wrought feeling, to represent passion as the grand sublimer of human nature, to throw beings of enthusiastic irritability into situations inconceivably agonizing, are among the favourite objects of the German muse. To accomplish an undertaking so gigantic, no expression can be too forcible, no language too glowing. Morality, principle, virtue, all fade before this new philosophy of the passions. The Germans, in these daring attempts, may be sublime; let us, whose judgment condemns as wild, these strange vagaries of the domination of feeling, beware, lest in endeavouring to emulate their sublimity, minds, which teach themselves to admire these representations of our strained passion, for it certainly is an acquired taste, will scarcely ever be able to feel any relish in the more simple beauties of just delineations of nature. Like those, who having vitiated their palates with high dishes and luxurious fare, find it extremely difficult to return to simple diet, and unsophisticated viands.

The following letter was actually written by an usher of a school, as a model for a young gentleman to inform his parents that he should be home at the Christmas vacation. It may well match with the pedagogue's well-known love letter in Peregrine Pickle:

"It is impossible to verbally declare the sublimity of satisfaction which I experience, in the fond anticipation of passing that period of temporal abstraction from scholastic attention, ordinarily cognominated the vacation, or, as marking the diurnal sanctimonious employment usually directed, emphatically appellated holidays: therefore, in simple and humble dictates I inform you, that the recess is fixed for the 23d of the present duodecimal division of the annual solar revolutions: then shall I hope to experience all those domiciliary delectations, usually attendant on that periodical festivity, conjuncted with the hilarities of those, with whom I am enfraternally connected. Then those viands, vaporially affecting our olfactory organs with their salubrious effluvia, and our stomachs, with their invigorating influence, will be abundantly devoured, whether consisting of terrefacted or bulliated quadrupedal carnosus substance, the more delicate fibres of the volant aerial inhabitants, or the submarine piscatory residents....concluding with those heterogeneous compositions, called puddings, aided by the exhilarating effects of vinous libations!"

A gentleman lately asked another, recent from the city of Washington, if he could give him any idea of Mr. Bacon's speeches. Yes, says he, this is the substance of one of them versified.

Good people all, both great and small,
And eke, and aye, and also;
Pray lend an ear, and you shall hear,
And then I need not bawl so.

There was a time, when times were good,
The ancient bard in rhyme sings,
So use time well, 'tis time we should,
We should so, did we time things.

So to conclude and make an end
Of my nice diction'd ditty,
Indeed 'tis time the times should mend,
In country and in city.

A humorous correspondent remarks, that now to call the city of Washington the Federal City is quite obsolete. As it is the head-quarters and favoured region of Mr. Jefferson and his myrmidons, it would be more accurate to call it the Anti-Federal City.

In his lectures on painting, the ingenious Fuseli remarks that

The desperate moan of Macbeth's queen on seeing the visionary spot still uneffaced, infect her hand, is an image snatched from the lap of terror.

After perusing the following description of Paul preaching at Athens, one need scarcely regret the absence of the picture:

"In the cartoon of Paul announcing his God from the height of the Areopagus, he appears the organ of superior power. The assembly, though selected with characteristic art for the purpose, are the natural offspring of place and moment. We perceive the involved meditation of the Stoic—the Cynic's ironic sneer—the incredulous smile of the elegant Epicurean—the eager disputants of the academy—the elevated attention of Plato's soul—the rankling malice of the Rabbi—and the Magician's mysterious glance.

Superior degrees of happiness are not to be expected solely from a skill in arts and sciences—from study and from retirement: but chiefly from those virtues and good qualities in which even the illiterate find it—from prudence, temperance, justice, fortitude and contentment. The boast of felicity without these, is but the rant of pride, and the rhapsody of inexperienced speculation.

Early old age and early dotage are introduced by an abject dereliction of our powers. We labour to increase our fortunes, and suffer our faculties to run to ruin without reluctance: but it is surely worth while to contend strenuously for their preservation. Of how little value are the enjoyments of life, when we come to vegetate in stupidity, in the midst of all that should delight our senses—inform our understanding—enrich our memory, and glitter on our imagination. It is worth while to pursue every method which has a tendency to prolong our mental existence. Among these we may venture to enumerate a constant, yet moderate exercise of our abilities—a daily accumulation of new ideas—a recollection of the old—a rule over the passions and temperance in general. We often accuse time and nature for decays, which are caused by our own neglect. Instead of immersing ourselves in the pursuit of wealth, which we shall never enjoy, and honors, which are empty bubbles, let our desire be to preserve our faculties unimpaired to the last, and to shine, as the sun shines bright, through the whole of his progress; and though, with abated heat and effulgence at the close of it, yet with a lustre venerable and serene, till it descends to the other hemisphere.

In a climate capricious as our own, fine weather affords a great pleasure, and he who is not urged to exertion by his wants or passions, seems to acquiesce in it, and to require few other gratifications besides the enjoyment of it unmolested. The mind is gently lulled by it to a luxurious complacency, and finds contentment in the Epicurean pleasure of a perfect inactivity. To bask in the sunshine, or to breathe the balsamic gale of a zephyr in the shade, is a satisfaction of a sensual kind—no less delightful than pure.

Formerly as men journeyed through old authors elucidations in the margin attended your progress, like lamps by the road side; but now, it may be presumed, books shine like phosphorus or the glow worm, with inherent lustre, and require not the assistance of extrinsic illumination.

Fashionable dashing characters may be compared to a dashing torrent—all noise, all foam, all violence for a moment, and then spent or exhausted forever: or to a comet, attracting all eyes for a short time, but cheering no system, and perhaps endangering all: or to a kittle drum which owes its power of making a noise to brass and emptiness: or to some vile liquors—hot in the mouth, but without a body.

Madame Scudery, the authoress of Clelia, the Great Cyrus, and many other ponderous romances, was remarkably ugly. The following lines, written by her, and addressed to a painter, who had drawn her portrait, give a stronger proof of her wit and good-humour, than is to be found in her works.

Nanteuil, en faisant mon image,
A de son art divin signale le pouvoir;
Je hais mes traits dans mon miroir,
Je les aime dans son ouvrage.

A telescope, of the value of eleven thousand pounds sterling, has just been shipped in the river Thames, for the royal observatory at Madrid. It was made under the direction of Mr. Herschell, and it fills so many bulky packages as to freight the whole of a small ship. Another telescope is also about to be completed, under the same direction, for the academy of sciences at St. Petersburg, which will cost about five thousand pounds.

An eminent German physician has discovered a new valuable property in the cow-pox. Some of those, who had been inoculated with it, having been afterwards attacked by the scarlet fever, had it, it is stated, with circumstances of extraordinary mildness.

Travelling aerial vehicles may soon be expected to be reduced to as great perfection as in our mail coaches. An author has published a book at Vienna, shewing that eagles may be used in drawing air-balloons. He likewise lays down rules for yoking and driving them together, with the whole system of their manège. This certainly is a step beyond building castles in the air.

STATE BED.

Ever since an account of the marquis of Exeter's grand state bed appeared in the fashionable world, grandeur in this article of furniture has become quite the rage. Among others, the lord mayor feeling for the dignity of the city of London, has petitioned the corporation for one of great splendour, to be placed in the mansion-house, at the city's expense.

We have been favoured with a description of this magnificent state bed, the choice of his lordship. The body is formed by the callipee, or under shell of a large turtle, carved in mahogany, and sufficiently capacious to receive two well-fed people. The callipash, or upper shell, forms the canopy. The posts are four gigantic figures, richly gilt; two of them accurate copies of Gog and Magog, the other two represent Sir William Walworth and the last man in armour. Cupids with custards are the supporters. The curtains are of mazarine purple, and curiously wrought with the series of the idle and industrious apprentice from Hogarth, in gold embroidery. But the vallens exceed description; there, the various incidents in the life of Whittington are painted. The mice in one of the compartments are done so much to the life, that his lordship's cat, who is an accurate judge of mice, was deceived. The quilt is of fashionable patch-work figures, the description of which we shall not anticipate, as we understand Mr. Birch has obtained a sketch of it, for his large twelfth cake. The whole is worthy of the taste of the first magistrate of the first city of the world.

ORIGINAL POETRY.
FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

A MODERN LOVE DITTY.

WHERE Schuykill oe'r his rocky bed,
Roars like a bull in battle,
In neat log cabin lives a maid,
Who tends her father's cattle;
She's every charm of mind and face,
Young, handsome, gay, and witty,
And then she rides with such a grace
With butter to the city.

Her churns and pails, scour'd white as snow,
Are plac'd upon the dresser,
And pewter plates, in many a row,
Where you might see your face, sir;
She'll raise the haycock on the mead,
Or toss it out so pretty,
Or, mounted on old Grey, will speed
With butter to the city.

To see her panting oe'r her churn,
With charms so flush'd and glowing,
Would make a hermit's bosom burn,
His frozen blood set flowing;
But all the lads their arts have tried
In vain, to move her pity,
She jeers, then mounts old Grey, to ride
With butter to the city.

Ah me! tho' us'd to stir my stumps,
My cart I scarce can follow,
And, sharing in his master's dumps,
Not Dobbin minds my holla.

O! could I make this lass my bride,
 Could I but marry Kitty,
 Together in my cart, we'd ride
 With butter to the city.

[At a literary and social club, which occasionally meets in this city, two members generously offered a fine West-India turtle, with which the party was to be feasted, on some merry May day. The proffer was joyously received, and the charge of this amphibious gift was, with great solemnity, committed to mine host of the garter. A few evenings, prior to the anticipated banquet, a servant communicated to the club the dismal intelligence, that the turtle was dead. The consternation and chagrin of the company can be better imagined than described. A great poet of antiquity somewhere informs us, that Curæ leues loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

This dumb sorrow seemed to close the watering mouth of each of our expecting epicures, till it was recollected, that the demise of the turtle, as it was sincerely felt, should be poetically deplored by

"The poor, distress'd, surviving few."

Accordingly our laureat was invoked, who forthwith produced the following.]

.....Æqua lege necessitas
 Sortitur insignes et imos.

ON A TURTLE.

Ye sons of mirth, your clamours quell,
 And cease that joyous roar,
 For lo *Sebastian comes to tell
 Your turtle is no more.

And is he gone? ah! say not so!
 He look'd so green and sleek;
 Would he had died a month ago,
 Or liv'd another week.

For had he died a month before,
 In R—— and B——'s tub,
 They would alone his loss deplore,
 Unnoticed by the club.

Or, had he lived but seven days,
 We ne'er should look so blue;
 But festive anthems to his praise,
 Had sung in No. 2†.

Ah! did the fates like mortals feel,
Humanely would they say,
 "No turtle dies but by the steel!"
 For that's their natural way.

"But what," says Joe, "is in you all.
 You make so d—d a pother;
I guess† we'd better Hardy call,
 And make him get another."

* Sebastian, an obsequious German, one of the waiters, and the very counterpart of Shakspeare's Francis, always ready with his "anon, anon, sir." His haggard look and faultering tongue, when he essayed to speak of the untimely death of our hopes, and the regretted turtle, have been well described by the poet of nature.

.....The whiteness of his cheek
 Was apter than his tongue to tell his errand.
 E'en such a man, so faint, so spiritless,
 So dull, so dead in look, so woe begone,
 Drew Priam's curtain in the dead of night,
 And would have told him half his Troy was burn'd;
 But Priam found the fire ere he his tongue,
 And we Turtella's death, ere he reported it.

† No. 2. This is that domus interior, with which, if Virgil had been acquainted, he would have assigned it a place in his own Olympus. It is a sweet recess in the hotel, order-ferous with segars, and vocal with wit and joy.

‡ I guess. This alludes to the provincial idiom of a certain New-England member, whose tongue is not filed for the purer para. of Philadelphia.

ODE

FOR THE NEW-YEAR, 1802.

BY HENRY JAMES FRY, ESQ. PORT LAUREAT.

LO from Bellona's crimson car,
 At length the panting steeds unbound,
 At length the thunder of the war
 In festive shouts of peace is drown'd:
 Yet as around her monarch's brow,
 Britannia twines the olive bough,
 Bold as her eagle eye is cast,
 On hours of recent tempest past:
 Through the rude wave and adverse gale,
 When free she spread her daring sail,
 Immortal glory's radiant form,
 Are guiding load-star through the storm;
 Directed by whose golden ray,
 Thro' rocks and shoals she kept her steady way;
 "My sons," she cries, "can Honour's guerdon claim,
 "Unsoil'd my parent worth, unstain'd their sovereign's fame?"

Albion! though oft by dread alarms,
 Thy native valour has been tried,
 Ne'er did the lustre of thy arms
 Shine forth with more refulgent pride
 Than when, while Europe's sons dismay'd,
 Shrunk recreant from thy mighty aid;
 Alone, unfriended, firm you stood,
 A barrier 'gainst the foaming flood.
 When mild and soft the silken breeze
 Blows gently o'er the rippling seas;
 The pinnacle then may lightly sweep,
 With painted oar the halcyon deep;
 But when the howling whirlwinds rise,
 When mountain billows threat the skies,
 With ribs of oak the bark must brave
 The inroad of the furious wave;
 The hardy crew must to the raging wind
 Oppose the sinewy arm, th' unconquerable mind.

In every clime where Ocean roars,
 High tho' thy naval banners flew;
 From where by Hyperborean shores,
 The frozen gale ungenial blew,
 To sultry lands that Indian surges lave,
 Atlantic isles and fam'd Canopus' wave;
 Tho' from insulted Egypt's coast
 Thy armies swept the victor host,
 From veteran bands where British valour won
 The lofty wall's of Ammon's godlike son:
 Useless the danger and the toil,
 To free each self-devoted soil,
 Auxiliar legions from thy side
 Recede to swell the Gallic conqueror's pride;
 While on Marengo's fatal plain,
 Faithful to honour's tie, brave Austria bleeds in vain.

Not fir'd by fierce Ambition's flame,
 Did Albion's monarch urge his car,
 Impetuous thro' the bleeding ranks of war,
 To succour and protect his nobler aim.
 His guardian arm, while each Hesperian vale,
 While Lusitania's vine-clad mountains hail,
 Their ancient rights and laws restor'd,
 The royal patriot sheath'd th' avenging sword;
 By heaven-born Concord led, while Plenty smiles,
 And sheds her bounties wide to bless the sister isles.

DICK STRYPE,

OR THE FORCE OF HABIT.

A TALE...BY TIMOTHY BRAMBLE.

HABITS are stubborn things:
 And by the time a man is turn'd of forty,

His ruling passion's grown so haughty,
 There is no clipping of its wings.
 The truth will best be shewn,
 By a familiar instance of our own.
 Dick Strype
 Was a dear friend and lover of the pipe:
 He us'd to say, one pipe of Kirkman's best
 Gave life a zest.
 To him 'twas meat, and drink, and physic,
 To see the friendly vapour
 Curl round his midnight taper,
 And the black fume
 Clothe all the room
 In clouds as dark as science metaphysic.
 So still he smok'd, and drank, and crack'd his joke;
 And, had he single tarried,
 He might have smok'd, and still grown old in smoke;
 But Richard married.
 His wife was one, who carried
 The cleanly virtues almost to a vice,
 She was so nice:
 And thrice a week, above, below,
 The house was scour'd from top to toe,
 And all the floors were rubb'd so bright,
 You dar'd not walk upright.
 For fear of sliding;
 But that she took a pride in.

Of all things else Rebecca Strype
 Could least endure a pipe.
 She rail'd upon the filthy herb tobacco,
 Protested that the noisome vapour
 Had spoil'd the best chintz curtains and the paper,
 And cost her many a pound in stucco:
 And then, she quoted our king James, who saith,
 "Tobacco is the devil's breath."
 When wives will govern, husbands must obey;
 For many a day
 Dick mourn'd and miss'd his favourite tobacco,
 And curs'd Rebecca.
 At length the day approach'd, his wife must die:
 Imagine now the doleful cry
 Of female friends, old aunts, and cousins,
 Who to the funeral come by dozens.
 The undertaker's men and mutes
 Stood at the gate in sable suits,
 With doleful looks,
 Just like so many melancholy rooks.
 Now cakes and wine are handed round,
 Folks sigh, and drink, and drink, and sigh,
 For grief makes people dry;
 But Dick is missing nowhere to be found,
 Above, below, about,
 They search'd the house throughout,
 Each hole and secret entry,
 Quite from the garret to the pantry,
 In every corner, cupboard, nook and shelf,
 And all concluded he had hang'd himself.
 At last they found him....reader, guess you where?
 'Twill make you stare....
 Perch'd on Rebecca's coffin, at his rest,
Smoking a pipe of Kirkman's best!

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXI.

S. S. SAUNTER,

IN your 18th number, in the valuable essays from the Microcosm, I see a comparison or estimate of the merits of some of that class of writers, who leave the beaten track of narration and history, and whose endeavour it is to illustrate the apophthegm,....that there is not only an experience of fact, but also an experience of principle.

The preference which your friend, Mr. Griffin, gives to Richardson's Charles Grandison, and to that class of novels, occasions the present address; for having previously formed a different opinion, the perusal of that essay induced me to methodize my thoughts, which, if you think proper, you may give a place in your next.

The remarks on Fielding's Tom Jones, I admit are correct, and the exceptions apply, as relate to children; but, though I do not, by any means, admit that as the first of the class that may be contrasted with Richardson, yet I would not put either into the hands of youth, 'till they had attained some maturity of understanding: but whensoever it becomes proper to put works of imagination into the hands of the pupil, I consider those as preferable, who draw manners and characters from life; who represent their personages in situations, in which it is probable we may be placed ourselves; who do not make them behave always as the purest wisdom or prudence would dictate, but suffer them sometimes to act as under the influence of natural passions and desires, undisciplined and untutored, and upon whose conduct the reader is left to moralize. At the head of this class, we may place Le Sage, Smollet, Fielding, Miss Burney, &c.

I know that Mr. Griffin and other advocates for the sentimental and virtuous model, exclaim against the tendency of representing a mixture of virtue and vice in the same character; they will say it is dangerous to bring us into the society of vice, though introduced or accompanied by virtue; for that the hero of our novels, though found sometimes guilty of transgressions, of overleaping the boundaries of virtue and innocence, yet, from the beauty of some humane, or the brilliancy of some heroic action, we are instantly led to extend him our forgiveness, nay, almost to give him a place in our esteem, and consequently, that this must have a tendency to lessen our abhorrence of vice.

All this is plausible, Mr. Saunter, but all this is not cogent. Though there are characters of mingled virtue and vice represented in these novels I advocate, does it necessarily follow, that our abhorrence of vice must be diminished, or that our sense of the obligations of morality and religion are to be shaken, by these representations? They will not say, that the authors appear to have intended to make impressions unfavourable to virtue; where then, let me ask, is the necessity of drawing the above inference? and as it cannot but be admitted, that we possess the faculty of discrimination, why should its proper use be decried in this instance only?

But before I represent the advantages of these writings I advocate, I shall exhibit an objection to the other class, which the sentimental advocates may answer.

If there is not an obvious association of virtue and vice in the characters drawn by Richardson and his imitators, there is a something more dangerous, because less obvious :....A contrast between one virtue or excellency and another; a war of duties, where those of the cardinal sort appear subordinate, because common, while the others are most likely to be preferred, because they come forward only on extraordinary occasions, and are represented so as to attract our admiration; the duty to parents is contrasted by the duties of friendship and love; the virtues of justice, of prudence, and æconomy, are put in competition with the exertion of generosity, of benevolence, and of compassion.

In the enthusiasm of sentiment (says a respectable author), there is as much danger as in the enthusiasm of religion, in substituting certain impulsive feelings in place of real practical duties; and the pupils of these refined sentimentalists are but too apt to talk of virtues they never practise; to pay in words what they owe in actions; and to open their minds to impressions, which have never any effect on their conduct, but are considered as something foreign to, and distinct from it.

This separation of conscience from feeling, I consider to have the most dangerous tendency: it eludes the strongest obligations to rectitude; it blunts the strongest excitements to virtue, when the ties of conscience bind the sentiment, and not the will, and the rewards of feeling crown not the heart, but the imagination.

But the creation of refined and subtle feeling, reared by the authors of the works to which I allude, has an ill effect, not only on our ideas of virtue, but also on our estimate of happiness. That sickly sort of refinement creates imaginary evils and distresses, and imaginary blessings and enjoyments, which embitter the common disappointments, and depreciate the common attainments of life. This affects the temper doubly, both with respect to ourselves and others: with regard to ourselves, from what we think ought to be our lot; with respect to others, from what we believe ought to be their sentiments. It inspires a certain childish pride of our own superior delicacy, and an unfortunate contempt for the plain worth, the ordinary, but useful occupations and ideas of those around us. Besides, the more highly charged the manners of these are, the more hold they take of the imagination, and consequently the more influential they become; but a novel hero or heroine thus described, though without a fault, may be a very unfit model for imitation.

But, sir, the novels of the other class possess an appropriate and considerable merit; they are employed for very useful purposes. By a judicious imitation of manner and character, whose prototype is in nature, they exhibit one of the best modes of instruction; by introducing their personages into such interesting situations, as may actually occur in life, they afford the opportunity of placing in an useful light, whatever is laudable or defective in character or conduct. By these representations, they show the errors into which we may be betrayed by our passions, consequently tend to render virtue amiable, and vice odious. Whence I would infer, that this approximation to the exhibition of real life has a more salutary influence on the taste of society, as well as a greater tendency to promote moral improvement and useful instruction, than Richardson's "faultless monsters, which the world ne'er saw."

The effect of well contrived stories (upon the plan I advocate) towards accomplishing their purposes, is even stronger than any effect that can be produced by simple naked instruction; and hence we find, that the wisest men, in all ages, have more or less employed fiction and fable, as the vehicles of knowledge.

I shall only add, in the words of Dr. Johnson, "It is essential (says he, speaking of youth), it is essential to preserve the imagination sound, as well as pure, and not to allow them to forget, amidst the intricacies of sentiment, and the dreams of sensibility, the truths of reason, and the laws of principle." I am,

Your's, &c.

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

CHAP. XI.

In Continuation....Paper Money.

The paper money above-mentioned was the only engine they had to carry on the war, and was peculiarly characteristic of the Americans; especially when we take into consideration all that preceded, and what happened after its annihilation. In the history of Soulé's above-mentioned I find a passage upon this subject, which, on that account, I will here extract. "The Americans had no naval force, at least a very weak one; they defended themselves in their own country. The theatre of the war gave them innumerable advantages over the English....nothing more forcibly proves their exhausted state; and the obstinacy of the British ministry was not so foolish as has been maintained. Researches of this nature give a very correct idea of the character and manners of a nation, and posterity will, from these proceedings alone, judge with sufficient accuracy, that the inhabitants of the United States had no enthusiasm for the war; that they sold their services to the congress, and sold them very dear; that they were not warriors; that if they for a moment took up arms to defend their neighbourhood, they very soon laid them down again; that their army consisted chiefly of mercenary soldiers; that the love of liberty never inspired them with that magnanimity, which never belies itself, and sacrifices vigour, life, and fortune; and, finally, that they must never be compared with those brave Swiss, and those proud Batavians, who, through the course of a long war, daily opposed their breasts to the spears of the Austrian and Spanish armies, and asked for no other reward, than to die, or to live free. For although we are not informed of the amount of the debt of the Swiss cantons, at the period when they obtained an armistice; and although the negligence of historians has alike left us unacquainted with that of the United Netherlands, at the time when they began to enjoy their independence; it is known, at least, that the debt of the Swiss was next to nothing, and that of the Hollanders, though somewhat more considerable, about two hundred times smaller than that of the United States."

These remarks appear to me evidently just and unanswerable, although in the same book an attempt is made in the paragraphs immediately succeeding to controvert them. "It must be known," will it be said, in justification of the Americans, "how much the independence of the new republics cost them; and in this account the nominal and the real price must not be confounded together. The mass of paper money, which the congress at different periods created, amounts indeed to two hundred millions of dollars, nominal value; but we must examine what was the true value of this paper money, at the time when it came out of the treasury. A soldier, who, at the end of 1779, received forty paper dollars, had in fact no more than he, who, in the years 1775 and 1776, had been paid one paper dollar for the same service, for during those two years the paper money was equal in value with silver. At the end of the year 1779, on the contrary, forty paper dollars were equivalent only to one in silver, and in purchase and sale would pay only for things of equal worth." After giving a scale of the gradual depreciation of the paper money, the author finds that the two hundred millions in paper, which the congress spent, did not exceed the value of thirty-six millions, to those, who received them, and then proceeds to say, "If we now estimate according to this rule, the real value of the two hundred million paper dollars, which the several states created; if we reckon the foreign and domestic debt of the union at about forty-three million dollars, and the debts of the several states at twenty-five millions, we shall find that all these sums together amount to one hundred and forty million of dollars, and of course that the war cost the inhabitants of the United States really not more than this sum. From the battle of Lexington until the termination of hostilities, eight years elapsed. The annual expense amounted to seventeen millions and three hundred thousand dollars, while England spent more than seventeen millions and three hundred thousand guineas every year." But the author does not bring into consideration the small effects which the Americans produced with their seventeen and a half yearly millions of dollars. He does not notice the unbounded weakness and the bad condition of their army. He had not read the letters of general Washington, where all this is painted in lively colours. In this point of view, therefore, the sums expended, in themselves large, become enormous. The author should further have reflected, that with the depreciation of the paper, their military exertions likewise declined, and that owing to the capture of Burgoyne's army, and to the support of France, during the last half of the war, the same exertions, as at first were no longer necessary.

We are therefore compelled to acknowledge that the Americans sold their services, and sold them very dear; that further, they were as dear during the last years of the war, as before the depreciation of the paper money, because the services were likewise less; and finally, that the conclusions, which the author attempts to refute, appear to be perfectly correct. What comparison can then be made between England and America? England sent a large army, provided with every thing, across the Atlantic, and maintained at so great a distance; America had scarcely any army, and provided with nothing sufficiently, and carried on the war at home: England had a naval force, America none; England had besides to do with France, Spain, and Holland, and in the East Indies with Hyder-Ally; America, only with a part of the British forces, and had the support of England's enemies. Besides, the Americans must, it seems, be compared, not with rich, commercial, corrupted nations of Europe, who make no pretensions to republicanism, but with European nations, which have shaken off the yoke of slavery, and how stands the result of the comparison then?

The passage immediately following in my author, characterizes the measure of emitting paper money, and of course the American people, to perfection. "If it be inquired," says he, "in what manner the two masses of continental paper money, and that of the several states, which were given to the citizens of the union for the real worth of seventy-two millions of dollars, could be redeemed with about six millions of real dollars? We answer, that the holders of the paper gradually lost the difference of the sixty-six millions. Every individual contributed so much of the value as the paper money lost, while in his hands. This diminution of value, which they suffered, may be considered as a tax, which the circumstances laid upon them. The citizens of the United States paid thereby a tax of sixty-six million of dollars, and this tax was the most oppressive, because the most unequal." Egotism punishes itself. The Americans, who would make no sacrifices in their war for liberty, and would neither render service to the general interest, without being well paid, nor pay others for performing such service; these Americans, who would have had at once irreconcilable things, it was found necessary to defraud, in order to obtain from them the sums necessary for the common cause. Taxes, they never would have paid; but they had no objection to paper money, because they did not see that it was a bad, though concealed mode of taxation, according to the usual custom of sensual men, who never see beyond the external appearance of things. For these taxes were paid chiefly and almost solely by those, who, to give credit to the public paper, considered it in all their dealings as specie; who sold their real property for it, and consequently, when the paper melted away to nothing, were ruined. Here then is a revolution, which punishes its partizans, by robbing them of their property. The distrustful, the anti-patriots, the royalists, &c. who hastened to purchase lands with the paper which they despised, grew rich. This occasioned a revolution of property, always pernicious to morals, and which made the rich poor, and the poor rich; consequently many people were thrown into a condition for which they were not suited; for in general men are qualified only for that condition, in which they were bred.

*Continuation of the historical Sketch....Peace of Paris.
Disbanding of the Army.*

Is not even the depreciation of the paper money to be imputed to the want of public spirit and patriotism? For if the inhabitants had bound themselves to keep it always up to its original value, equal to that of silver, the Americans would not at this time have been burdened with so great a national debt. Had they been animated with virtuous patriotism, they would not have entrusted to mercenary soldiers, chiefly Europeans, the holy cause of freedom. They would have emulated with each other the honour of fighting for the common welfare, and their warriors satisfied, either with victory in the struggle of liberty, or with dying a glorious death, would have required of the state only food and clothing, but no pay; while their fields would have been tilled by those remaining behind, and whom age or sickness would have withheld from flying to arms.

Such examples of disinterested magnanimity have been seen among the ancient European nations, and, in modern times, among the Swiss. Even in the despotic monarchy of Frederic the second, during the seven years war, proofs of a disinterested, noble patriotism were displayed. The Americans have discovered very little of this way of thinking. A forced loan, like that, which is now taking place in France, would have proved either the patriotism of the people, or the energy of the government. But such a thing would have been so thoroughly impracticable in America, that the Americans abhor the whole French revolution, for this same operation. Had the country-people and the tradesmen furnished the army at the prices customary before the revolution; had they taken for them public promissory notes, bearing a moderate yearly interest until discharged, but which the holder should have been obliged to keep, or at least to endorse, and which according to their amount, as proofs of patriotism, should have entitled him to certain privileges; the paper money would have been unnecessary, and the national debt inconsiderable. Besides, the simplest fiscal operations are the best, and this had the merit of simplicity in the highest degree. But in that case there would have been nothing to be gained by speculators, and of course it could not suit the taste of the Americans. I now hasten to the period, when, by the peace of Paris, the Americans first entered into the list of independent nations. This peace itself would hardly have been obtained, without France and Spain, and had the Americans exerted themselves with more energy, would have been far more advantageous to them. For then, they would beyond all doubt have obtained possession of Canada, Nova Scotia, East and West Florida, and Louisiana, which, by this extension of their empire to its natural boundaries, would have given it a more self-supported security, and have freed them from the dangerous neighbourhood of the English; instead of which their limits, as they now stand, lead to an expectation that their territories will rather be narrowed than extended. The conduct of general Washington after the peace, in resigning his command, and inducing his army to disband themselves, although the public were indebted to them for large arrears of pay, deserves first a minuter inspection.

To thinking men, the question arises here, whether it were better thus to abandon the American people to their own egotism, or to seize, for a time, an unlimited power, in order to establish a competent institution, to ennoble the people, and make them happy? Institutions form, by the means of moral laws and moral arrangements, the character of a people. The legislators of antiquity, by the means of institutions, moulded the people to the constitution. The moderns, who busy themselves only with constitutions, which are but the external forms of governments, have no conception of an institution and its effects, and besides, deem them in our days impracticable. Yet no constitution can attain its purposes without institutions; they are the souls, of which the constitution is the body. But a legislator must be inspired with a genius of the highest order, and there are men of talents, who border upon this highest step without reaching it. Whether Washington belongs to that class, I have neither right nor capacity to decide. But if he really does possess the exalted genius of a legislator, it remains still to inquire whether his nation is capable of good institutions; whether they would not rather have returned to the yoke of England, than submit to a complete melting down of their manners, usages, and laws, and whether they are not in the same predicament as the Corinthians, to whom Plato refused to give laws, because they loved riches, and could not bear equality. Add to this, that the period when a state is forming itself, is the most favourable for an enemy to attack it, and the neighbourhood of the English in Canada, if they had a strong party in the country, was not to be left out of the account. If all these circumstances are considered, I believe general Washington will be readily excused for not having given laws, even if he were equal to the task.

But another question is, whether he ought not to have kept the army together? for a standing army in a republic where no effective national militia exists, would have given it more political importance in foreign countries, and of course more political independence. But this would have drawn upon him, to a degree beyond all description, the hatred of his countrymen, who would have panted again for the English domination, under which they had no army to maintain; and however conformable to the general welfare this measure might be, its consequences would have been unavoidably, that these Americans, who have no feeling for the honour of the state, would have thrown themselves back into the arms of the English.

The third supposition still remains to be considered; namely, that Washington should have kept the army together until the full payment of their arrears, and the fulfilment of the promises of rewards, which had been made to them. It seems as if justice would have required this measure. But if the weakness of the republic, and its incapacity to satisfy those demands were known to him, the case assumes again a different shape, and it is well to suspend our judgment concerning it.

The treatment of these warriors, who had secured by their arms the freedom of the Americans, is at this period, subsequent to the peace of Paris, one of those traits, which most strongly characterize that people. For the sacrifices of the soldiers, to the public, in arrears of pay, and in the promised gift of lands after the peace, certificates were given them. The disbanded soldier, oppressed by poverty, sold to travelling speculators, who easily perceived that they could make a fortune in this way, his certificate, for a trifle of money, which in a few days was drank up in rum; after which beggary was the inevitable destiny of the warrior, while the speculator, to whom afterwards the certificates were paid without deduction, lived in riotous superfluity, spurned from his door the starving soldier, at whose expense he had enriched himself, and rolled in the coach, while its wheels covered the soldier with dirt. This order of things is truly not republican! Could not the soldiers be protected by laws, from the artifices of the speculators? Was it not the duty of the public to provide for their support? Was it not genuine Carthaginian ingratitude, to cast off, as no longer of use, the instruments, which had worked out the American independence, as soon as they had obtained their object? Was it not a barefaced violation of all faith and honour, not to fulfil the promises of rewards so sacredly pledged to the soldiers? It certainly was. But what else could be expected, in a country, where the speculators themselves made the laws, for their own benefit.

CHAP. XIII.

Continuation of the historical Sketch.....The Federal Constitution.

The English and French armies had brought large sums of money during the war to America. A greater degree of national industry had arisen from the interruption of importation, and the Americans had learnt to make for themselves many articles, which they had previously drawn from Europe. At the peace would have been the properest period to apply those sums extant in the country, conformably to the general welfare, to animate these buds of industry, and, by raising manufactures, to give the state a more self-supported independence of other countries. This was the moment to organize America, and to lay the lasting foundation of a flourishing commonwealth. This was the time to give a direction to the sentiments of the people, conformable to a policy of evident importance in theory, and sufficiently proved useful by experience. Instead of this, what was the conduct of the American legislative powers? They set not the smallest limits to importation, or of course to luxury. The only use of the gold and silver in the country, was to clothe the women, with the most impudent extravagance of expense; and when the specie was run out, they continued for some time to purchase in Europe, upon credit, and ended with bankruptcy. Upon this, the whole nation sunk into a most shameful poverty; trade was at an end; distrust became universal. No one paid his debts, for none had money to pay; no one state discharged its quota for the support of the general government, and the interest of the public debt. Evils so great excited apprehensions of a total dissolution of the union, and occasioned, in the year 1787, a convention, to draw up a new plan of government. The want of virtue among the Americans, was, therefore, the cause why they were obliged to abolish a form of government, under which the Swiss have flourished for centuries. Here, then, the event was in direct opposition to the opinion of those politicians, who believe that a corrupted people can subsist better, divided into small republics, than united into one great one. How groundless this theory is, I propose to show in another work. We must blush to find that the luxury of the women was the cause of this revolution. Let that sex be reformed; let it be taught not to command, but to obey; let the connection between the two sexes be regulated, and the societies of mankind will be happy.

It is no sign of the political sagacity of the Americans, if they believed they could preserve a federal republic, under their new constitution. A legislative power extending over the whole, must very soon crush the powers, which give laws to the parts, or in case of resistance by the latter, a dissolution of the union, or a civil war must arise. Two supreme powers or sovereignties in one state are as impossible as two Deities, or two souls in one body. The several objects of legislation are too closely connected together to admit the drawing of a line, within which the several political authorities co-existent in one state, must confine themselves, and which they must not overstep. What a stimulus to anarchy! This is one of the capital failings of the federal constitution, so called, of the Americans, and if a dissolution has not yet taken place, the respect for Washington, whose influence has been hitherto predominant, is the reason of it.

It appears, therefore, that it would have been better, entirely to abolish the legislative powers of the states, and to have entrusted the whole to congress; at least in that case there would have been unity in the constitution. The distribution of the powers in the congress itself, which consists of two branches, a house of representatives and a senate, appears not specially adapted to the general welfare; for treaties with foreign powers can only be concluded by the consent of two-thirds of the senate, and this same senate is the tribunal, which tries offences against the state. If, therefore, the house of representatives should find in a treaty cause for impeachment against those, who concluded it; the latter would be judges in their own cause, and would undoubtedly acquit themselves. This arrangement is contrary to every principle. In England, the upper house possesses a judicial, but no part of the executive power; and, in this respect, the constitution there is incomparably better; but the senate of congress is besides exclusively chosen among the wealthy class. But the richest of the Americans are not those, who possess the largest cultivated farms; they are those, who have contrived to obtain the most credit, who circulate the most paper, who display the greatest luxury, &c. even though they should not pay their debts, as indeed follows of course from such things. In a word the speculators, especially in lands, compose this class. Speculators have no interest in the welfare of the nation. On the other hand, freeholders, who cultivate their own lands, who might be called the class of producers of raw materials, are most interested in the general welfare, and in proportion to the extent of their possessions. There is, I believe, little to object against the aristocracy of this class; it is the best, if the aristocracy of the wise must be given up. But in America, the laws are so constituted, that commercial speculators necessarily possess the greatest influence; and as the senate is chosen out of this class, there is reason to believe that this body consists of monied aristocrats and usurers, who thus exclusively possess the power of making treaties and conferring public offices.

This monied aristocracy, the worst of all, is yet more striking among a people, whose veneration for wealth is unbounded, and almost exclusive; for, generally speaking, the Americans esteem nothing but money. The anti-chambers of the speculators are always filled with servile creditors, who come trembling to solicit payment of their dues, which, however, they very seldom obtain.

CHAP. XIV.

In Continuation.....The Federal Constitution.....Want of Republicanism in the Practice.....Election of a President.

If the constitution itself has great defects, the manner, in which the people conduct themselves in executing it, is by no means republican. Before the election, those, who possess the most influence assemble together at a tavern, call themselves a committee, and publish a list of candidates. At the election, the attendance of the inhabitants is far from being universal: many stay carelessly at home, and most of the others give their votes to persons, for whom men of influence solicit them. So that properly the American people make no decision at all; they suffer a few individuals to think and act for them. Such a people is not republican, not free, for it has no general will. It must, however, be observed, that all this applies less to New-England and the southern states, but is chiefly the case in Pennsylvania, and the other middle states.

For this reason, the transactions of the legislative representative assemblies cannot be considered as the expression of the general will. In England, where there is properly no representation, this is not surprising; nor is it to be expected in the senate of congress, which is not elected by the people. But even the houses of representatives of the several states, who are nearest to the people, do what they please, without concerning themselves about their constituents; hence one set of representatives often throw down what their predecessors built up, which abuse is owing to a want of public spirit.

Representative constitutions, in general, bear an uncommon resemblance to aristocratic despotism; but they are, in their nature, less systematic in their measures than hereditary aristocracies.... Changes of things, according to the alternate domination of parties, is peculiar to them. Finally, a people, which should always choose none but the best of their fellow-citizens as representatives, would certainly be wise enough to practise themselves the legislative power without substitution. When this is not the case, the other will be alike unavailing, and all the expected good effects of representation nugatory.

That a president of the United States, not a president of congress, for there is no such officer under the new constitution, should be re-eligible at the expiration of his time, is certainly contrary to the acknowledged principles of republican constitutions, which consider a rotation of the highest offices as necessary, to prevent a concentration of power in the hands of one individual. But among a people inspired with no republican spirit, the choice of a new head to the administration, is a revolution: for the measures of the legislative power, among such a people, will always be those, of the president, or individual first magistrate. Sensual people have always an idol of the day, a physical centre of power, which they worship; sensual men cannot abstract; but the general good, the essence of the republic, is an abstraction; principles are abstractions; of course they can never be the central point of such men. This is the case with the Americans, and hence their constitution has the defects of a hereditary monarchy, in a still higher degree than monarchy itself. Inconsistency has been with justice imputed to monarchies, inasmuch as every successive prince usually does the contrary of what his predecessor did. But among the Americans, if a new president were chosen every four years, there would be as often a revolution in the measures of the government. In this respect, therefore, the rule that a president may always be re-chosen, though in itself a defect, is very salutary. A permanent system, and consistency of measures, are to be expected only in constitutions, where a senate, not chosen by the people, exists. This was the strength of ancient Rome: the senate made her the mistress of the world.

It must further be observed, that if the will of the president always prevails, it is only in so far as it does not counteract the egotism of the other men in power, and properly, that of the whole people; which would really happen, if he should make the general welfare his aim. On this point, the Americans will take no joke, and their resistance would be insuperable. This may be illustrated by the example of England. So long as a king of England leaves unhurt the representation in parliament, so called, that is, the right of the electors to sell their votes to the candidate, and that of the members of parliament to sell theirs to the crown, he may govern despotically; the difference between that and other despotisms is only, that he must buy the power of doing the wrong, which he intends, whereas others can practice without paying for their crimes. But no sooner is this right itself, so precious, for the profit connected with it, attacked, than a revolution arises, and the kings are beheaded or expelled.

For the reasons above-mentioned, I am of opinion, it would be best to choose the president for life. At least in that case there would be security for a longer period, from the dangerous crisis of an election, and from changes in the measures of government. In the choice itself, the people has not the smallest share; the legislative assemblies of the states, consisting, for the most part, in a senate and a lower house, appoint from among themselves as many electors as the state has representatives and senators in congress. These persons elect the president of the United States. Such an election does not prove, then, that the person chosen is the man of the people, who had no co-operation whatever in the choice; it only shews what party happens at the time to have the upper hand in the majority of the state assemblies. I say happens, because even the immediate representatives, as I have before observed, do not express the will of the people. But such an election is dangerous, because if several state legislatures should choose different persons, a separation might easily be the consequence. This is now, after the retirement of general Washington, the case. Virginia and the southern states, in general, are French and democratic in sentiment, and their man is Mr. Jefferson. The northern states are English and aristocratic, and their choice may fall upon Jay or Adams*. The division into states, which is yet preserved, contributes most to this; for if the whole were one republic, no man could think of a separation, without being treated as a rebel. But the word state awakens the idea of an independent sovereignty, of which only certain branches have been surrendered to the union, which may be taken back, and a separation ensue, notwithstanding all the laws extant to the contrary. But if the people were to chuse immediately the president; were measures taken to oblige every individual to give his vote; party spirit would not be able to put itself in opposition against a choice, which then would be the indubitable expression of the will of an absolute majority of the people. The present arrangement, in this respect, is, in my judgment, most injudicious; and the monied aristocracy, who dictated this part of the constitution, discovered themselves in this point extremely short-sighted, a property, which generally, for the misfortune of egotism, accompanies everywhere its steps. It must, however, not be forgotten, that I deem the person, and the election of the president so important, not on account of his prerogatives, which are by no means too great, but on account of his influence, from the causes above-mentioned.

CHAPTER XV.

Continuation of the historical Sketch..... Establishments made under the Federal Constitution..... The Excise, &c.

This constitution, therefore, so cried up as a masterly work, is, as I believe I have shewn, by no means a master-piece of human wisdom. We will now proceed in our rapid historical sketch, which I confine to characteristic facts, and see whether the American history, since the introduction of this federal constitution so called, furnishes better proofs of the republican virtue and wisdom of the nation, than what has preceded; whether the internal administration of the state, and the morals, were regenerated; whether a formidable defensive system, and, founded upon it, a firm, generous, and morally good system of foreign policy, has been followed or not.

The excise upon brandy was one of the first operations of the new government. The drinking of brandy was not in the smallest degree diminished by this tax; for the lovers of that liquor are addicted to it, to their last gasp. Nor was morality at all contemplated as an object of the law, since it must have operated against the purpose of the tax, which was the payment of interest upon the national debt. The distilling of brandy, since brandy will at any rate be drank, is a branch of internal industry; and it is better to make it at home, than to import it from abroad. Here we see at once the spirit of import and export speculation, among the rulers, endeavouring to stifle in their birth all inland manufactures. A tax upon uncultivated lands would have answered the purpose of this impolitic excise, and, besides, have promoted the general welfare. It would have put an end to corrupt land speculations, and very soon have converted the forests into fruitful fields; for then it would have been impossible to possess many millions of acres, producing nothing, and for which, at the same time, a tax must have been paid. The speculators, then, would have been obliged to sell their deserts, cheap and at once, in small portions to the poor, who would have cultivated them. But now, having nothing to pay for their extensive tracts of land, they can wait their own time, and sell none of them, until they have risen very high, and will pay back the money advanced upon them, with very large profits. Hence it is very difficult for the poor to obtain land cheap, in a part of the world, where such extensive ranges of woods only wait for the hand of the laborious planter, to be transformed from gloomy wilds into smiling fields, adorned with golden harvests. Hence the dispersed situation of the inhabitants on the boundaries, which dooms them to poverty beyond description, and exposes them to be surprised by the Indians; for they push forward to the inmost parts of the forest, in order there to clear some land, unknown to the proprietor, from whom they can purchase none; from which property, so honestly acquired, they are afterwards often expelled. The public good requires the utmost possible production of the useful fruits of the earth, which is hereby impeded. But the fault is in the people themselves, inasmuch as every one, who has money, prefers speculation to farming. These land-speculators create a very pernicious uncertainty and insecurity of property; for as land may pass, perhaps, through the hands of ten speculators in one day, and many of these gentlemen sell the same thing twice over, there is no security against earlier pretensions, and thus people are often expelled from lands, after clearing them at great expense; or else obliged to purchase them a second time. This is a thing universally known, against which the laws give no protection. A land-tax would put an end immediately to all these wrongs; but instead of that a pernicious excise was introduced.

Very high imposts were laid upon imported goods. The selfish stupidity of the country people made them imagine that they were not the people, who should pay any thing towards this tax, because by it nothing was directly levied upon them; though no proof can be necessary, that the consumer pays the whole, and the merchant no part of it. It seems, to be sure, as if the erection of manufactures would be thereby encouraged; but in truth it is not, since, far from making any advances, or giving any premiums for that object, no bounds whatsoever were set to the exportation of necessary productions. This exportation makes every thing, and of course labour, very dear; it is pernicious even to agriculture, by giving instability to the price of lands, so that at certain periods they rise enormously, and then again sink very low. Thus whoever purchases in dear times, is ruined when the prices fall. Besides labour rises still more than the value of produce; for the labourers, owing to their small numbers in proportion to those of Europe, have it in their power to prescribe their own prices, instead of submitting to those of the proprietors. I know that near Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, in the year 1796, a day labourer, during the harvest, demanded a rixdollar and sixteen groshen (a dollar and a quarter), a pint of Madeira wine, and a half-pint of rum a day, and received it. The price of wheat, and of the other necessary productions of the earth, should be fixed, and their exportation prohibited, whenever they should rise beyond it (a dollar a bushel for wheat, for instance, and the rest in proportion); or magazines should be formed when corn is cheap, and then sold again, without profit, when it grows dear. It is altogether pernicious for agriculture to permit the exportation of horses, and especially of the cattle so necessary for farming. This should be entirely prohibited. There can never be too many of them.

Population increases in proportion with the superfluity of provisions. This may be demonstrated upon grounds both physical and moral; and mankind, like other animals, increase wherever there are plentiful means of subsistence. Hence all exportation is to be considered as weakening the state. Good articles are given, to receive adulterated things in return, and the raising of prices occasioned by the transportation, and which is always in proportion to its extent, is always a great loss for the mass of the people, though a gain for the merchant. Hence the general utility of foreign commerce is very questionable; for there is, in truth, no country, which, with improved cultivation, could not produce all its wants, even those of real comfort, and not founded alone upon opinion, and America, on account of its extent, and of its variety of climates, is peculiarly fitted for this. But commerce connects nations together, is perhaps the only means to promote the general improvement of human society, and even if we might live better without it, we are at least more enlightened by it; and the culture of mankind gains, even though the culture of the ground should lose by it. We must respect it as an instrument of Providence, to forward the perfection of the whole human race, upon this earthly ball.

MARRIED, at Brunswick, New-Jersey, STEPHEN VAN RENSSELAER, late lieutenant governor of New-York, to Miss CORNELIA PATERSON, daughter of the honourable William Paterson, one of the judges of the supreme court of the United States.

OBITUARY.

DIED, at Mount Vernon, on Saturday evening, the 22d ultimo, Mrs. MARTHA WASHINGTON, widow of the late illustrious general GEORGE WASHINGTON. To those amiable and Christian virtues, which adorn the female character, she added dignity of manners, superiority of understanding, a mind intelligent and elevated. The silence of respectful grief is our best eulogy.

[Washington Federalist.]

DIED, at Bedford, yesterday morning, after a short and severe illness, in the 45th year of her age, Mrs. SARAH JAY, the amiable and much respected wife of his excellency John Jay, late governor of this state, and one of the daughters of the late governor Livingston, deceased.

The language of eulogium on the dead is too common, and too indiscriminate to entitle it always to respect. The writer of this feeble tribute to the memory of departed worth, cannot, however, but indulge the hope that when it meets the eye of living recollection, it will be allowed to be neither feigned nor exaggerated. All, who had the happiness of an intimate acquaintance with Mrs. Jay, will bear testimony to the uncommon merits of the woman....the amiableness of the friend....the cheerful, placid temper of the wife....the tenderness of the mother....the elegant accomplishments of the lady....the unaffected piety of the Christian.

"From an admiring world she chose to fly;
With Nature there retir'd and Nature's God,
The silent paths of wisdom trod,
And banish'd every passion from her breast,
But those, the gentlest and the best,
Whose holy flames with energy divine
The virtuous heart enliven and improve,
The conjugal and the maternal love."

[New-York Evening Post.]

DIED, at sea, on his return from the island of Trinidad, Mr. Jasper McCall, of this city; a respectful son, an affectionate brother, and a warm friend. If candour, liberality, and the highest sense of honour may claim regard, we shall deplore the loss, and revere the memory of this excellent young man.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

AMONG the newest and most delightful miscellanies, lately received from England, may be ranked a poetical work, entitled "Tales of Terror." This is partly intended as a burlesque of the various ballads in Lewis's celebrated romance, "The Monk." We well remember, that this member of the British parliament has amused himself, and alarmed his readers, by resorting to the cells of Gothic superstition, and invoking all the forms of German horror, to appal every timid heart. Hence, we have been haunted by ghosts of all complexions; and "Cloud Kings," and "Water Kings," and "Fire Kings," have been crowned by this poetical magician, to rule with despotism in the realms of Fancy. A lively satirist, endowed with the gifts of Genius, easy in versification, pleasant in his humour, and inimitably successful in parody, has, in some of his "Tales of Terror," undertaken to mock the doleful notes of Mr. Lewis's muse, or shall we rather say the hoarse caw of the German raven. The midnight hour has been beguiled, by transcribing the following sarcasm, founded on a well-known nursery story, and our readers will thank us for sitting up so late for their amusement.

THE WOLF KING;

OR

LITTLE RED RIDING HOOD.

AN OLD WOMAN'S TALE.

Veteres avias tibi de pulmone revello.....PERSIUS.

Translated from the Danish of the author of the Water King, &c. and respectfully inscribed to M. G. Lewis, Esq. M. P. as an humble attempt to imitate his excellent version of that celebrated ballad.

The birds they sung, the morning smil'd
The mother kiss'd her darling child,
And said...."My dear, take custards three,
And carry to your grandmummie."

The pretty maid had on her head
A little riding hood of red,
And as she pass'd the lonely wood,
They call'd her small red riding hood.

Her basket on her arm she hung,
And as she went thus artless sung:
"A lady liv'd beneath a hill,
Who, if not gone, resides there still."

The wolf king saw her pass along,
He ey'd her custards heard her song,
And cried "That child and custards three
This evening shall my supper be!"

Now swift the maid pursu'd her way,
And heedless trill'd her plaintive lay;
Nor had she pass'd the murky wood,
When lo! the wolf king near her stood.

"Oh! stop my pretty child so gay!
Oh! whither do you bend your way?"
"My little self and custards three Are going to my grandmummie."

"While you by yonder mountain go,
On which the azure blue bells grow,
I'll take this road; then haste thee, dear,
Or I before you will be there.

"And when our racing shall be done,
A kiss you forfeit, if I've won;
Your prize shall be, if first you come,
Some barley sugar and a plumb."

"Oh! thank you, good sir Wolf," said she,
And dropt a pretty courtesie:
The little maid then onward hied,
And sought the blue bell mountain side.

The wolf sped on o'er marsh and moor,
And faintly tapp'd at granny's door:
"Oh! let me in, grandmummy good,
For I am small red riding hood."

"The bobbin pull (the grandam cried),
The door will then fly open wide."
The crafty wolf the bobbin drew,
And straight the door wide open flew.

He pac'd the bed room eight times four,
And utter'd thrice a hideous roar;
He pac'd the bed room nine times three,
And then devour'd poor grandmummie.

He dash'd her brains out on the stones,
He gnaw'd her sinews, crack'd her bones;
He munch'd her heart, he quaff'd her gore,
And up her lights and liver tore!!!!

Grandmummy's bed he straight got in,
Her night-cap tied beneath his chin;
And, waiting for his destin'd prey,
All snug between the sheets he lay.

Now at the door a voice heard he,
Which cried...."I've brought you custards three;
Oh! let me in, grandmummy good,
For I am small red riding hood."

"The bobbin pull (the wolf king cried),
The door will then fly open wide."
The little dear the bobbin drew,
And straight the door wide open flew†.

She plac'd the custards on the floor,
And sigh'd...."I wish I'd brought you four."
I'm very tir'd, dear grandmummie;
Oh! may I come to bed to thee?"

"Oh come! (the wolf king softly cried),
And lie, my sweet one, by my side."
Ah! little thought the child so gay
The cruel wolf king near her lay!

"Oh! tell me, tell me, granny dear,
Why does your voice so gruff appear?"
"Oh! hush, sweetheart (the wolf king said),
I've got a small cold in my head!"

* This stanza is borrowed from an affecting and sanguinary description in a German ballad, by professor Von Splutzbach, called Skulth den Balch, or Sour Mithltz; in English, as far as translation can convey an idea of the horror of the original, "The Bloody Banquet, or the Gulph of Ghosts!!" a very terrible and meritorious production.

† Repetition is the soul of ballad writing.

‡ The reader will do my heroine the justice to remember, that she set out with only three, consequently her wish that another had been added, arose from a motive purely affectionate and characteristic. This benevolent trait, thus ingeniously insinuated, excites the interest of the reader for her, and adds horror to the catastrophe.

"Oh! tell me, grandmummie so kind,
Why you've a tail grows out behind?"
"Oh! hush thee, hush thee, pretty dear,
My pincushion I hang on here!"

"Why do your eyes so glare on me?"
"They are your pretty face to see."
"Why do your ears so long appear?"
"They are your pretty voice to hear."

"Oh! tell me, granny, why to-night
Your teeth appear so long and white?"
Then, growling, cried the wolf so grim,
"They are to tear you limb from limb!"

His hungry teeth the wolf king gnash'd,
His sparkling eyes with fury flash'd;
He op'd his jaws all sprent with blood,
And fell on small red riding hood.

He tore out bowels one and two,
"Little maid, I will eat you!"
But when he tore out three and four,
The little maid she was no more!

Take warning hence, ye children fair;
Of wolves' insidious arts beware;
And, as you pass each lonely wood,
Ah! think of small red riding hood!

With custards sent, nor loiter slow,
Nor gather blue bells as ye go;
Get not to bed with grandmummie,
Lest she a ravenous wolf should be!

MALLET, who wrote a life of Bacon, which even French philosophers might pronounce superficial, and some heavy plays and poems, which are no longer read, stole, or invented, a charming ballad, of the pathetic class, well known by the name of William and Margaret. He has been suspected, in the composition of this ballad, of borrowing a hint from Fletcher's "Knights of the Burning Pestle," and even of poaching among the English black-letter for the form of his stanza, and the cast of his sentiments. However, his lays, whether original or purloined, have always gained the meed of the critic, and often moistened the eye of the maiden. But the above merry zany of the muses will not spare the tender, more than the terrific style; and, with the wand of Travestie, he has thus ingeniously bewitched a far-famed legend.

THE SCULLION SPRITE;

OR

THE GARRET GOBLIN.

A ST. GILES'S TALE.

Written by a boot-catcher at "The Fig and Pepper Box," in imitation of Mallet's William and Margaret.

Ah! who can see, and seeing not admire,
Whene'er she sets the pot upon the fire!
Her hands outshine the fire and redder things;
Her eyes are blacker than the pot she brings.

SHESTONE.

'Twas at the hour when sober cits
Their eyes in slumber close;
In bound'd Bet Scullion's greasy ghost,
And pinch'd Tom Ostler's toes!

Her flesh was like a roasting pig's,
So deadly to the view,
And coal black was her smutty hand,
That held her apron blue.

So shall the reddest chops appear,
When life's last coal expires;
Such is the garb that cooks must wear,
When death has quench'd their fires.

Her face was like a raw beef steak,
Just ready to be fried;
Carrots had budded on her cheek,
And beet-root's crimson pride.

* Our heroine is here lost in double astonishment; not only the length, but the whiteness of her grandmother's teeth excites her wonder and suspicion.

But love had, like the flyblow's power,
Despoil'd her buxom hue;
The fading carrot left her cheek,
She died at twenty-two!

"Awake!" she cried, "Bet Scullion bawls!
Come from her garret high;
Now hear the maid for whom you scorn'd
A wedding ring to buy."

"This is the hour, when scullion ghosts
Their dish-clouts black resume,
And goblin cooks ascend the loft,
To haunt the faithless groom!"

"Bethink thee of thy tester broke,
Thy disregarded oath;
And give me back my mutton pies,
And give me back my broth,"

"How could you swear my sops were nice,
And yet those sops forsake?
How could you steal my earthen dish,
And dare that dish to break?"

"How could you promise lace to me
And give it all to Nan?
How could you swear my goods were safe,
Yet lose my dripping pan?"

"How could you say my pouting lip
With purl and Holland vies?
And why did I, sad silly fool,
Believe your cursed lies?"

"Those sops, alas! no more are nice!
Those lips no longer pout!
And dark and cold's the kitchen grate,
And every spark is out!"

"The hungry worm my master is,
His cook I now remain;
Cold lasts our night, till that last morn
Shall raise my crust again."

"The kitchen clock has warn'd me hence,
I've other fish to fry;
Low in her grave, thou sneaking cur,
Behold Bet Bouncer lie!"

The morning smiled, the stable boys
Their greasy nightcaps doff'd;
Tom Ostler scratch'd his greasy head,
And swearing, left the loft.

He hid him to the kitchen grate,
But ah! no Bet was there;
He stretch'd him on the hearth, where erst
Poor Betty plied her care:

And thrice he sobb'd Bet Bouncer's name,
And blew his nose quite sore;
Then laid his cheek on the cold hob,
And horse rubb'd never more.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. HENRY ADDINGTON.

A SUDDEN and unexpected elevation naturally attracts the notice, and even the wonder, of mankind. We are eager to ask, what are the merits, the talents, and the qualifications that lead to unexampled success? We are desirous of being acquainted with the road that conducts her favourite votary to the shrine of Fortune; and we pant with expectation to become acquainted with the life, the education, the friendships, and the pursuits of such a man, hoping from these to deduce the motives by which his conduct has been actuated, and the secret by which he has been enabled to attain the summit of ambition.

Mr. Addington is the son of a physician of some eminence, who died about eleven years since*,

* Dr. Addington died March 21, 1790. He was educated at Trinity College, Oxford, where he took the degrees of M. A. May 13, 1740, B. M. February 5, 1740-41, and D. M. January 24, 1744. He was admitted of the college of phyafter having practised with equal celebrity and success. That gentleman, during the whole of his life, appears to have been a great politician*, and to have studied, with equal attention, the constitution of a patient, and the constitution of the state.

Dr. Addington started originally at Reading, where he kept a private madhouse, and married a Miss Hiley, the daughter of an eminent schoolmaster of that place, with whom he obtained a fortune of 15,000l. On this he came to London, set up an equipage, and suddenly attained great practice, he and the late Dr. Heberden being then the two physicians most in vogue in the capital. Having obtained a considerable addition to his wealth, Dr. A. retired to Berkshire, and spent the remainder of his life there.

Henry Addington, the present chancellor of the exchequer, was born in or about the year 1756. He and his brother, John Hiley, were sent together, at a proper age, to Cheam school, where they remained for some time under the Rev. Mr. Gilpin*; and it is not a little remarkable, that, in all their future pursuits, whether in search of knowledge, in the mazes of politics, or in the career of preferment, they have never been once separated. The two brothers afterwards went to Winchester school, over which Dr. Wharton, at that period, presided; thence they repaired to Dr. Goodenough's at Ealing; and finally, they removed to Oxford, where their father himself had been bred.

In the mean time, the political tenets of Dr. Addington had led to a connexion with the family of the late earl of Chatham, whose friend and physician he was, which, in the end, produced the aggrandizement of his own.

The doctor entertained a high opinion of the abilities and integrity of the first Mr. Pitt, who, to an eloquence far more resplendent than that of his younger son, added great practical talents, a scorn of oppression, and a noble pride, which made him spurn at every thing that bore the semblance of corruption.

During the latter part of lord Chatham's life, he lived in great intimacy with that nobleman, and such was the confidence subsisting between them, that, when a negotiation was opened with the late earl of Bute, respecting his return to power, he acted as the plenipotentiary of the ex-minister.†† sicians in London 1756, wrote a pamphlet on the scurvy, and another concerning a negotiation with lord Bute.

* Dr. Addington was sent for by a gentleman, whose son was supposed to be at the point of death. While the doctor was in the sick room, the family assembled below, in anxious expectation, and, after a long and painful pause, a near relation of the patient hurried out of the room, to inquire the reason of his delay. On the stairs, he found the physician and apothecary, who was a Foxite, involved in a dispute about the India bill. "Dear sir," said the young man, labouring with fraternal affection, and angry with the physician, "there is no one, in this house, denies the transcendent merits of the heroes of Burton-Pynsent (alluding to lord Chatham's family), but my poor brother will, I fear, be dead before you get through the India bill." The medical practitioner felt the hint, went in, and prescribed..... Anecd. and Biog. p. 5.

† The Reverend Haviland John Hiley, M. A. of Balliol College, Oxford.

† He is said to have retired with 100,000 pounds.

‡ This gentleman, so called after his maternal grandfather, was left a considerable fortune by a relation, while an infant in the cradle.

§ Mr. Gilpin entertained a high notion of Mr. Henry Addington's abilities, in consequence of which, he very candidly advised his father to finish his education at some great public school.

†† "In the very week of this transaction (a negotiation concerning France) an extraordinary affair happened relative to our hero, which afterwards furnished a subject of much disquisition. It was a transaction between the earl of Bute and lord Chatham. As the affair is involved in considerable obscurity, I will first simply state the facts, as they appear upon the face of the evidence.

"Sir James Wright, an intimate friend of lord Bute, and Dr. Addington, an eminent physician, who attended the

It may be naturally supposed, that this, of course, led to an intimacy between their families, and we accordingly find, that the young Pitts and the young Addingtons, early in life, cultivated a friendship with each other, which received a fresh increase, when Mr. William Pitt became a member of the society of Lincoln's Inn, and Mr. Henry Addington entered his name as a student, and eat commons at the same hall.

Mr. Addington, who was thus destined for the bar, might, in time, have obtained a silk gown, and perhaps risen to the dignity of a Welch judge; but he soon found, that a wig of another kind suited his head far better than that of the president of a provincial judicature: nor was he mistaken in his hopes. The brilliant career of his young friend already pointed to the first offices of the state, and Mr. Addington was drawn up to power and consequence, in the vortex of his successful ambition.

We soon find him occupying a seat in parliament, declaiming against Mr. Fox's coalition with lord North, opposing the India bill of that gentleman, and smoothing his friend's way, by an oily eloquence, rather than a transcendent oratory, to the summit of power. No sooner was this attained, on the part of Mr. Pitt, than Mr. Addington began to taste those crumbs of comfort, in the shape of official emoluments, which he is now enabled so plentifully to bestow: but a more lucrative situation awaited him, which, after a warm struggle, he obtained in 1789, in a manner highly honourable to himself.

Mr. now lord Grenville, was, at this period, speaker of the house of commons; and it was deemed necessary that he should be elevated to one of the highest departments in the state. The friends of Mr. Addington immediately pointed him out as a proper person to succeed him. The marquis of Graham accordingly, on Monday, July 8, 1789, after a high eulogium on his talents, moved "that he should take the chair." Sir Gilbert Elliot was proposed by Mr. Welbore Ellis, now lord Mendip; and on the division, the numbers appeared, for Mr. Addington 215, for sir Gilbert Elliot 142...majority 73. Mr. Addington accordingly assumed the insignia of office; but, when he addressed the king on the occasion, he was pleased to observe, with becoming modesty, "that he felt himself unequal to the arduous task, which the partiality of that house had imposed upon him, and hoped his majesty would be pleased, by his royal disapprobation of their present choice, to afford his faithful commons an opportunity of electing a person better qualified to discharge the duties of an office so important."

LITERARY INTELLIGENCE.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

TO gratify that passion for biography, so natural to all curious and literary men, Conrad and Co. of this city, have published a life of Kotzebue, written by himself. This book appears to be selected more because it is the life of one, who has rendered himself conspicuous by a series of popular plays, than because it records any signal example of worth. It is, however, a curious history of an eccentric enthusiast; and the picture of Paris, which this German has painted, will attract many wondering eyes.

The booksellers advertise a London romance, with the odd title of "Old Nick." It seems as though the adventure of modern authorship was determined to go to the devil for a name. The book, however, which has this repulsive title, contains nothing diabolical, but much merriment, and agreeable instruction.

We observe with pleasure, that the London booksellers have published a new edition of Dr. Stirling's valuable version, for the use of schools, of the beautiful Latinity of PHOEDRUS. This author is one of the most able pioneers to smooth the avenue to the knowledge of the language of the Romans. His stories amuse the mind, and his verse satisfies the ear. Mr. GIBSON, a competent judge, thus accurately weighs his merit in the critical scale.

The use of fables or apologues, has been approved in every age, from ancient India to modern Europe. They convey, in familiar images, the truths of morality and prudence; and the most childish understanding, I advert to the scruples of Rousseau, will not suppose either that beasts do speak, or that men may lie. A fable represents the genuine character of animals; and a skilful master may extract from Pliny and Buffon, some pleasing lessons of natural history, a science well adapted to the taste and capacity of children. The Latinity of Phædrus is not exempt from an alloy of the silver age; but his manner is concise, terse, and sententious: the Thracian slave discreetly breathes the spirit of a freeman; and when the text is sound, the style is perspicuous. But his fables, after a long oblivion, were first published by Peter Pithou, from a corrupt manuscript. The labours of fifty editors confess the defects of the copy, as well as the value of the original; and the school-boy may have been whipt for misapprehending a passage, which Bentley could not restore, and which Burman could not explain.

TO THE PUBLIC.

The numerous subscribers, who are indebted to the Editor, some five talents, and some ten, are respectfully invited to inclose them in letters, post paid. Unless the Editor receive more liberal aid, he must, at the close of the present year, lock up his Port Folio.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

THE article "Levity," promised in last week's paper, is postponed.

We are happy to gratify our friend, J. M. by inserting a version from the Spanish.

"ASMODEO" is a poet, whose productions shall always have a prior place in this paper.

"HOLLIS" has imitated Sterne, more happily, than has been hitherto achieved. We thank Hollis for past favours, and hope earnestly for more.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following anecdote will shed light on a passage in a favourite novel.

At Paris, Dr. Smollet formed an acquaintance with some Scottish gentlemen, exiled from their country, in consequence of having been engaged in the rebellion of 1745. These were the persons alluded to in volume second of Peregrine, whom Pickle meets at Boulogne, on their return from their diurnal pilgrimage to the sea-side, to indulge their eyes with a prospect of the white cliffs of Albion, which they were never more to approach. Mr. Hunter, of Burnside, was the individual among them, who is mentioned as having wept bitterly over the misfortune of having involved a beloved wife and three children in misery and distress; and, in the impatience of his grief, having cursed his own fate with frantic imprecations. Dr. Moore, who was with Dr. Smollet at Paris, in the year 1750, heard Mr. Hunter express himself in this manner to Dr. Smollett, and, at the same time, relate the affecting visit, which he and his companions daily made to the sea-side, when they resided at Boulogne.

IT is not the least of the glories which cluster round the character of Sir SIDNEY SMITH, that he has been thus praised by one, who, far from a vulgar republican, could eloquently appreciate merit, and generously reward it.

Faithful, zealous, and ardent in the service of his king and country; full of spirit, full of resources: going out of the beaten road, but going right, because his uncommon enterprize was not conducted by a vulgar judgment.

John Bowles, Esq. a nervous political writer, thus derides those absurd forms of government, which are dictated and moulded by a majority told by the head.

earl of Chatham, had repeatedly entertained each other with political conversation, in which the names of their respective patrons were introduced. The frequent recurrence of this theme was, it seems, first animadverted upon by sir James, or one of his friends, and it was thought proper, in consequence, to communicate the purport of these conversations to lord Bute. Thus the circumstance is related in one part of the account, published in sir James's own name; though elsewhere he seems to say, that the communication was made at the immediate request of Dr. Addington. Lord Bute, in answer, wished the doctor to be requested to assure lord Chatham, that, "if he should think proper to take an active part in administration, he should have his most hearty concurrence, and sincere good wishes." He said, "For his own part, nothing but the most imminent danger to this country should induce him to take a part in the government of it, in conjunction with an able and upright administration." In the mean time, Dr. Addington did not choose to engage in so extraordinary an affair, without having his commission in writing. Sir James accordingly sent him a letter next morning, containing the above sentiments. Dr. Addington says, in his narrative, that sir James added verbally, that "Lord Bute was willing to engage in such an administration, as secretary of state, and that no objection could be made to lord Camden, or more than one of lord Chatham's friends." This addition is peremptorily denied by sir James, who ascribes it to Dr. Addington's confounding the hypothetical conversation that preceded the negotiation, with the negotiation itself.

"The answer lord Chatham dictated to sir James's letter, which is very full and explicit, I shall beg leave to add. "Lord Chatham heard, with particular satisfaction, the favourable sentiments, on this subject, of the noble lord, with whom you have talked, with regard to the impending ruin of the kingdom. He fears all hope is precluded: but adds, that zeal, duty, and obedience, may outlive hope; that, if any thing can prevent the consummation of public ruin, it can only be new counsels, and new counsellors, without further loss of time; a real change, from a sincere conviction of past errors, and not a mere palliation, which must prove fruitless." In answer to Dr. Addington's verbal communication, which was not made till after writing the above note, lord Chatham affirmed, that "it was impossible for him to serve the king and country, with either lord Bute or lord North;" and he desired Dr. Addington, if any one asked about it, "to bear witness that he had said so."

The expression, "real change," in the note, struck, it seems, both sir James and his patron, as pointing at that nobleman. An answer was immediately returned, in which lord Bute disclaimed having seen the king for many years, or known any thing of public affairs, but from common conversation or the newspapers. At the same time, sir James informed Dr. Addington, that his stay in town could be of no service.....The History of the Life of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham, p. 263.

* The Addingtons exerted themselves in a very particular manner, during the king's illness. At that critical moment, the opinion of Dr. Addington, who had paid much attention to cases of insanity, was of great weight. When examined before the house of lords, he drew a favourable inference from his majesty's "not having had any previous melancholy!" and held forth the prospect of speedy convalescence. In short, his hopes, afterwards so happily real-

Such a constitution, besides its practical defects, is founded upon the absurd and mischievous principle, that those to govern should be subordinate, and those to be governed supreme. It requires no great degree of discernment to discover that such a system, like an inverted pyramid, must quickly fall.

Much anxiety is hourly manifested, respecting the proposed publication of a Columbian dictionary. Some are of opinion, that the work is suspended till the lexicographer shall have received certain words from the vocabulary of the Esquimaux. Others affirm that he pauses until it be settled, whether lengthy or longsome be the purer word.

To those, who relish a peace with the regicide republic, on any terms, we recommend the following remark by BURKE.

We are apt to speak of a low and pusillanimous spirit, as the ordinary cause, by which dubious wars terminate in humiliating treaties. It is here the direct contrary. I am perfectly astonished at the boldness of character, at the intrepidity of mind, the firmness of nerve in those, who are able, with deliberation, to face the perils of jacobin fraternity.

Duane still continues to advertise for "boys of good morals." We wonder in what department of Mr. Duane's extensive office this pure morality is to be employed. In hammering out obsolete lies respecting the official conduct of Mr. Pickering; or in selling Callender's curiosities to the southern virtuosi at Washington.

The most general dress out of doors, and in the mornings at Paris, is the surtout, which is the only visible part of the cloathing, except the boots; and in this sort of apparel, which has, for the most part, exactly that appearance, that would in England be called shabby, the majority of the Parisians appear. To pay a visit, in a military dress, is considered as a rudeness and an outrage to any elegant company.

Le Sage proves himself to have been intimately acquainted with human nature. The character of Gil Blas he certainly never intended as a model of imitation. His object seems to have been to exhibit men as they are, not as they ought to be. For this purpose he chooses a youth of no extraordinary talents, and without steady principles, open to be duped by knavery, and perverted by example. He sends him, like a spaniel, through the open fields, the coverts, the giddy heights and latent tracks of life, to raise the game, at which he wishes to shoot; and few moral huntsmen ever afforded more entertaining sport.

CONTEST BETWEEN THE SUN AND THE NIGHT.

[FROM THE SPANISH.]

ALREADY Night, ambitious empress, 'round
This earthly orb her leaden chains had spread,
And mortals, wrapp'd in slumber so profound, Seem'd less enslav'd in Sleep's embrace, than dead

Sol early knew her proud, insidious aim,
And mounting hastily his car sublime
The whilst his breast fierce zeal and rage inflame, Grasps his keen rays, and flies to th' eastern clime.

He gain'd th' horizon!....when poor Night beheld

Her more than equal foe entrench'd secure.
Swiftly she fled, by hurrying fears impell'd,
T'escape the fury of her swift pursuer.

From side to side, disconsolate, she flies,
But finds, alas! no refuge....no repose,
When, haply, lo! a shady grot she spies,
And creeps for shelter, trembling as she goes.

In close pursuit the Sun the welkin rends,
Darting his fiery shafts on every side,
Climbs the steep vault, his piercing glare extends,
To find what den the fugitive might hide.

Awhile he gaz'd attentive, but in vain
His penetrating eye survey'd the world,
Outbrav'd! his choler 'gainst the humble plain
The fury of his blazing weapons hurl'd.

Wistful, meanwhile, within the covert far,
'Mid the thick branches of the friendly grove,
Night heard, appall'd, the rolling of his car,
Which headlong on her hot pursuer drove.

Soon as he pass'd, from coward terrors free,
She felt new life her languid pow'rs pervade,
And freedom now, and calm tranquillity
Breathe their bland influence thro' the realms of shade.

First peeping o'er the copses of the wood,
She saw, far distant, Sol's declining flame,
Beheld him buried in the western flood,
Then jocund forth from her asylum came.

Elate with pompous dignity, she view'd
A shining troop of circling stars appear,
That, vying in obsequious homage, strew'd
Their gaudy spangles round the hemisphere.

Th' uncourteous moon, deck'd in a borrow'd robe,
Foremost along the dingy concave swims:
Thus Night, triumphant mistress of the globe,
The king of Day's sublimest glory dims.

Night, peerless! whom no rival shall assail,
What time thy foe his short career has run,
Say, who e'er fancied that thy flimsy veil
Might thus obscure th' effulgence of the Sun?

So Truth, irradiating, deigns to shine,
Like the bright Sun, and mists and clouds pervades,
But lo! we bow at our accustomed shrine,
And lose ourselves again in Error's shades.

We listen not when sage Instruction speaks,
Or, list'ning, oft her precepts we disdain,
And wavering Folly back returns, and seeks To reign once more, where it was wont to reign.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The following lines are highly descriptive of the unreal beauties, which the fervour of fancy often woos.]

I caught a bright, fantastic cloud,
And in the glittering moonlight dress'd it,
Then, of the beauteous pageant proud,
Too fondly to my bosom press'd it.

I fancied, by the dubious light,
I saw my phantom sweetly smiling,
My bosom throbb'd with wild delight,
All Reason's soberer fears beguiling.

What dreams of joy my fears revolv'd,
What pleasant visions hover'd o'er me,
Till, by th' incautious warmth dissolv'd,
My treasure faded from before me.

ORIGINAL PAPERS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXII.

AS the following epistle not only fervently exhorts to matrimony, but gaily laughs at a species of feminine facility, I am urged, by a two fold reason, as Vellum says, in ADDISON'S Drummer to set it forth, with the hope that some of our young ladies will read it over, as eagerly as they would the "Confessions of a Coquet," or the "Amours of Madame de Tencin."

MR. SAUNTER,

It is pleasant to observe the exertions which, in your capacity of custos morum, you are incessantly making, to "cleanse the foul body of the infected world." It is equally pleasant to witness your success. From those sweet pouting lips, which heedlessly answered each remark in company with "Good God!" and "Good Heavens!" we now hear "Oh dear!" and "Oh, la!" and another covering is thrown to hide each female charm, from the roving and inquisitive eye of the tea-party gallant. The success, which you have experienced, has indubitably been owing to the "deep and strong incision pen," with which you have traced the characters of fashionable folly. Still, however, Mr. Saunter, there are many obstinate attendants on the courts of Fashion and Dissipation, who will not retrace their steps, at the crack of the satiric thong. To convert those, it may be necessary to note the pleasures which await them, in the old-fashioned and beaten path of life. The hope of reward is a stronger incentive to virtue, than the dread of punishment.

My object, more particularly, is to lure bachelors into the matrimonial noose. If any thing else were necessary to convince us of the dangerous tendency, which the ladies have justly annexed to "Tuesday clubs," it is the certainty that the pleasures of a single life are strenuously urged at these resorts. In the intervals of conversation, each member hums, with doleful countenance,

"Ah! my friends, ye little know
The sorrows which from wedlock flow;"

and "Te Deum" was never chaunted with more energetic zeal through the windpipe of a monk, than the concluding line of a popular club song,....

"A wayward wife will bedevil you yet."

It is not my intention, at present, to notice all the pleasures of a wedded life. I shall merely mention one, which, to the inquisitive mind, is counterpoise to all the evils which scolding, weak, or extravagant wives, in the opinion of bachelors introduce into the domestic circle. I allude to the charter for secrecy, which, among unmarried females, a man obtains, by becoming a husband, and the consequent opportunity which he possesses, of becoming ing the confidant of every young girl and old maid who visit his wife.

While a man remains single, it is impossible for him to know those secrets, which pass in whispers at tea-parties, from one girl to another. The pointed observations and satiric censures on the dress and manners of the company, which so often and so good-naturedly flow from the creative female fancy, are lost on him; the sportive allusions, and the pointed puns, for which women have been so much and so justly celebrated, never strike his ear; and the thousand keen pangs, to which an eager and ungratified curiosity is subject, damp the genuine rational pleasure, which tea-parties are capable of affording, while he loses much and important instruction, on the subjects of "men and manners," and of women. This is his painful situation, while the married man riots in all the pure delights of social intercourse. Is a good thing said in company by a female? Oh! you may tell it to him, for he is a married man! or, if it cannot go direct from an unmarried female lip, it can be told to his wife, and man and wife are one. Besides, for the greater convenience of telling a secret, without being overheard by the company, it is very natural, and certainly very proper, that a young lady may seat herself on his lap, for he is only a married man! The ladies think, and justly too, that there is no harm in kissing a married man; and although, if a single gentleman were to be thus favoured, it might appear as if modesty were off her guard, yet modesty views, with a smile, such an intercourse between a young lady and a married man, for epicureans would tell us, with a profound knowledge of human nature, that the same objection does not apply to it in the latter case, that does in the former. A married man looks on it as a mark of confidence, and thinks no more of it. To a single man it would afford some materials for reflection.

Is it then, Mr. Saunter, of no advantage to a man, that he should possess the unreserved confidence of a young woman;....a confidence, which must inevitably make him better acquainted with her disposition, than he could be without it? a confidence which pours into his ears a thousand pleasant anecdotes, and teaches him the clue to the labyrinth of the human heart? If it be of no advantage, I shall not tempt them to violate the vows of celibacy, which they have made at their club rooms; but if to be on such sociable terms with young ladies be really

"To blend instruction with delight,"

I would persuade them, through you, Mr. Saunter, to "arise, take up their beds, and canter" to the altar of Hymen, where a passport to the confidence of a young lady awaits all, who journey through the matrimonial garden.

MARITUS.

The hymeneal theory of my sensible correspondent is very amiable and salutary. Like the good Vicar of Wakefield, he is of opinion, that the honest man, who marries, does more service, than he, who continues single, and only talks of population. As to the freedom, exercised by unwedded nymphs, towards married swains, my own experience can say but little. But, as this is not the first time I have heard of this sort of license, I am led to conclude, that it is not a mere child of fancy.

In Continuation....The Banks....The City of Washington.

THE erection of the banks was another very important measure, much celebrated in Europe, which was effected under this federal constitution. It contributes, still more than a free exportation, to dearness in the country; for the banks overwhelm the public with paper money, and wherever much money circulates, all is dear. It would be impossible for these banks to realize their paper, if great quantities should be presented to them at once. They know nearly how much will be presented in a day, and keep so much specie at hand; with the remainder they speculate, chiefly in foreign countries. They discount only the paper of their favourites; their discount is one half per cent. by the month, while the merchants not favoured by the bank, are obliged, at the moment when I write this, to pay the money-brokers five per cent. for every month, if they would have specie for their paper. Thus the bank-directors make themselves the despots of commerce; and as the commercial interest is predominant, America will very soon be a bank aristocracy, or rather is so already. What unbounded means must these people not possess, who can make as much money as they please? Only, unfortunately for them, their bills will not, like English bank-notes, pass in foreign countries; for the English credit is founded upon the national industry, and the possession of India, but America has neither industry nor India. Hence the bills of these banks, not only have no value in foreign countries, but even in the country, most of them are limited in their operations to a very narrow circle; the Bank of the United States excepted, whose notes, are, by law, declared valid throughout the country. Yet except in the neighbourhood of the maritime towns, those who are obliged to change them for silver, often look sour. Specie is, in America, very dear, on account of its extreme scarcity; nevertheless, the paper money, being valued equal to silver, has reduced it, in all internal transactions, to the level of its own cheapness; hence the artificial dearness of goods. The American wealth is a fascinating play of the imagination; a fantastic vision; a natural witchcraft, by means of which the splendour of gold is given to paper. The illusion is extremely pleasing; but, alas! its duration is very precarious; for it requires only the sunshine of truth, to dispel a fabric of paper. Those, who by all the arts of magic, secrets, in which I, alas! am not initiated, know how to multiply this poetic paper, speak only of sums, before which we poor Europeans humble ourselves in silent astonishment. The arch speculator and projector, ———, for instance, owes the editor of a newspaper, Greenleaf, in New-York, the pretty sum of more than eleven hundred thousand dollars!! The pleasantest of all, upon this occasion, is, that Mr. ——— denies it all, and they mutually revile each other as scoundrels, and forgers of false bills, in the newspapers. I shall have hereafter occasion to discuss what circumstances will put an end to this mercantile poetry, this financeering quackery. For the present, it is clear, that the high price of produce, occasioned by the war, which is already falling again, the almost exclusive intermediate trade in West-Indian articles, and the carrying trade, have given America a sort of commercial importance, a certain glitter of national prosperity, which gave birth to her foreign credit, for whose existence she is indebted, not to the wisdom of her government, or the excellence of her constitution, but to those accidental circumstances, with which they may probably alike cease.

In further imitation of the Europeans, it was determined to build a capital. It seems extraordinary to begin by creating an artificial dearness, even of labour, and then to attempt to build large cities. The crowding of a great multitude into one capital city, is never profitable to a country, and least of all to a rising agricultural people. Why erect a capital, at the expense of the country people, who must eventually pay for all. Simplicity and modesty are so ornamental to youth! they are therefore equally becoming attributes of a youthful state. The congress therefore should have had good houses, built proper to protect their inhabitants against wind and weather, in a city already extant, for themselves and the presidents, and nothing more. They should further have chosen, not a sea-port, but a country town, to be less under the influence of a trading interest. Lancaster, in Pennsylvania, would have been a proper situation, with respect to the eastern states. For those of the west, which, unless they should separate, must in time become the most important, Pittsburg would have been well situated.

If the full execution of the plan for building the city of Washington would have been pernicious to the country, it appears childish, when we can prove that this execution was impossible. A despotic lord of twenty millions of people might find it possible to accomplish such gigantic undertakings; but where a government possesses no coercive means, where labour is so dear, where four millions of people, extended over a space so enormous, form a loose political association, the twentieth part of the ground destined for the city of Washington will never be covered with houses, not even with log houses. There are now, according to some, thirty; as others say, seventy, chiefly log houses, extant; some considerable buildings, such as the president's house, &c. are said to be nearly finished. In the session of 1796, the congress gave again five hundred thousand dollars for this city; a sum, with which little can be effected in America. But after the squandering of immeasurable sums, Washington would be nothing but a large village, with a few handsome houses; for the neighbourhood around is bad land, still worse cultivated; there lies some good lands higher up on the river, which is, however, not navigable, on account of rocks, and as Alexandria is already in possession of the export trade, Washington, being in the same neighbourhood, will find it so much the more difficult to thrive. The spot for this city was chosen by the president; the Philadelphians, who are envious, and would fain see their city the permanent seat of government, say he was influenced by his own interest, because his lands lay upon the river Potomack. This I do not believe. What, then, determined his choice? I do not know.

CHAP. XVII.

In continuation....The Mint....The Navigation Act....Drawback....Navigation should not be too much encouraged in rising States....Revenues.

The European states have each of them a mint; and, of course, the Americans concluded they must have one too. The result is, that, with a loss of thirteen per cent. they coin over again Spanish dollars, into what they call units; only a few, however, for their units are very seldom to be seen, but dollars, wherever there is money. The accounts, however, are to be so arranged, that, instead of pounds, shillings, pence, &c. the reckoning is one, ten, a hundred, &c. which is very rational. But the people still adhere to their old customs, and always reckon, most absurdly, in pounds, shillings, and pence.

A navigation act, in a country where agriculture is, for want of hands, in a languishing condition, was an extremely unwise measure. Why increase the number of sailors and sea captains, and diminish that of farmers and labourers, while the inclination to a sea life is already so strong a native propensity of the Americans? Why not favour foreign as well as domestic vessels in the American ports? Do the Americans, like the Dutch, inhabit a small, barren territory, and are they indebted only to the sea for their existence? How many will be swallowed up by that devouring element, who might, by the propagation of their kind, and by tilling the ground, have been doubly useful to a country thin of people? Are not sailors the most unhappy and immoral of all classes of men? Will not their immorality be infectious? Are they not generally, on account of their wandering life, destitute of all love of their country?

The establishment of a drawback, which is allowed to merchants, who re-export the goods they had imported, is in the same spirit. The object is, above all things to encourage trade by sea, and use all possible means to increase the maritime towns, while, at the same time, the establishment of manufactures is prevented, and agriculture is left to shift for itself as well as it can. The consequence is, that Lancaster, the largest inland town, where the industry of the Germans has introduced a few family manufactures, contains only three thousand five hundred inhabitants, while Philadelphia probably now contains seventy thousand, though seven years ago it had only thirty-six thousand. What an enormous increase! Whereas Lancaster, twenty years ago, possessed as many inhabitants, and as much industry, as at this day! Such phenomena characterise the spirit of a government to perfection.

Manufacturing cities are useful to agriculture. There arises between them and the farmer an active and intimate barter trade, which puts in circulation the productions of national industry; which circulation is as profitable to the social body, as the unobstructed circulation of the blood is to the human frame. But maritime cities, unless they contain at the same time manufactures, produce nothing, and are merely consumers: their inhabitants, of course, live at the expense of their fellow-citizens. They consequently diminish the elements of physical existence, and thereby the numbers of mankind decline. They are consumers, or "fruges consumere nati," both negatively and positively. Negatively, because they produce nothing, and only distribute; positively, because they consume what others have produced, and by the profit upon the goods, which pass through their hands, which profit is a real loss to the purchaser. But, besides this profit, there arises, merely from the increased price of the goods, occasioned by their transportation, and in the same proportion with its extent, a minus to the purchaser and consumer. The ignorance of the prices of things in the country where they are produced, which must, in general, bear a proportion to the distance of that country, renders commerce the more advantageous, according to the distance of the place, with which it is carried on. The introduction of articles of luxury by no means compensates for all these evils; for they corrupt the nation, both physically and morally. Physically, by adulteration, and because they are in part, even though unadulterated, pernicious to the health; morally, by the desire of possessing large quantities of them, and because a false estimation of things arises thereby, which values and judges of things, not according to their inward worth, but by their external appearance. Hence a coarse sensual love of worldly goods is created, which stifles every thing noble, and which has always prevailed among all commercial nations, excepting perhaps the English; but the English are, at the same time, the greatest agricultural people in Europe; without their agriculture they would have been ruined long ago. Besides, merchants, who at the same time busy themselves with manufactures and agriculture, are by no means mere distributors, but likewise producers; that part of their capital, however, which is employed in commerce, produces nothing. Notwithstanding this, commerce is the only bond of connection, and instrument of civilization for nations, and this exalted utility overbalances all the mischief it occasions. But trade by sea should in no country be encouraged to the detriment of agriculture and manufactures; and least of all by nations in the blossom, like America. It must everywhere be regulated and kept within bounds by competent laws.

In my opinion, therefore, no rays of wisdom beam around the federal constitution and government, on account of these establishments. The increasing national wealth, as I have already said, is not a consequence of the constitution, and of the measures of government, but of certain transient circumstances, grounded upon the folly of the Europeans; and as the foundation is not solid, must, with a change of circumstances, again decline. The constitution, however, by the funding of the national debt, that is, by the appropriation of the funds proceeding from certain taxes to pay the interest of the debts, has certainly very much contributed to the foundation of American credit. The banks, and especially the paper system, have co-operated to the same end, by leaving almost all the specie to be employed in speculation abroad. The revenues of congress arise from the imposts, and the excise upon brandy. Last year a tax was likewise laid upon coaches. The imposts must indeed rise with the increase of trade; but it must be observed, that their amount is not so large as they appear to be in the accounts published; for every merchant has at the custom-house six months credit from the day when he enters his goods, before he is obliged to pay his imposts, which are likewise discharged with bank notes. The whole is therefore transacted with paper. In all the annual accounts of the impost, these written obligations of the merchants to pay in six months, are set down as already paid; but how many bankrupts are there in the interval, whose payments are never made.

CHAP. XVIII.

In Continuation....Want of Means for Defence....The Army.

After having seen what the federal government has done, let us give a few moments consideration to what they have not done, but which might have been expected to be done by an enlightened, administration. They have not hitherto established any system of defence. President Washington has, at divers times, proposed to congress to raise a standing army, at one time of twenty-five thousand men, at another of fifteen thousand, and finally of ten thousand, but always without effect. Washington is of opinion, a standing army would not in America be dangerous to liberty; and this must in truth be acknowledged, provided the army were not large. Europeans only should have been enlisted, and at the expiration of their time of service, land, cattle, and instruments for agriculture should have been distributed to them; by this, culture and population would have been gainers. With an elementary tactical book they are not unprovided; they have an excellent one, drawn up by general Steuben, with a regulation for service, and for encampment, likewise by him. In the year 1796, however, congress voted only three thousand men, which are not more than half completed. Enormous abuses must be prevalent, even among this trifling number, for during my residence at Philadelphia, a serjeant published in the newspapers, that he had never received any pay; that he had, besides, advanced money to the money-chest of the regiment; that he had resigned his station; had no money for his journey; that an order upon the secretary at war was given him; that he was obliged to beg his way to Philadelphia; that here he showed his order, but received nothing upon it, or at most very little, the minister having told him there was no money. This enraged serjeant threatened further to lay before the public the shocking frauds that were practised among the troops. This trait has, to Europeans, rather an extraordinary appearance. Their artillery is better in proportion than the other troops. Among the forts, West-point, upon Hudson's river, situated upon a rock, and worked in the rock, is really very strong, and on account of its situation commanding the river, in case of an attack from Canada, very important.

But it would be impossible to raise and maintain an army at all considerable, so long as no check is put upon the artificial dearness, and I believe three thousand men are now the utmost that the United States could levy and support. How is it possible to raise soldiers in a country, where a day labourer can earn ten dollars by the month? How can magazines be collected, where sixty pounds of wheat cost half a guinea, and other sorts of grain in proportion? where, in one word, meat is cheaper than bread? I have already mentioned the cause of this. Even if the congress had therefore immediately voted the twenty-five thousand men, there would not, under these circumstances, have been more than three thousand effectually raised?

The naval power of the United States consists in three half-finished frigates, upon which, in September, 1796, for want of labourers, as I believe, nothing further was doing. But what is the use of a naval force, which, at any rate, must remain inconsiderable? and in case of a war with England, the American privateers would always render the principal service; for whatever exertions might be made, the American fleet would still be too weak to protect their commerce against England. I should therefore wonder very much at president Washington's proposal to congress, in his speech at the opening of the session, on the 7th of December, 1796, to raise a naval force, if it were not clearly his intention to employ it only for the protection of the American navigation against the French, who are, to be sure, not the strongest power by sea, and against whom, only a few ships would be necessary. We shall see, however, whether the Americans will be in a condition to accomplish even these few; besides which, the sums necessary for the purpose might have been better employed.

A respectable system of defence would, unquestionably give the nation more stability, and more political independence. At this time America is destitute of soldiers, of magazines, of powder (notwithstanding they have powder mills, for powder costs a dollar and a half a pound), of manufactures of arms, &c. The militia is totally unfit for service, and for the most part unarmed. Even in New-England, the little military spirit remarked by travellers, immediately after the close of the war, is now evaporated. In one word, the country is open to the invasion of every enemy, and with a moderate army, a good general would make a very easy conquest of it; as it must have been subjugated during the revolutionary war, as I have shewn above, had not a "delis ex machina" given different turn to affairs.

A well established and disciplined national militia would certainly be preferable to a standing army; but the aversion of the people to every thing military is so insuperable, that they will never submit to such an arrangement.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDER.

AMONG the more excellent poets of the present day, no one deserves a more conspicuous rank than WILLIAM GIFFORD, Esq. Hayley is a laborious imitator of Pope, but languidly repeats the verses of the master. He has the form of that balanced and terse style of poetry, but the essence, the fine ethereal spirit, is either lost in diffusion, or diluted into weakness. Gifford, on the contrary, rather rivals POPE than mimicks him. His verses are not only sweet and sonorous, but they are conspicuous for their good sense, and for that admirable quality in composition, the power of saying much in brief compass, without any degree of obscurity. Of those men of letters, who are privileged with the conversation and friendship of this brilliant writer, a clergyman, by the name of Ireland, is honourably distinguished. In an imitation of the celebrated Ode to Grosphus, by one of the most jocund poets of antiquity, Mr. GIFFORD has thus classically complimented genius and worth.

IMITATION OF HORACE,

Lib. II. Ode 16.

Otium divos rogat in patente.

ADDRESSED TO THE REV. JOHN IRELAND,
BY WILLIAM GIFFORD, ESQ.

When howling winds and louring skies
The light, untimber'd bark surprise,
Near Orkney's boisterous seas,
The trembling crew forget to swear,
And bend the knees, unused to prayer,
To ask a little ease.

For ease the Turk, ferocious, prays,
For ease the barbarous Russ....for ease
Which P..... could ne'er obtain;
Which Bedford lack'd, amid his store,
And liberal Clive, with mines of ore,
Of bade for....but in vain.

For not the liveried troop, that wait
Around the mansions of the great,
Can keep my friend, aloof
Fear, that attacks the mind by fits,
And care, that, like a Raven, flits
Around the lordly roof.

O, well is he, to whom kind Heaven
A decent competence has given,
Rich in the blessing sent;
He grasps not anxiously for more,
Dreads not to use his little store,
And fattens on content.

O well is he, for life is lost,
Amid a whirl of passions tost;
Then why, dear Jack, should man,
Magnanimous Ephemeron! stretch
His views beyond the narrow reach
Of his contracted span?

Why should he from his country run,
In hopes, beneath a foreign sun,
Serener hours to find?
Was never man, in this wild chace,
Who changed his nature with his place,
And left himself behind.

For, winged with all the lightning's speed,
Care climbs the bark, Care mounts the steed,
An inmate of the breast:
Nor Barca's heat, nor Zembla's cold
Can drive from that pernicious hold
The too-tenacious guest.

They, whom no anxious thoughts anney,
Grateful, the present hour enjoy,
Nor seek the next to know;
To lighten every Ill they strive,
Nor, ere misfortune's hand arrive,
Anticipate the blow.

Something must ever be amiss:
Man has his joys; but perfect bliss
Lives only in the brain.
We cannot all have all we want;
And Chance, unasked, to this may grant,
What that has begged in vain.

WOLFE RUSHED ON DEATH, in manhood's bloom,
Paler crept slowly to the tomb;
Here treats, there FAME was given;
And that wise POWER, who weighs our lives,
By contras and by pros contrives
To keep the balance even.

TO THEE he gave two piercing eyes,
A body....just of Tyd's size,
A judgment so ind and clear,
A LIBERAL SOUL, a threadbare coat,
And forty pou. a year.

To me one eye, not over good,
Two sides, that, to their coat, have stood
A ten years hectic cough;
Aches, stiches, all the numerous ills
That swell the devilish doctors' bills,
And sweep poor mortals off;

A coat, more bare than thine; a soul
THAT SPURNS THE CROWD'S MALIGN CONTROL;
A fixed contempt of wrong;
Spirits, ABOVE AFFLICTION'S POWER;
And skill to charm my lonely hour,
With no inglorious song.

Of the thousand translations and imitations of this philosophical ode, which, in the course of a life of some reading, I have perused, none, like the above, so gratefully relishes of the genuine Horatian spirit. We do not see the wrong side of the tapestry; but, in this visit to the "rich wardrobe" of antiquity, Mr. G. has brought out all the gorgeous, the purple, and the glowing colours. The three last stanzas are of inimitable beauty; and, when High-minded Genius, with a cavalier and Castilian spirit, congratulates itself, that neither ill health, nor humble fortune, could compel to truckle to the "malign controul of the crowd," we admire the loftiness of the man, not less than the elegance of the poet.

It was long a fashion among the light and unthinking, among those, who dwell after the manner of the Zidonians, careless and secure, to deride the writings, to hint the hypocrisy, or sneer at the fanaticism of Mr. William Law. His undertaking an edition of Jacob Behmen, a moon struck cobbler, and his furious philippic against the players, afforded some pretext for the raillery of libertine wit. But his Serious Call, a work of fervent piety, has excited the liberal praise of Dr. JOHNSON; and Mr. GIBSON has thus vindicated the memory of a religious recluse, in a mode so candid and eloquent, that my readers will not only listen to the defence, but, perhaps, read some of the writings of Mr. Law.

In our family, he left the reputation of a worthy and pious man, who believed all that he professed, and practiced all that he enjoined. The character of a nonjuror, which he maintained to the last, is a sufficient evidence of his principles in church and state; and the sacrifice of interest to conscience will be always respectable. His theological writings, which our domestic connection has tempted me to peruse, preserve an imperfect sort of life, and I can pronounce, with more confidence and knowledge, on the merits of the author. His last compositions are darkly tinged by the incomprehensible visions of Jacob Behmen; and his discourse on the absolute unlawfulness of stage entertainments, is sometimes quoted for a ridiculous intemperance of sentiment and language. "The actors and spectators must all be damned: the playhouse is the porch of hell, the place of the devil's abode, where he holds his filthy court of evil spirits; a play is the devil's triumph, a sacrifice performed to his glory, as much as in the heathen temples of Bacchus or Venus, &c. &c." But these sallies of religious phrenzy must not extinguish the praise, which is due to Mr. William Law, as a wit and a scholar. His argument, on topics of less absurdity, is specious and acute, his manner is lively, his style forcible and clear; and, had not his vigorous mind been clouded by enthusiasm, he might be ranked with the most agreeable and ingenious writers of the times. While the Bangorian controversy was a fashionable theme, he entered the lists, on the subject of Christ's kingdom, and the authority of the priesthood: against the plain account of the Lord's supper, he resumed the combat with bishop Hoadley, the object of whig idolatry, and of tory abhorrence; and, at every weapon of attack and defence, the nonjuror, on the ground, which is common to them both, approves himself at least equal to the prelate. On the appearance of The Fable of the Bees, he drew his pen against the licentious doctrine, that private vices are public benefits, and morality, as well as religion, must join in his applause. Mr. Law's master work, the Serious Call, is still read, as a popular and powerful book of devotion. His precepts are rigid, but they are founded on the gospel; his satire is sharp, but it is drawn from the knowledge of human life; and many of his portraits are not unworthy of the pen of La Bruyere. If he finds a spark of piety in his reader's mind, he will soon kindle it to a flame; and a philosopher must allow, that he exposes, with equal severity and truth, the strong contradiction between the faith and practice of the Christian world. Under the names of Flavia and Miranda, he has admirably described my two aunts...the heathen and the Christian sister.

It is not possible, I am assured by the Editor of the Port Folio, to convey a more luminous idea of Oldschool politics, than in the following passage, from the writings of one, who was as eloquent an author as Cicero, and a much more prescient and magnanimous statesman.

It is said, by their adversaries, that the old politicians knew little of the rights of men; that they lost their way, by groping about in the dark, and fumbling among rotten parchments and musty records. Great lights, they say, are lately obtained in the world, and the disciples of the old school, instead of shrouding themselves in exploded ignorance, ought to take advantage of the blaze of illumination, which is spreading around. It may be so. The enthusiasts of this time, it seems, like their predecessors in another faction of fanaticism, deal in lights. HUDIBRAS pleasantly says of them, they "Have lights where better eyes are blind,

As pigs are said to see the wind."

We have heard a great deal, concerning the modern lights, but we have not yet had the good fortune to see much of them. They, who have read the works of these illuminators of the world, have learned nothing more from them, than a full certainty of their shallowness, levity, pride, petulance, ignorance, and presumption. When the old authors, whom we have read, and the old men, whom we have conversed with, have left us in the dark, we are in the dark still. We have only to wish, that the lovers of innovation may be as happy and prosperous, under the influence of the new light, as they once were, under the sober shade of the old obscurity.

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LIFE OF THE RIGHT HON. HENRY ADDINGTON.

[CONCLUDED.]

On the convocation of a new parliament, a few months after, Mr. Addington was unanimously re-elected, and the subject of the impeachment soon afforded a very apposite opportunity for the exercise of his talents and industry, more especially when the question was agitated, whether the impeachment of Warren Hastings, Esq. subsisted subsequent to the dissolution of Parliament?

Mr. Speaker, on this occasion, rose to state to the Committee the result of the best research into precedents that he had been able to make, and this was decidedly in favour of the impeachment remaining in statu quo. He traced the growth and development of the principle of impeachment from the reign of Edward IV. and shewed clearly, that, as far as regarded the effect of a dissolution, it was precisely the same for impeachments as for writs of error and appeal. He produced various instances of writs of error not abating prior to 1673, and contended that the report of the Lords' Committee, and the resolution of the Lords at that time, which had remained unquestioned ever since, were founded on precedents, and what were clearly understood to be the practice of Parliament; that the report and resolution of 1678, respecting the continuance of an impeachment after a dissolution, was founded on that of 1673, because both impeachments and writs of error were so strictly connected in principle, that it was impossible to make a distinction between them; that the resolution of 1673 could not have been adopted merely as a colourable foundation for the resolution of 1678, because, when the former was passed, it was impossible that the case to which the latter applied could have been foreseen; and that, when Lord Danby applied to the Court of King's Bench to be bailed after the dissolution of Parliament, the court recognised the doctrine, that the impeachment did not fall to the ground in consequence of the dissolution, as the known and established law of Parliament. On the precedents of 1685, by which this resolution, as far as respected impeachments, was reversed, he observed, that it was of no authority, the Commons having been corruptly chosen, and wholly devoted to the court; the principal evidence for the prosecution, Titus Oates, convicted of perjury, and consequently incompetent; and the resolution itself passed without examination of precedents, not generally with express limitation to the particular case.

In like manner Mr. Addington shewed, from the cases of Lords Salisbury and Peterborough, in 1690, that it was then understood to be the law of Parliament, that impeachments do not abate by a dissolution, and that, after much delay and management, they were at last discharged by a resolution strictly applicable to their particular case, and in no respect affecting the general question. The same argument he deduced from the case of Lord Oxford in 1717, as far as that case went. The House, he remarked, would do well to consider how far their undoubted right might be affected by the doubt which appointing a committee to search for precedents would imply. Let the friends of Mr. Hastings remember, that his case was unconnected with the general question; that if it were proper for the House to proceed against him, the renewal of the impeachment would be a greater hardship than to take it up where it now stood, and that at all events the length of the proof, or the magnitude of the crime, could never, with any shadow of decency, be suffered to protect the criminal. He recommended to the House not to put it in the power of the Crown to defeat an impeachment by a dissolution, or of the Lords to defeat it by delay, which, as they might choose on what and how many days they would sit each session of Parliament, they might be able to do were a dissolution not to do it; and he exhorted them to adopt a line that would acquire honour to themselves, and render important service to posterity, by making "assurance doubly sure" on the only doubt that had ever arisen among the Commons respecting their own privilege.

His opinion on this subject, of which we have here given an outline, must be allowed by all impartial men to be constitutional: fraught on one hand with notions highly salutary in respect to public justice, and on the other pregnant with principles calculated to fortify the power and confirm the authority of the Third Estate, in respect to the exercise of its rights.

Nor did Mr. A. allow any opportunity to escape for maintaining the franchises of the House over which he presided; for, when the Peers, in May 1791, thought proper to make a trifling alteration in a bill*, by which they assumed the initiative respecting money, he stated the circumstance to the House, and, after quoting a precedent, which he caused to be read from the Journals of the 8th of March 1719, by which it appeared that a similar bill, on being sent from the Lords, had been rejected, because it affected the revenue, the Commons followed his advice, and refused to proceed with the present.

But the late Speaker did not confine himself to what might be termed his official duties. He was always an active and efficient member when the House sat in a committee, and a chairman regulated the debates. Few subjects of great national importance but were canvassed by him on those occasions, and he must be allowed, in general, to have added great weight and importance to whatever side he adopted.

Uniformly acting with Mr. Pitt in all grand political questions, it is greatly to be regretted that he should have opposed that gentleman only, when a question of humanity respecting a miserable portion of the human race was agitated, and have taken part with Mr. Dundas, whose equivocal clemency to the slave trade has occasioned its continuance, notwithstanding the Commons of England seem to have been pledged for an abolition.

It is true that Mr. A. termed this traffic "a crime, which he had never heard mentioned without feeling the utmost abhorrence and indignation;" but it is equally true, that he was at the same time feelingly alive to the pecuniary interests of the planters and mortgagees, who, according to his own principles, must have profited by this "crime." Neither is the reasoning to be tolerated, that, "if relinquished by us, it might be carried on in a manner more repugnant to the interests of humanity," as, if this be really an abominable traffic, the guilt and shame ought instantly to be removed.

But, in order to decide on Mr. A.'s conduct, the best mode will be to quote his own arguments, premising at the same time, that it is not here meant to convey the least suspicion of his sincerity.

On Monday, April 2, 1792, after two petitions had been presented, one from the city of London, and the other from the livery of London, against the slave trade, Mr. Wilberforce moved the order of the day, which was "for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider of the circumstances of the African slave trade." This being done, and sir William Dolben having taken the chair, the same gentleman, at the conclusion of a long and elegant speech, moved, "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that the trade carried on by British subjects, for the purpose of obtaining slaves on the coast of Africa, ought to be abolished." Mr. Thornton*, Mr. Whitbread, Mr. Fox, Mr. Pitt, &c. were for an immediate abolition, while Mr. Dundas, General Tarleton, &c. were against it; and to the surprise of all men, it so occurred, that the premier found himself for the first time in a minority.

In the course of the debate Mr. Addington delivered his opinion, the substance of which follows:

"The Speaker said, he had never listened with greater satisfaction in his life to any speech, than to the whole of that just delivered by his right honourable friend (Mr. Dundas), who had relieved him from the utmost pain and anxiety. He declared, that he was one of those alluded to by his right honourable friend, who had preferred a middle path in regard to the abolition of a trade, or rather a crime which he had never heard mentioned without feeling the utmost abhorrence and detestation. Hitherto he had been silent on the subject, because he had felt that he could not go the length of voting with his honourable friend, who had introduced the question of the abolition of the trade into that House; but now he had heard what he could concur in with ease to his mind, and satisfaction to his conscience. He complimented Mr. Whitbread on his eloquent speech, and agreed with him in thinking that the slave trade, however modified, could not be defended, because no argument could justify the selling of one man for money to the despotism of another man, and tearing him away against his will from his country, his family, and his friends, in order to make him drag out a miserable existence in bondage, in a distant country, to which he was an utter stranger. While he turned with disgust from the hateful trade, he saw the necessity of considering the opposite claims, and was also fearful the trade, if relinquished by us, might be carried on in a manner more repugnant to the interests of humanity.

"He thought these opposite interests would be in a great degree reconciled by the scheme of gradual abolition. He suggested, that the imports of slaves into the islands should be limited to ten or twelve years. He contended that negroes, notwithstanding the difference of their colour, ought to be regarded as human creatures. He condemned the slave trade as a measure he had always abhorred. The nervous eloquence of his honourable friend recalled to his memory the observation of a very venerable and eminent judge, now in retirement and in the vale of years (Lord Mansfield), who, when charged with showing too much lenity to a rebel lord, said, that he knew no language which could add guilt to treason. In the same view he knew no language which could add to the horrors of the slave trade; and the proposition now before them would undoubtedly tend to prevent man from preying upon man.

Mr. Addington said, the present state of the negroes in the West India islands certainly was inadequate to the necessary supply to do the work of the planters; there was too unequal a comparison between the males and females: he not only therefore considered an immediate abolition of the importation of the African negroes as impolitic, but should think a duty on the importation of male negroes would operate as a bounty on the importation of female slaves, and in a few years the defect would be supplied. Mr. Dundas's proposition, Mr. Addington said, appeared to him to be such as could not be opposed by any rational objection; he agreed with him in the whole of it, one point excepted, viz. the making of those negro children free who were born of slaves. He thought rather, that they should have their freedom after a period of service of ten or fifteen years, to pay their masters for the expense of rearing and educating them. A bounty for such as should rear more children, bearing a proportion to the sexes, payable to such negro fathers, might, he conceived, produce the most salutary effects, and greatly tend to increase the population of the negroes. He declared he did not think his right honourable friend would have submitted his ideas to the House, if he had not meant to state them afterwards in the form of a substantial proposition: he therefore hoped that his honourable friend's motion (Mr. Wilberforce's) would not be adopted, but that his end would be answered by other means*."

Notwithstanding the eloquent efforts of Mr. Pitt and Mr. Fox on the other side, which flashed conviction throughout the whole extent of the kingdom, we find Mr. Addington persevering in his opinions. When Mr. Dundas, on Friday, April 27, 1792, moved the order of the day, which was for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the whole House, to consider of the further means for the abolition of the slave trade, this was granted, and Mr. Beaufoy was called to the chair. The first resolution was then read, viz. "That it is the opinion of this Committee, that it shall not be lawful to import any African negroes into the British colonies or plantations in ships owned or navigated by British subjects, at any time after the 1st of January 1800." After Mr. Hobbart and Lord Mornington had delivered their opinions, the Speaker rose, and began by observing, that, "having, in a late debate on the subject, voted that the slave trade ought to be gradually abolished, he thought it his duty to state to the Committee the ideas he entertained on the mode of carrying that resolution into effect.

"The interval between the resolution, that the trade be abolished, and the period at which the abolition would take place, he admitted to be a most dreadful interval. He had, Mr. Addington declared, stated the trade to be abandoned; and he begged to remind the committee, and he implored them to consider the circumstance, that he never had mentioned one word as to the justice of the trade; but he had merely noticed the justice of those claims, that might be made by the persons, who would be affected by its abolition. If the interests of the planters were abandoned, the abolition of the slave trade, he was convinced, would never be effected. How was it possible, he asked, when the means of population were taken away, to supply the deficiency? How could they fill the chasm that they created? What he had stated, Mr. Addington declared, was the result of his real sentiments, of his real opinion. In certain conditions of society, there were, he observed, combinations of justice, of policy, of humanity, and of interest, that rendered it almost impossible to look to the ultimatum, or he should rather say the maximum, of one, without counteracting that of the other; the question was not, he said, between blood and gold, nor between what now actually was, and what might be hereafter, but it was whether an immediate or a gradual abolition would best effect the object the committee had in view: for his part, he thought that object too would be most safely and certainly attained, by protracting the period of abolition; and therefore he wished 1796 were the year proposed, instead of that contained in the amendment.

"On a former night, his right honourable friend had argued, from calculations, that, for three or four years past the old islands had no occasion for further importation; but their not importing in that time might be accounted for, from being unfortunate in their crops (as was the fact), and the increased price of negroes. It could not be argued, that they had no want of negroes, from their inability to purchase. Neither could the statements of death be relied on, for it might be supposed, that the planters represented the mortality as less than it really was, from the desire of obviating the charges of cruelty brought against them.

"Mr. Addington took notice of the West India and ceded islands, and used a variety of arguments to maintain his proposition, and urged, in particular, the danger liable to the mortgagees and others concerned in those islands. He declared, that he perfectly agreed with Mr. Burke's opinion, as to the good effect that must arise from the public places of worship, and he strongly recommended that mode of civilization, as one of the most efficacious and certain methods to reform the negroes.

"From these considerations, he should oppose the present motion, but, if the period were extended to the 1st of January, 1796, and the trade left open from that time, and free from all restriction, he should acquiesce in it.

"For the sake of Africa itself, he should also wish the abolition to be gradual, that the natives of that country might not lose all traffic, until they became a little more civilized, and fit for commerce of another kind."

While Mr. Addington was distinguishing himself in the speaker's chair, by the impartiality with which he regulated the debates, and the order and decorum with which he conducted the publicary, an event, no less sudden than extraneous, occurred, which produced a very, we now allude, in his situation. The event to which his colleagues, was the resignation of a dignified nature, and which a measure of a very sufficiently explained. While has never yet all men anxious to know who was to be the

* In the course of this gentleman's speech, he read the following letter from king Naim-bazo, in the neighbourhood of Sierra Leone, complaining that some of his relations had been kidnapped and carried off to the West Indies, where they were at present in a state of slavery. "My subjects, and the subjects of other kings, have been stolen away, by the inhabitants of all nations, who visit this coast. Three of my own relations have been taken away by a captain Coxe, and sold for slaves; for what reason I know not. I never molest the property or person of others. I love the natives of Great-Britain.... I have borne many insults from them, which have occasioned me to be silent so long. Whether I shall see my relations again I know not; but those, who took them, will be called to account for their actions, one day or another."

* Mr. Fox immediately followed Mr. Addington, and, to adopt the language of one of the reporters, "in a most able and animated speech, reprobated the suggestions of Mr. Dundas and Mr. Addington, pronouncing what had fallen from them to be the most formidable and alarming opposition that had yet been offered, to the important question of the abolition of the slave trade. He arose, therefore, with an anxious desire to relieve the painful sensations of his mind, and to do away the deceptions and delusions that were endeavoured, not intentionally he believed, to be set before the eyes of the public, to misguide and mislead their judgment, and the judgment of that house," &c.

new minister, the public learned, with some degree of surprise, that Mr. Addington had been sent for by the king, and held daily conferences with his majesty. This business was at first conducted with some degree of mystery, one of the royal family* having lent his equipage, in order, if possible, to conceal the negociation from the prying eye of curiosity. But this was of no avail, for it was soon rumoured abroad, and was not upon the whole unfavourably received, as Mr. Pitt's administration had of late years been supported by the fears rather than the love of the people.

The king's second alarming illness for a while protracted the retreat of the then chancellor of the exchequer; but, on his majesty's convalescence, all the necessary arrangements were made, and every thing adjusted, seemingly to the entire satisfaction of those, who went out, as well as those, who came in.

Mr. Addington having thus leaped from the speaker's chair to the treasury bench, the eyes of the whole nation became fixed upon him. It was hoped that, after a bloody and expensive war, some sincere and decisive measures would be taken, in order to produce a peace; and it must be allowed, that the conduct of the new premier, in this instance, has given greater satisfaction, by its openness and candour, than the haughty behaviour of his predecessors.

Mr. Addington, however, by his vindication of the late administration, has in some measure affiliated himself to it, and become accountable for its errors and misconduct. The suspension of the habeas corpus act; the feeble cry of a conspiracy; the production of sealed bags of papers; the continuance of martial law in Ireland, and of the system of secret imprisonment in England, have perhaps nipped his popularity in the bud, and are thought by many to savour too much of the old school. On the other hand, it must be allowed, that he has entered upon office at a time, and in circumstances peculiarly critical. Supported as he is by the royal favour and confidence, Mr. Pitt's power is still considered as paramount, and the mutes attached to the person of the "heaven-born minister" are thought to wait but for the signal to strangle his political successor.

A young nobleman, related to the late premier, has already termed this "an administration of shreds and patches;" and it has been repeatedly asserted, that a secret understanding subsists between the new and the old ministry: but time alone can fully and explicitly develop this matter.

Mr. Addington's first attempt in his financial capacity certainly did not come up to the expectations of the public, and the bill to disqualify the clergy from sitting in the house of commons, would have passed with a far better grace, had it not expressly precluded a man hostile to his principles, from opposing them in a public character. The present premier possesses great influence, in consequence of the excellence of his character, and the high respect he had acquired during the time: he acted as speaker. His majesty may be said to evince a personal attachment to him, and, if report be true, he has presented him with, and furnished for him, a house in Richmond park, in order to be near him at all times*.

In private life Mr. A. is particularly amiable. He is a sincere friend, an affectionate brother, a kind father, and a tender husband. Possessing an ample income†, and being but little devoted to expense, he cannot be supposed to be instigated by the sordid wish of creating a fortune for himself; and, as his connections‡ are all in affluent circumstances, he has no poor relations to provide for out of the public purse. On the other hand, it remains to be proved, whether his abilities entitle him to rank as a first-rate statesman; and a few years.... perhaps a few months.... will determine, whether the new minister be destined to confer glory or disgrace on the empire; to subvert or to restore the liberties of his country.

who have, by private assurances of much kindness, approbated the tenor of his public conduct; who have generously scanned, even his prejudices, by the liberal rules of a catholic interpretation; who have aided him in the conducting of a paper, partial to political truth, and elegant literature, and who will never cease to cheer him, though he forsakes the latent tracts of vulgar popularity, and assumes a higher, though, perhaps, a perilous station.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

OUR Charleston, South-Carolina correspondent, J. R. is respectfully requested to transmit the manuscript he describes to the Editor, who will, if possible, comply with the wishes of his correspondent. The Editor anticipates the receipt of an ingenious and salutary work.

"CONSTANTIA" is solicited to write in the Lounger. Few female writers display a stronger vein of good sense, or a more graceful ease of expression.

"HOLLIS" has read Tristram Shandy to great advantage. It will be pleasant to the Editor, if his friend will transcribe a little more from his manuscript.

We sometimes love oddity, frolic, and fun,
We relish a joke, and rejoice in a pun.

The infantine complaint of LAURA, respecting the occasional coldness of her lover, we cannot think would greatly edify our readers. We recommend to Laura a very continued meditation of the following lines. They come from a grave doctor of the church; and this fond fair, who wishes to live upon love, as Giles Gingerbread used to live upon learning, is assured, that the following is a real, though, to her, it may be a melancholy truth.

As Flavia in her glass an angel spies,
Pride whispers in her ear pernicious lies;
Tells her, while she surveys a face so fine,
There's no satiety of charms divine:
Hence, if her lover yawns, all chang'd appears
Her temper, and she melts, sweet soul, in tears.
She, fond and young, last week her wish enjoy'd,
In soft amusement all the night employ'd.
The morning came.... when Strephon waking, found,
Surprising sight! his bride in tears was drown'd!
"What miracle," says Strephon, "makes thee weep?"
"Ah! barbarous man," she cries, "how could you... sleep!"

Men love a mistress, as they love a feast;
How grateful one to touch, and one to taste!
Yet, sure there is a certain time of day,
We wish our MISTRESS AND OUR FEAST AWAY:
But soon the sated appetites return,
Again our stomachs crave, our bosoms burn.
Eternal love let man then never swear;
Let women never triumph nor despair;
Nor praise nor blame too much the warm or chill;
Hunger and love are foreign to the will.

contumely affects them not. Nothing but real pain gives them real sorrow. They have no imaginary ills, that shadowy train, which haunts the ingenious. They have none of those fine sensibilities, which torture the feeling heart with unspeakable agony. Let them have food in abundance, and a sufficiency of raiment and money, and, with a wisdom, which philosophers have vainly pretended to, they are perfectly satisfied.

There is no reason to believe that they will not succeed in the world. Fools, it is proverbially said, have fortune. Some substantial reasons may be assigned to account for the adage; unfeeling and unreflecting men of dull parts are not hurt by repulses and disappointments. Break their web, and they begin it again, with all the patience of a Dutchman. They know no nice scruples of punctilious honour. They have no superabundant delicacy to prevent their importunity to those, who can promote their interest. They prosecute their claims with exemplary perseverance. A flat refusal, or a downright insult, strikes them with no more effect than a tennis ball the rock of Gibraltar.

It seems to be the will of Providence, that, comparatively speaking, few should possess the glorious endowment of genius in a supereminent degree. All great excellence must, indeed, be rare, for it would cease to be great excellence, if it were common. But let not those, to whom genius is denied, lament. Genius has its evils, from which they are exempted. It is envied, it is exposed to a thousand pains and penalties from the injuries of those, who, not knowing or not regarding the irritable niceties of its sensibility, rudely strike the tremulous fibre, whenever they approach it. It is of too fine and subtle a nature for the tumults and agitations of a world, madly rushing on in the vulgar pursuits of avarice and ambition. Unguarded by discretion, of which it is often too proud to acknowledge the dominion, it too often causes a life of misery, and a premature dissolution.

Let it also be remembered by those, who are conscious of inferiority to their fellow creatures, that all distinctions, whether civil, natural, mental, or corporeal, all but superiority of virtue, will shortly cease; and that it is expressly declared, on the highest authority, that to whom much has been given, of him much will be required; a declaration, which, if duly impressed, might afford comfort to the dunce, and cause the genius to tremble.

One of the German didactic writers advises the student to take great care lest he should lose much time in sleep. He advises him to have an alarm-clock by his bedside, but if that is not to be conveniently procured, to lay stones and bits of wood in his bed, and under his side, which, though he will not feel them much at first, may, after an hour or two, gall him to the quick, and cause him to get up of his own accord! What an enthusiasm of application! not content with spending the day in labour, he wished the student to lose the sweets of repose, and almost literally to plant thorns on his pillow! No pursuit but that of virtue can require such austerity; and even virtue, in her most rigid exaction of discipline, listens to reason, and leans to moderation. When she deserts them, she becomes fanaticism, and hurries her mistaken votaries to madness and misery.

Richardson's favourite character, Grandison, is much too formal to be a favourite with the women in general, and there is somewhat of prudery in his heroines, that prevents them from being favourites with the men. But this author describes the operation of the passions with a truth and minuteness, that evince a great knowledge of human nature. The madness of Clementina is delineated with the pencil of a great master. Nothing can be more affecting than the distresses of Clarissa. He was conscious that his strength lay in the pathetic, and by this, perhaps, he was led to prolong scenes of sorrow, till the spirits of the reader are fatigued, and the luxury of sympathy is overpowered. The striking and animated character of Lovelace is supported to the last with wonderful spirit. It is easy for an author to declare that his hero is possessed of an infinite deal of wit and pleasantry, invention and eloquence. To make him display those qualities through a great variety of scenes is very difficult, yet it has been executed by this author in the most successful manner. Richardson himself was undoubtedly convinced, that all those accomplishments, with the addition of youth, beauty, and the most undaunted intrepidity, would not prevent the profligacy, perfidy, and shocking cruelty of Lovelace from rendering him odious to every reader. In this, perhaps, he was mistaken. The brilliant colours, in which Lovelace is painted, is too apt to fascinate the imagination, and may have secured him a corner in the hearts of some young women of character, in spite of his crimes. As for young men, if none of them had ever attempted to imitate the profligacy of Lovelace, but those, who possessed his accomplishments, the exhibition of his portrait would do little harm. But there is reason to fear, that some, with the first only, and with a slender portion of the second, have sometimes attempted to pass for complete Lovelaces.

The clergy have confessedly handed down the torch of science from generation to generation, which, without their care, might have been long ago extinguished.

Many of our editors repine that Mr. Duane, by the profits of stationary, sold only to republicans, and of an Aurora, the advocate of administration, obtains a splendid income; this is in course; this is natural; Mr. Duane has paid the price for jacobin patronage.

It happens that those, who bestow preferment, are not so likely to bestow it on merit, of which they are often but incompetent judges, as on a submission to their will, and a subserviency to their purposes of avarice and ambition. There is in it all the perspicuity of Tillotson, and all the solidity of Clarke, united with the florid elegance of Seed, the pathos of Sterne, and the copious fluency of Blair.

A modern satirist thus derides false sensibility.

Belinda is remarkably fond of pathetic novels, tragedies, and elegies. Sterne's sentimental beauties are her peculiar favourites. She cannot bear the idea of killing animals for food. She detests the sports of fishing and hunting, because of their ineffable cruelty. She is ready to faint when her coachman whips his horses, when they will not draw up hill; and she actually fell down in a fit, on a gentleman's treading on her favourite cat's tail, as he eagerly stooped to save her child from falling into the fire. She wrote a sublime deification of an earth-worm, which she once accidentally crushed as she was endeavouring to rescue a fly from a spider. It concludes thus:

But cease to weep...no more to crawl
In the dark earth beneath yon wall,
On snow white pinions thou shalt rise,
And claim thy place in yonder skies.

See Belinda's Effusions of Sentiment.

If men of genius were content sometimes to remain in the shade, they would with more advantage come forth into sun-shine, and find the brightness intercepted by fewer clouds.

RUNNING MATCH.

Plymouth, Feb. 14.

A most extraordinary feat of active running was performed by lieutenant Rowan, of the twenty-ninth regiment of foot, quartered at Dock barracks, on the lines there; the bet was fifty guineas, the match to be performed in forty-two minutes. Lieutenant R. dressed in a flannel jacket, set off from Clarence street, No. 4, at eleven o'clock, a.m. a man of war's ten-oared barge was in waiting at Mutton Cove. Lieutenant R. crossed the passage, jumped over the barge on the beach, ran up the very steep hill of Maker's Heights to the middle barracks, in presence of several officers, touched the barrier, ran down the hill, jumped into the boat, crossed the passage again, and returned to No. 4, Clarence-street, in forty minutes, apparently without fatigue. The distance is, exclusive of the passage, two miles and a half to Maker's barracks, and two miles and a half back to Clarence-street. [London paper.

A curious instance of swindling detected, and yet effecting its purpose, occurred a few nights since:—A shop-keeper in Edinburgh, having retired to his back-shop, left the charge of the front apartment to a faithful dog. A genteel dressed woman soon after entered, and, without ceremony, laid hold of a parcel, which had been left to be called for by a customer. The dog, true to his charge, with as little ceremony, laid hold on the thief, who dropped the parcel, and screamed aloud. The shop-keeper instantly came forward, beat the faithful guardian of his property, released the woman, and, satisfied with some trifling question, which she put as an excuse for her call, politely apologized for the rude reception she had experienced. More civil still, observing the parcel on the floor, he requested to know whether she had dropped it. Receiving, of course, an answer in the affirmative, the parcel was politely delivered to her, received with equal politeness, and, with many expressions of thanks, the lady walked off, unmolested, with her booty.

MR. OLSCHOOL,

SIR,

An absence in Europe, for ten months, has prevented my troubling you with any of my productions: but, since I am returned, I observed in your files, that you are pleased to invite me. Judge of the following. G. L. G.

TO A YOUNG LADY,

ON READING IN HER MEMORANDUM BOOK

"When I die, may not one heart be griev'd,
And not one tear bedew my lonely tomb."

HAMMOND.

AND is it then MARIA's wish to die,
Without one flow'ret strew'd upon her bier;
Forgotten in the mouldering tomb to lie,
Unhail'd by love's or friendship's soothing tear?

Have the world's cares so early touch'd thy breast,
Has its ingratitude assail'd thy heart?
That thou should'st wish, by secret thoughts oppress'd,
From all its social joys at once to part?

Has it been thine the deadly pang to feel,
That springs incessant from the wounds of love;
By law condemn'd thy sufferings to conceal,
From him, who only could thy pangs remove?

Oh! then I pity thy distressing fate!
For I have felt the anguish of the flame;
Have known the tortures of the lover's state,
Nor dar'd my anguish nor my love proclaim!

But thou hast never known false friendship's guile;
Love never yet has mark'd thee as his prey;
I know it by the ever-placid smile,
That from thy bosom sheds its cloudless ray!

Yet should the pains of silent love be thine,
Or hadst thou fall'n in falsehood's subtle snare;
Not all the evils, which in both combine,
Should give the youthful bosom to despair.

How then can'st thou, whilst innocent and gay,
And young and lovely and by all belov'd,
With every joy of life to own thy sway,
By the cold misanthrope's desires be mov'd,

Misanthropy's a weed of pallid hue,
That grows neglected in the desert's gloom;
No sun e'er cheers it, and no soft'ning dew
Falls on its branch, or gives its leaves perfume.

Yet what besides could e'er desire to fall,
Like the rude bramble in the forest's shade,
Or like the stone from yon time-ruin'd wall,
No eye to mark the vacuum it made.

Were life resolv'd into the narrow span
Of mortal years, and fill'd with mortal pain,
What thought could cheer the parting hour of man?
No friend to mourn him, and no heaven to gain.

No....the fond hope, which tells that after death
Our men'ry here shall live, or soul above,
Glads us beneath the latent throb of breath,
And shews how easy 'tis from earth to move.

Then banish from thy mind this sullen care,
Nor yield thy soul to her corroding chain;
Recall the accents of unfelt despair,
And shock not nature with a wish so vain.

Yes it is vain....for on thy silent grave,
Shall Friendship mourn the virtues it immures;
There agonized Love shall nightly rove,
And tell thy shade the sorrows he endures.

O thou wilt smile; the beam of pure delight
Shall to thy eyes more heavenly lustre give,
As from the world thou tak'st thy lasting flight,
To know that in their hearts thou still shalt live.

And when thy sacred spirit hovers round
The throne of pure beatitude above,
Pleas'd wilt thou listen to the flattering sound,
That wafts the faith of unabated love.

'TIS not those eyes, that sparkle fire,
That breast, which pants with soft desire,
The rose's, or the lily's hue,
Alone that charm, dear girl, in you;
No! with more rapture I descry
The tear that stands in Pity's eye.

With all those charms of form and face,
A winning smile, a soften'd grace,
A manner frank, devoid of pride,
And dimple Nature for thy guide,
O! never let that beauty die,
The tear that stands in Pity's eye.

SELECTED POETRY.

THE MAID OF DONALBLAYNE.

A SCOTTISH RALLAD.

Æole sisteminas, tumidique residite fluctus
Innocuz faveant pontus et aura rati.

OVID.

"THE dashing surges gently break,
The moon illumes the watery plain,
The zephyrs fan the sails. Awake,
My blue eyed maid of Donalblayne.

"My soul disdains each meaner art,
No studied terms my passion prove,
While warm with life, thy Malcolm's heart
Shall beat with never-dying love.

"A captive at thy feet I've sigh'd,
Five tedious years I've sued in vain;
Then bless these arms my bonny bride,
My blue-eyed maid of Donalblayne."

The lovely maid descended slow,
And pac'd the stairs with cautious tread,
She felt her kindling blushes glow,
And thus in falt'ring accents said:

"And must I pass the salt sea wave?
And must I quit a woman's fears?
Must I, an exil'd outcast, have
A father's curse, a mother's tears?

"And shall I, wand'ring on the deep,
Glenalpin's boasted lineage stain?
And leave an aged sire to weep
His faithless maid of Donalblayne?

"And wilt thou love me, gentle youth,
When these few charms for aye are flown?"
"Sweet maid this heart with love and truth Shall ever beat for thee alone."

No footstep stirr'd, the winds were hush'd,
Each eye was clos'd in balmy rest,
To Marion's arms lord Malcolm rush'd,
And clasp'd the trembler to his breast.

The vessel swept the dimpled tide,
And bounded lightly o'er the main,
But Marion hung her head, and sigh'd
A long adieu to Donalblayne!

The Kelpie*, from his coral cave,
Beheld the gallant vessel glide,
And destin'd to a watery grave
Lord Malcolm and his bonny bride!

He sprang up from his dark abode,
He bade the blasts the sea deform;
On whirlwind's wings sublime he rode,
And furious urg'd the howling storm.

Lord Malcolm saw the bursting wave,
Impending with resistless sweep;
It 'whelm'd the shatter'd bark, and gave
Its tumbling burden to the deep.

Young Malcolm stemm'd the boiling tide,
And long the lovely Marion bore;
Then clasp'd in death his bonny bride,
And struggling sank to rise no more.

The clouds dispers'd, the morning blush'd,
The orb of day majestic beam'd,
The winds in softest sleep were hush'd,
And bright the liquid mirror gleam'd.

Rage fir'd Glenalpin's haughty soul,
He curs'd Duncathmore's hostile Thane;
"Thy ruffian hand," he cried, "hath stole
My child, the flower of Donalblayne!"

He saw the wreck, he sought the strand,
Where breathless corpses mingled lay;
He knelt upon the wave-beat sand,
And clasp'd his Marion's lifeless clay.

He climb'd the sea rock's bustling brow,
Exulting mark'd the dashing wave;
Then cast one frenzied look below,
And rush'd, unbidden to the grave!

With silver splendour o'er the tide,
When steals the moon's enamour'd beam,
Their shrouded ghosts will wailing glide,
Beneath the wan and chilly gleam.

O'er ocean, when the midnight bell
Its sad and sullen murmur flings,
Will Marion strike, with wildest swell,
Her shadowy lyre's fantastic strings.

The fisher oft, whose fear-struck eyes
See lights illumes the restless main,
Suspends his dashing oar, and cries,
"Alas! sweet maid of Donalblayne!"

THE AMERICAN LOUNGER,

BY SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

No. XXIII.

TO SAMUEL SAUNTER, ESQ.

SIR,

IN reading your 22d number, my attention was taken by some remarks on novels, under the signature of J. D. I read his letter to Samuel Saunter more than once, as the subject has always had some interest with me, but am sorry to confess, that I do not very clearly comprehend his meaning. It seems, however, to be his purpose to decry the writings of Richardson, and to show, that Le Sage, Smollet, and Fielding are much better teachers of morality than he. For this end, he tells us, that the former exhibits improbable scenes, characters too perfect for imitation, and exalts the brilliant and heroic qualities, generosity, benevolence, and compassion, on the ruins of the humble and unostentatious, but more solid and useful virtues, of prudence, economy, justice. The latter, on the contrary, exhibit manners and characters, whose prototype is in nature; they place their personages in scenes, that may actually occur in real life; by shewing the errors into which passion may betray us, they tend to render virtue amiable, and vice odious. This appears to be the meaning of your correspondent: yet I state this meaning with diffidence. I suspect myself of misapprehension, not only because the style of J. D. is not remarkably clear, but because these sentiments are very strange in one, who has read either of the works of any of the authors mentioned.

Let us consider, for a moment, the article of probability. Yet it is difficult to say any thing on this head, for where is the standard of probability? Each one must judge of the fidelity of any portrait, by his knowledge of the original. How far a narrative truly represents the general lineaments of human nature, each one must judge, from his opportunities of knowing himself and others. It is by this process that I think myself to have discovered Richardson to be the most perfect, various, and vivid painter, that ever took pencil in hand; that no other ever portrayed a greater number and variety of figures, with more vividness, minuteness, and accuracy. In this opinion I shall not be surprised, if another differ from me; nor do I know in what way to discuss the question with an adversary. Each one must appeal and rely on his own experience, nor will nor ought he to admit of any other decision.

Your correspondent tells us, indeed, that Richardson's are "faultless monsters;" by which I would suppose he would insinuate, that his personages are too good to be natural. One cannot but smile at this objection, when we recollect, that there is only one character in each of his three complicated pieces, whom the writer intended to represent as very excellent. None of them are, in a rational estimate, nor were designed by the author to be, faultless. Besides these three, all his characters are examples of that mixture, which J. D. thinks so beneficial to the reader. As in the persons of Pamela, Clarissa, and Grandison, the writer intended to exhibit very excellent beings, it was requisite to diversify the scene, by the introduction of characters, of different degrees and kinds of merit, compounded in different ways, of good and bad. In Pamela and Clarissa, indeed, the great objection has been, that the scene is too full of depravity. Almost all the actors, but one, are selfish, depraved, and inhuman; one of them, indeed (Lovelace), to a degree almost surpassing credibility. There are many, who, judging from their own hearts, pronounce the wickedness of Lovelace to be more flagrant than man can ever sink to. This opinion, though erroneous, is still somewhat creditable to the character of those, who adopt it. But what shall we say to those, who, as is natural to all of us, infer, from their own feelings, that the transcendent virtue of Grandison is impossible, or, as they phrase it, out of nature? Unhappy it is, that so many people should consider any great effort of disinterestedness and magnanimity, as unnatural and superhuman.

It is remarkable, that the union of vicious and agreeable qualities, of crimes and talents, in Lovelace, has been thought to stand in need of vindication, on the same grounds as those, which J. D. adopts in defence of his favourites. The vindication, indeed, is superfluous: nobody, but one already depraved beyond the reach of amendment, can find, in Lovelace, any thing provoking imitation. The whole texture of the story tends to nothing but to convince us, that wit and genius become the more signally disastrous to the possessor, as they are allied with malice and revenge. If Richardson's two first works be blameable, as exhibiting too rueful and shocking a picture of human calamity and wickedness, amply has he atoned for these faults, by displaying, in his third performance, the sublime and transporting picture of a good, great, and wise man. And yet Grandison's virtues are called forth by the faults and miseries of others, so that the work is far from being a tissue of faultless characters, and magnanimous actions.

What J. D. says about Richardson's "contrast between one virtue and another; a war of duties, where the cardinal duties are made subordinate to the shewy and extraordinary ones; filial duty to love and friendship; prudence, justice, economy, to benevolence, generosity, compassion," I do not well know what to make of it. These are the common objections to the trash of modern novels, but no one, I imagine, who ever read Richardson, could dream for a moment that they are applicable to him; on the contrary, the pictures, which he draws, are directly opposite to this. The palm is invariably bestowed by him on the social and domestic virtues, on piety, filial duty, humility, and charity. The good child, parent, consort, and friend, are the portraits on which this writer loves to dwell with complacency. He must be strangely mistaken, who imagines that Richardson was what is vulgarly called a sentimentalist. The inundation of froth and sentiment, in the form of novels, which cover, in this age, the shelves of our libraries, has taken place in direct contempt and defiance of the precepts and example of Richardson.

As to Fielding and Smollet, I must willingly admit the pretensions of the former to the praise of a faithful copyist of nature. In his three works, the course of events and the completion of the personages are sufficiently probable; yet, if the excellence of the character be any proof of its improbability, I am afraid that Fielding will be as open to objection as Richardson. In Alworthy, Amelia, and Joseph Andrews, the author has evidently given us his notions of a perfect character. Thus it appears, that the principal personages, in two of his pieces, and a very important one in his third and greatest performance, are the "faultless monsters," whom J. D. so much condemns. I will leave your correspondent to prove what pernicious and immoral influence such models of purity, magnanimity, and generosity must have upon the reader; but I think he must confess, if he has read both authors, that the objection arising from this source is just as applicable to Fielding, as to Richardson.

It is unlucky for your correspondent, that the objection he urges against Richardson and his followers, is only applicable to his favourites. Fielding's heroes, if Jones and Amelia's husband deserve that exclusive name, are only saved from contempt and aversion, by the courage, generosity, and candour which distinguish them. These qualities there are, that, in spite of their follies and vices, make them regarded, by some, with complacency and approbation, and constitute the danger there is of being led, by their example, to prefer these shewy and brilliant qualities, to the solid and humble merits of "prudence, justice, and economy."

As to Smollet, he is far inferior to the other, in every thing but wit. His characters, for the most part, are caricatures, whose greatest merit lies in their power to make us laugh at their humour and extravagance. It would be difficult to point out a more profligate and hurtful book than "Peregrine Pickle." "Roderick Random" is a tissue of low adventures; the history of a man without steadiness or principle, and who can be, by turns, a gambler, heiress-hunter, sharper, sailor, and soldier, and I know not what, and who, at last, becomes sober and rich, in a way from which the reader can derive no useful instruction. In "Count Fathom," there is still prevailing the same spirit of low adventure and chicanery. The count is a mere cheat and ruffian. "Sir Launcelot Greaves," with abundance of coarse, vulgar, and otherwise exceptionable scenes, is the most moral and instructive of all Smollet's works. It is, however, a very lame imitation of Cervantes.

As to the usefulness of these several performances, we must consider, that the tendency of a book of this kind does not consist so much in the good or bad, the prosperous or adverse nature, the loftiness or lowness of the incidents and characters, but in the light in which the author places all these; the inferences which his contrivance and arrangement naturally suggest. How differently will the same story be told by a pure and a profligate narrator? How will the same event inculcate opposite lessons, according to the light in which different hands exhibit it? Without entering into metaphysical inquiries into the "why" and the "wherefore," it is evident, that the tendency of fictitious narrations, and, in truth, of narratives of all kinds, depends upon the judgment, the taste, and the views of the narrator.

Smollet's wit and genius were considerable, but his moral discernment was far from being unexceptionable, and his taste far from being pure. He apparently delights in vulgar and profligate company, and of simple and sublime virtue he knows nothing. "The impulses of sentiment," "a thoughtless generosity," seem to be the height of his ken. The plain, sober, uniform excellence of reason or religion, are not to be looked for in his volumes.

Fielding is coarse, vulgar, and indelicate; recruiting officers, courtezans, sharpers, and adventurers, are too much the company to his liking. An ale-house kitchen, the humours of a landlady and chambermaid, are the scenes most congenial to his experience and taste. The pure and the sound mind will extract wisdom from every thing, and Fielding and Smollet will ever be valued by judicious readers, for their wit, their strong and vivid portraits of human characters, and the testimony which their ingenious narrations, with more or less energy, afford to the beauty and the usefulness of virtue: but the approbation which, with regard to them, will be qualified and moderate, will soar into something like rapture, at the pathetic and varied eloquence, the moral grandeur and sublimity of Richardson. In him, they will behold the opposite extremes of vice and virtue depicted with equal energy; the tenants of the cottage and the palace, the convent and the brothel, portrayed with equal truth; and the human character copiously and vividly painted, as it is modified by the differences of sex, rank, age, fortune, religion, and country. What chiefly provokes their wonder is, that he, who can descend so low, can, by turns, ascend so high; can realize, with equal exactness and force, the feelings of greatness and meanness; of riches and poverty; of humility and arrogance; of man and woman; of servant and master; and of vice and virtue.

If, by some strange alternative, the existence of the works of Richardson should become incompatible with that of the productions of all other moralists and inventors, I should not hesitate to say—"Let Richardson remain, though all others perish."

And now, with a full knowledge of all the ridicule and pity, which such a declaration must draw upon me, I conclude with begging your excuse, and craving a place for

INTERESTING TRAVELS

IN AMERICA.

TRANSLATED FROM THE GERMAN OF BULOW.

CHAP. XIX.

Continuation....No system of national education....Improvements of the land are not effected....Emigrations from Europe are not encouraged.

THE congress has not, hitherto, concerned itself at all about a system of national education. It has left this subject entirely to the state legislatures, who have likewise effected very little to this purpose. Pennsylvania has indeed made a law, that a public library should be formed, in the principal town of every county, from which the inhabitants of the district might borrow books, without cost, and a public teacher be appointed and paid by the state; but I never met either with the teacher or the library in the county towns. Probably there was a want of funds, or else the law was forgotten. Ten years ago, an university for the Germans, called Franklin college, was established, by law, in the city of Lancaster. Of this university, there is nothing extant: absolutely nothing, but the letters of the law, and the paper upon which it is printed. Such is the case with most good things in America; it is barely ideal; the execution is altogether wanting. So it is with the new cities to be built, with the canals, and public roads. Such improvements of the country are always attempted to be effected by lotteries, which are adapted to the speculating spirit of the nation, and support it: for fifteen or twenty per cent are deducted from the prizes, and this deduction supplies the fund for the undertaking. It is not, however, always sufficient, for the dearth, of which I have already mentioned the causes, increases every month. Hence nothing is completed. The canal between the Susquehanna and the Schuylkill is not even begun; though it has been published in Germany as already completed. Upon the canal between the Schuylkill and the Delaware, a little digging has been done; but it is now again neglected: meanwhile the canal lotteries have had their course. It seems as if the only object of all such plans were to raise lotteries, and yet Pennsylvania is quite distinguished among her sister states in this respect. A turnpike road has likewise been completed from Philadelphia to Lancaster, 66 miles long. It is the only one in North America. But I return to the education of the people.

The youth grow up in stupidity, and unbounded licentiousness. A proper education would be best calculated to counteract the evil habits of the people; the mean selfishness, the drunkenness, the adulteries, the cheats, the thefts, the brawling, the harlotry, the perjuries, &c. all which, as Americans themselves complain, are spreading more and more in the cities, and through the country. In free countries, the people should be more polished, more moral, and better informed, than elsewhere; because they possess more rights, which they must learn to maintain, and not to misuse. In America, generally speaking, neither body nor mind is cultivated; the youth are suffered to vegetate on, until they have grown tall enough to marry; at which time they beget children like themselves, and then sink down amidst material employments and material pleasures, with utter indolence, into the slumbers of death, which come on earlier than in Europe. In respect to education, however, the New-Englanders distinguish themselves advantageously among their fellow-citizens.

Washington, in his speech on the seventh of December, 1796, at the opening of the session, urgently recommended to congress the erection of a national university, and of a military academy, in order, by a homogeneous education, to render the young people from all parts of the union more homogeneous with one another; a measure alone calculated to strengthen the union of the states. It is to be doubted whether the congress will put into effect the proposal of this enlightened statesman.

The emigration from Europe has not been in the smallest degree encouraged by the federal government. What a progress might the cultivation and clearing of the country have made, if it had been? How much would the mass of raw productions, and, of course, the articles of exportation, have been increased! how rapidly would the climate have improved! For it may be believed, that during the last eight years, the vices and follies of Europe would perhaps have driven two millions of laborious Europeans to America, if the passage, for which the American captains exact such enormous sums, had been provided for them gratis, by hiring ships for that special purpose; if land, cattle, instruments of agriculture, and seed had been distributed to them gratis; if certain years of exemption had been allowed them, after the expiration of which they should have paid to the public a contribution in kind, raised upon their lands, and invariably fixed. The nation would thus have been repaid richly, and with interest, all the sums expended upon these inland colonies. The climate and soil would have been ennobled, if I may so express myself, by this general culture. The nation would have gained immensely in political importance and stability by this increased population. There are not only to the westward of the Alleghany mountains, lands more than enough for the reception of these foreigners, but there are likewise in those mountains themselves fruitful vallies yet uninhabited, and towards the north-west, a region, the cultivation of which would immediately improve the climate, are extensive and fruitful forest lands. Among these new-comers, those, who were related or acquainted with each other, or had come from the same country, should have been settled together, and the families of every division should have been obliged to settle close to one another, with their lands bordering upon each other, whereby the disadvantages of insulated situations, for which Europeans are not proper, and the attacks of the Indians, would have been provided against. The emigrations, however, only of families, or at least of married people, should have been encouraged, and all possible care taken to keep off vagabonds. The American government gives no encouragement to emigration; and, in particular, views with no favouring eye the settlement of Frenchmen in the westerly regions; probably from the fear that the uneasy spirit of that nation might inspire projects of independence: especially as the land on the Mississippi and Ohio formerly belonged to France, under the name of Louisiana. If, however, the government has some reason to see with reluctance the migration of Frenchmen, it should still have encouraged, in the manner above described, that of Germans, and the other northern nations of Englishmen and Scotsmen; but not that of the lowest class of Irishmen.

CHAP. XX.

Continuation....No gratuitous administration of Justice....Post-office....The government endeavours to procure itself partizans by the distribution of numerous offices....Servile imitation of European usages....The diminution of the National Debt still uncertain....Bank-note system.

It would have been certainly pleasing to have seen in the world one enlightened government, which should have made the administration of justice gratuitous; which should have paid the judges liberally, but without allowing them to draw an income from lawsuits; where every one should be obliged to plead his own cause, and thereby the tribe of lawyers forever extirpated. The federal government did not chuse to assume such a character, and left every thing altogether upon the old footing.

A free circulation of letters, books, newspapers, &c. at the expense of the government would have been a novel institution, extremely important to trade, and to the circulation of knowledge. The American government established a post-office; but it was for the purpose of drawing revenue from it, and of having offices to distribute. It seems as if generally the government sought to procure dependence, by the means of impost, excise, and post-office offices. The rate of postage is enormous.

Some time ago, letters might be sent by the stage-coaches, which could require no pay for the carriage of them, or of newspapers. This is now forbidden, so that the revenues of the post-office may not be reduced; all which is in imitation of European establishments, when the Europeans themselves begin to view with disgust their errors hitherto. The Americans will always follow, though at a distance, the example of the Europeans.

The payment of the national debt has not yet been at all attempted, under the federal government, for Mr. Gallatin maintained in the house of representatives, of congress, in the session of 1796, that during the eight years of its existence, six millions of dollars of new debt had been contracted. It was determined to inquire into this, in the session of 1797. It is remarkable that a fact like this should not be ascertained, in a republic, where the national accounts are published. But the reduction of the public debt is far less than its augmentation, in the spirit of this government, and of the funding system, which it has adopted; for, according to the greatness of the debt, the number of creditors increases, and it becomes their interest to support the system and the government, under whose protection it was established. Thus, the number of its dependents increases with the greatness of its debt.

The congress has left the laws as it found them. It will be said, that to regenerate these was the duty of the state legislatures; but the congress has not even proposed to them any improvements. It has, however, intended to introduce a general rule of proceeding with respect to bankruptcy, which it expressed in a very extraordinary way, "an uniform system of bankruptcy." But perhaps it was found best to leave the thing as it was, for every thing still remains upon the old footing. To grow rich rapidly, bankruptcy is the most effectual mode, for in America credit is easily obtained. A man consorts with another scoundrel, who shares with him half the plunder, to make over to him all his estate, by means of a judgment bond. This is a judicial instrument, which entitles its holder to payment before all other creditors. It is, in some sort, a first hypothecation. Hereupon a bankruptcy ensues; the bankrupt goes to jail; swears that he does not possess five pounds property; is discharged; and then all is paid, and the Americans declare such a man to be a d—d clever fellow. The two scoundrels divide the plunder between them, and from that time their circumstances begin to flourish. It often happens, however, that the holder of the judgment bond, contrary to the agreement, keeps the whole to himself. This happened during my residence in Philadelphia. But then he is held in abhorrence by all the honourable bankrupts and false swearers, and is no longer trusted. The Americans must have a sympathetic feeling for bankrupts, for they often give them the preference at elections. "He is," say they, "an unfortunate gentleman, and must have a lucrative office, &c."

Upon all these enormities the congress has hitherto laid no restraint. An abolition of all credit, so that the laws should give no security to property, consisting in debts, would perhaps every where, and especially in America, be useful; it would empty the prisons of debtors. In fine, every state has its different laws. In New-Jersey, certain crimes are punished with hanging; in Pennsylvania not. Those, who wish to fight a duel, go from Philadelphia into Jersey, that is, they cross the river. All this is gothic anarchy. The assertion that different climates require different laws, should generally be applied only to the extremes of climate. The United States are, in this respect, not so distant from one another as to require totally different laws. With respect to slavery in the southern states, congress has done nothing at all.

MISCELLANY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

AN AUTHOR'S EVENINGS.

FROM THE SHOP OF MESSRS. COLON AND SPONDEE.

THE ensuing criticism upon JUNIUS, that legitimate English classic, as he is justly styled in the "Pursuits of Literature," will be diligently perused by men of literary research, when they are apprized, that it is the production of one of the first classical scholars of the age, and that it has the double merit of being both just and new.

When thousands are in search of fame, and desirous to attain it by the hardest exertions, it seems wonderful, that any writer, whose works have received unbounded applause, should choose to let his name continue in the darkest obscurity.... Other reasons, and not the contempt of fame, must have prevented him from claiming the glittering prize. Fear of resentment from the persons, whom he may have censured, or a change in the sentiments, which he may have advanced with rash confidence, must be the real causes for his preference of concealment to glory. "I am the sole depositary of my own secret," says Junius; but, unless death has sealed it up for ever, it may be expected that the secret will burst the bars of its sepulchre, when the danger of its escape shall be removed by time.

But the writings of Junius afford, at this period, more matter of contemplation to the man of taste and literature, than to the politician. More Attic than Cicero, more florid than Demosthenes, he has reached the desirable point of excellence, where the correct stops short of the jejune, and the ornamented shuns the affected, the diffuse, and the declamatory.

No writings, on political subjects, are to be found in the English language comparable, in elegance of style and composition, to the letters of Junius. Bolingbroke was incorrect and unequal. He has, indeed, many spirited passages in his Patriot King, and some which bear a resemblance to Junius, but which do not equal him. His stream rolls not like a majestic river, with undiminished magnificence, but tumbles on like a temporary torrent, rushing over fragments of rocks and stumps of trees, impeded by bushes, clogged with weeds, and often turbid with a muddy comixture.

The periodical papers, of the age of Bolingbroke, which attracted much attention, during the violence of party attachment, exhibit but few specimens of fine composition. I never found any passages extracted from the Craftsman, Cato's Letters, and the rest of that species, which could pretend to any remarkable elegance of style or manner. Many of them had force of expression, and subtilty of argument, but the best of them seem not to maintain a place among the English classics. They were not formed for duration. They may be compared to the puffs and tartlets of the pastry cook, which are only good immediately after they are drawn out of the oven; or to some kinds of perishable fruit, which are no sooner ripe than rotten, which must be eaten immediately, or given to the swine*.

Junius, indeed, when he writes on common subjects, writes like common men. He was one of those writers, whose genius is excited by the dignity of his subject, and rises adequately to the occasion. His preface is but of moderate excellence; his Philo-Junius, confessedly written by himself, would not have distinguished him from the herd; and his notes are worthy of little distinction.

On the disgrace of lord Mansfield, the duke of Grafton, the duke of Bedford, and sir William Draper, he has reared a column of fame, more durable and beautiful than brass or marble. Those exalted personages were unfortunate in the circumstance of being coeval with such a writer. The hand of Genius has disgraced their honours with a cross bar, which neither heraldry nor the mandate of a monarch can remove. The arrow, shot from such a bow, stuck in their sides, never to be extracted. Posterity will read their characters in the letters of Junius, when friendship and party shall be no longer able to wipe off the colours that have stained them. I enter not into the justice or injustice of his invectives. I believe them often unjust. I only remark, that as it was deemed the highest good fortune to an Achilles to be celebrated by a Homer, so it is the most deplorable fate of these gentlemen to have been stigmatized with infamy, by a Junius. The duke of Bedford might have purchased forbearance of Junius cheaply, at the price of half his enormous fortune, if Junius had been venal. Truth is, indeed, great, and will, in time, prevail; but where, our descendants will ask, are the beneficent actions, the noble achievements of these personages recorded, to counterbalance or invalidate the representations of Junius?

The letter to the king, though one of the finest compositions in the volumes, I cannot approve, because it was intended to add pungency to the thorns of a crown. Ministers and public persons, of all ranks, who are aiming at the rewards of ambition, under the pretence of patriotism, are fair objects of political satire; but a king of England is empowered, by the constitution, to act so little of himself, that the blame of transactions that pass under his name cannot, with justice, be imputed to his personal activity. The peculiar nature of the unfortunate illness, which has since afflicted the king, induces every man of common good nature to wish, that whatever may have corroded his breast with painful sensations, not absolutely unavoidable, had never been presented to his notice. The pen of Junius was like the steel of Felton. The knife of Margaret Nicholson was a straw to the weapon of Junius.

But, on this topic, I add no more. I designed to consider Junius only in a literary light. And though, in common with the nation, I admire his letters, as fine pieces of eloquence of that kind, which the ancient rhetoricians denominated the epidictic; though I consider him as the VERY FIRST OF OUR ENGLISH CLASSICS; though I admire his terse language, his keen wit, his polished satire; yet I regret that he did not exercise his talent on subjects of universal and everlasting concernment, on morals, on letters, on history. He might have produced works, which would not only have charmed, but improved, an admiring nation. But Sybil-line pages, on temporary politics, seldom have survived their authors to any distant period.... Great and important as the men and actions of the present day appear to the present generation, they will not appear great to posterity, who will have their own heroes of their own day, to form the transient pageants of the hour. The genius of Junius, and nothing but such a genius could do it, will embalm the more trifling topics of his letters, as straws and flies are preserved in amber. But they will be retained rather in the cabinets of the curious, than diffused among the world at large. Whereas, a work of general utility, such as must interest human nature, in all times and circumstances, adorned with the graces, which he was able to bestow, would have been cherished by mankind with affection and regard, which has preserv-ved to this hour the authors of the age of Pericles and Augustus.

I am so pleased with COWLEY's easy prose, that from a liberal sentiment of regard for his genius in general, I sometimes look into his poetry, and here and there find a short poem, or a few lines, with which not only my judgment is satisfied, but my fancy is amused. I avoid his "Mistress," as the most frigid creature, that ever the muse embodied. I skip over his "Dauides," as a rumbling epic, if possible, more grating to the ear, than the "scrammel pipe" of the noisy Blackmore. As I abhor metaphysics in any mode, his metaphysical lays are not calculated to sooth me, and the fantastic flutter of his Pindaric hoyden excites as little complacency, as the affected gaiety of a hobbling old maid. Of his tedious verse, descriptive of the properties of plants, not even Linnæus would scan a line; and to the loves of "Constantia and Philetus," the most sentimental of modern misses would not devote the most languid of her summer hours. But I have not often perused a more lively copy of the festal pleasures of a merry Greek, than in the "Anacreontics," and few of the moderns, who, either drunk or sober, have attempted to carol the praises of love and wine, have sung so cheerily, as Cowley, in these airy odes. Another performance remains to be favourably excepted, from the above mass of censure. I allude to the "Chronicle," in which the poet, as in a sort of calendar, registers the vicissitudes of his love, and, like a grave historian, composes the annals of the various empresses, who, in succession, mildly governed, or haughtily swayed, a susceptible and fickle heart. Of this bewitching performance, all encomium is superseded by the elegant panegyric from the pen of JOHNSON, who has invested this lovely child of a poet's fancy with the richest brocade, and ushers the darling into the drawing-room of taste, with the eager partiality of a fond friend, and the polished phrase of an accomplished courtier.

"The Chronicle is a composition unrivalled and alone: Such gaiety of fancy, such facility of expression, such varied similitude, such a succession of images, and such a dance of words, it is vain to expect, except from Cowley. His strength always appears, in his agility; his volatility is not the flutter of a light, but the bound of an elastic mind. His levity never leaves his learning behind it; the moralist, the politician, and the critic, mingle their influence even in this airy frolic of genius. To such a performance, Suckling could have brought the gaiety, but not the knowledge; Dryden could have supplied the knowledge, but not the gaiety."

THE CHRONICLE,
A BALLAD.

Margarita first possess'd,
If I remember well, my breast,
Margarita first of all;
But when awhile the wanton maid
With my restless heart had play'd,
Martha took the flying ball.

Martha soon did it resign,
To the beauteous Catharine;
Beauteous Catharine gave place,
Though loth and angry she to part
With the possession of my heart,
To Eliza's conquering face.

Eliza till this hour might reign,
Had she not evil counsils ta'en;
Fundamental laws she broke,
And still new favourites she chose,
Till up in arms my passions rose,
And cast away her yoke.

Mary, then, and gentle Ann,
Both to reign at once began;
Alternately they sway'd,
And sometimes Mary was the fair,
And sometimes Ann the crown did wear,
And sometimes both I obeyed.

Another Mary then arose,
And did rigorous laws impose,
A mighty tyrant she!
Long, alas! should I have been Under that iron scepter'd queen,
Had not Rebecca set me free.

When fair Rebecca set me free,
'Twas then a golden time with me:
But soon these pleasures fled;
For the gracious princess died,
In her Youth and Beauty's pride.
And Judith reigned in her stead.

One month, three days, and half an hour,
Judith held the sovereign power,
Wondrous beautiful her face,
But so weak and small her wit,
That she to govern was unfit,
And so Susannah took her place.

But, when Isabella came,
Arm'd with a resistless flame,
And the artillery of her eye,
While she proudly march'd about,
Greater conquests to find out,
She beat out Susan, by the bye.

But, in her place, I then obey'd
Black-eyed Bess, her wiceroi maid,
To whom ensued a vacancy.
Thousand worse passions then possess'd
The interregnum of my breast.
Bless me from such anarchy!

Gentle Henrietta then,
And a third Mary next began:
Then Joan, and Jane, and Audria,
And the pretty Thomasine,
And then another Catharine,
And then a long et cetera.

But should I now to you relate
The strength and riches of their state,
The powder, patches, and the pins,
The ribbands, jewels, and the rings,
The lace, the paint, and warlike things,
That make up all their magazines:

If I should tell the politic arts,
To take and keep men's hearts;
The letters, embassies, and spies,
The frowns, and smiles, and flatteries,
The quarrels, tears, and perjuries,
Numberless, nameless mysteries;

And all the little lime twigs laid,
By Machiavel...the waiting-maid,
I more voluminous should grow,
Chiefly if I, like them, should tell
All change of weathers that befel,
Than Hollingshed, or Stow.

But I will briefly with them be,
Since few of them were long with me.
A higher and a nobler strain
My present empress does claim,
Fairest Ellen, first of the name,
Whom God grant long to reign!

Some of the most momentous events in history have sprung from sources trivial or mean; and for some of the most splendid achievements in literature, we are indebted to accidental associations. The soothing vespers of a Franciscan friar, heard amid Roman ruins, excited in the mind of GIBBON a wish to frame the history of the decline and fall of that empire. His description of the first idea of that performance, and of the tumultuous emotion of delight, experienced by an author, when his "task is smoothly done," will be understood and relished by the ethereal few.

It was at Rome, on the 15th of October, 1764, as I sat musing amid the ruins of the capitol, while the bare footed fryars were singing vespers in the Temple of Jupiter, that the idea of writing the decline and fall of the city first started to my mind.

I have presumed to mark the moment of conception of my history; I shall now commemorate • Milton's Comus.

the hour of my final deliverance. It was on the day, or rather night, of the 27th June, 1787, between the hours of eleven and twelve, that I wrote the last lines of the last page, in a summer-house in my garden. After laying down my pen, I took several turns in a berceau, or covered walk of acacias, which commands a prospect of the country, the lake, and the mountains. The air was temperate, the sky was serene, the silver orb of the moon was reflected from the waters, and all nature was silent. I will not dissemble the first emotions of joy, on the recovery of my freedom, and, perhaps, the establishment of my fame. But my pride was soon humbled, and a sober melancholy was spread over my mind, by the idea that I had taken an everlasting leave of an old and agreeable companion, and that whatsoever might be the future date of my history, the life of the historian must be short and precarious.

A DRAWING-ROOM BEAU.

HAVING some time figured in this envied character, I shall, for the benefit of future candidates, detail the qualifications necessary to acquire and support it.

Procure your coats of Watson, hat of Tiffin, and boots of Bedford. Let no occupation interfere with your morning visits. Be seen seldom in the company of men; often as possible with fashionable females; and pass no lady of your acquaintance in the streets, without joining her, however urgent your other business. Never smoke! and shun convivial associations, for if you are once known to belong to a club, all character in the drawing-room is gone forever, had you the qualities of a If nature has given you a tolerable memory, employ it in retaining accurately the figures of the various dances in use. This last is a certain way of rising into consequence, and, if pursued with assiduity and perseverance, will, in the course of a few years, lead to preferment, possibly to the post of manager of the assemblies. If you be endowed with fancy and eloquence, descendant upon the weather, the shape of a coat, or figure of a fan: if stupid, declare it too d.....d troublesome to talk. Lounge in all companies, upon chairs and sophas; when spoken to, answer concisely, and with a careless shrug, and you will pass current for a wit: probatum est! But, should there be unfortunately a spice of literature in your composition, conceal it with the most extreme caution: I knew a first-rate beau degraded by a classical quotation, and have myself sunk into total disregard, by asking my friend Slender, just returned from a two days' visit to Rome, if he had seen the bagnios of Dioclesian and Antoninus Caracalla, or the sepulchre of Scipio Africanus! In a word, if you wish to shine, follow the rules I have prescribed, and industriously drive from your brain every lurking trace of those deadly enemies to distinction in the gay and fashionable circles, which are known by the terms information and common sense.

PLUME.

Miss Bingham, who was likewise presented by Mrs. King, wore a black crape petticoat, richly embroidered with black bugles and beads; body and train to correspond. Head dress, tiara of bugles, with diamonds and feathers.

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

White veils and straws of all shapes are general. The prevailing colours are lilac, blue, and yellow. Large hats give place to small round ones. Spanish cloaks, and scarfs of white or coloured muslin, are at present much worn. Feathers continue to be adopted in full dress.

The Philadelphia fashion at present is, in the words of Geoffry Gombado, to be gentle and agreeable. The heat of our climate compels both sexes to consult comfort, rather than splendor. Our nymphs, under the double influence of their own warmth, and that of the sun, are obliged to appear in Lacedemonian drapery; and our swains move languidly along, under the pressure of coatees, and hats of gossamour. Vulgar nankeen and filthy dowlas are in great request.

Our High-street loungers sport a hat of an enormous circumference. A small beau is so overshadowed by one of Tiffin's best, that his dimensions to any thick sight are invisible.

Otto of roses is the favourite perfume at Paris.

A London perfumer thus invites to partial purity:

White hands have ever been esteemed a personal beauty in both sexes, and in some parts of Europe are essential to persons of rank. The Bandana soap, or Indian washing cakes, possess the peculiar property of giving the most exquisite delicacy of texture, and inconceivable fairness to the hands, which are constantly washed with this soap only; and these effects are not produced too suddenly, as if by paint, but gradually, by correcting all the imperfections of the skin, and, when once produced, which they are certain to be by perseverance, they are permanent. Even in cases where the skin has been injured by labour or other violence, the hardness and coarseness are effectually, infallibly, and permanently removed, and succeeded by smoothness, fairness, and delicacy of appearance, which cannot be acquired by any other means whatever. To people of fashion, and others, who have not injured the texture of their skin, the superior excellence of the Bandana soap will be evident after the first time of using it.

From the number of young nudes, whom we daily see, we might suppose that parents had revived the old barbarous custom of exposing their children.

A London wag avers, the high winds of March were very searching, but the transparent style of female dress left few charms to discover.

A British mechanic notifies brides, that he fits up bedsteads on a new principle.

POLITICS.

[We are glad to have an early opportunity to give a liberal analysis of Mr. WINDHAM's sentiments, respecting an insidious, hypocritical, and short-lived peace. We the more cheerfully publish every thing, which can reflect honour on this great statesman, because he is a shining pupil of that school, whose politics, weighed in the balance of Experience, have never proved wanting. If BURKE and WINDHAM be erroneous, then is this

"PILYAR'D firmament rottenness,
And Earth's base built on stubble."]

Review of the Speech of the Right Honourable William Windham, delivered in the House of Commons, November 4, 1801, on the Report of an Address to the Throne, approving of the Preliminaries of Peace with the Republic of France.

MR. WINDHAM began his speech, which displays the spirit, the temper, and the wisdom of a true statesman, of a genuine patriot who loves his country and understands her real interests, with lamenting what appeared to him the probable consequences of the preliminary treaty of peace. He considers the substance of the arguments advanced by ministers and their supporters to be this—that France has the power of destroying us, but they hope she will not have the inclination. He then, very naturally, bursts out into the following exclamation: "That I should have lived to see the day, when such arguments could be used in a British house of commons!—that I should have lived to see a house of commons, where such arguments could be heard with patience, and even with complacency!" Mr. W. collects, from the speeches on the other side, that ministers reject the supposition of any actual necessity to make peace, but that they make it in order to anticipate such necessity; and thence he contends, that we have acted as Menou acted at Alexandria, and are, consequently, like him, conquered! for, he adds, "I know not what other definition we want of being conquered, than that a country can say to us, 'We can hold out, and you cannot; make peace, or we will ruin you; and that you, in consequence, make peace upon terms which must render a renewal of hostilities, under any provocation, more certainly fatal than a continuation of that war, which you already declare yourselves unable to bear.'"

The idea of making the conclusion of peace a mere question of arithmetical calculation, and so regulating the most important concerns of a great empire, by the narrow contracted notions of a counting-house, is most pointedly and successfully ridiculed. Mr. W. readily admits that if the mere pecuniary value of the territory actually conceded to us by the peace, or of that to be acquired by a continuation of the war, were to constitute the only ground of consideration, the peace would have his approbation; but, he truly states, that a statesman ought also to consider "the effect which peace, made in such and such circumstances, is likely to have on the character and estimation of the country; a species of possession, which, though neither tangible nor visible, is as much a part of national strength, and has as real a value, as any thing that can be turned into pounds and shillings, that can be told by the score or hundred, or weighed out in averduoise." This language, no doubt, sounded oddly to the frigid calculators of revenue and expense, but it will be perfectly intelligible to statesmen and politicians, properly so called. As to the estimation of the country in the minds of foreign powers, we have heard that a nobleman of great information and talents, who has recently returned from the continent, reports, that before the peace they feared us, and since the peace they despise us. The subsequent remarks on the value of national honour are excellent: these are strengthened by the authority of Mr. Fox and of Junius; the latter of whom, speaking of the business of the Falkland Islands, said "To depart, in the minutest article, from the nicety and strictness of punctilio, is as dangerous to national honour, as it is to female virtue. The woman who admits of one familiarity seldom knows where to stop, or what to refuse; and, when the councils of a great country give way in a single instance, when they are once inclined to submission, every step accelerates the rapidity of their descent." When it is considered that such was the language used by a writer who courted the favour of the people; and contrast it with the arguments now employed for the same purpose, what a lamentable inference must be drawn from the comparison! If France can appreciate such a state of things, we are, indeed, a conquered people!

In the next branch of his argument, Mr. W. examines whether we are left in a better situation by the peace, than we should have been placed in by a continuation of the war; and for this purpose he takes a view of the terms of peace.

"The description of these is simple and easy: France gives nothing, and, excepting Trinidad and Ceylon, England gives every thing. If it were of any consequence to state what in diplomatic language was the basis of this treaty, we must say, that it had no one basis; but that it was the status quo, on the part of England, with the two exceptions in its favour, of Ceylon and Trinidad; and the uti possidetis, with the addition of all the other English conquests, on the part of France. But what may be the technical description of the treaty, is, comparatively, of little importance. It is the result that is material, and the extent of power and territory, now, by whatever means, actually remaining in the hands of France. The enumeration of this, liable indeed in part to be disputed, but upon the whole sufficiently correct, may be made as follows:

"In Europe—France possesses the whole of the continent, with the exception of Russia and Austria. If it be said that parts of Germany, and the Northern courts of Denmark and Sweden are not fairly described as being immediately under the controul of France, we must balance this consideration by remarking the influence which France possesses in these governments, and the commanding position which she occupies with respect to Austria, by the possession of Switzerland and Mantua, and those countries which have been considered always, and twice in the course of the present war, have proved to be, the direct inlet into the heart of her dominions.

"In Asia—Pondicherry, Mahé, Cochín, Negapatam, the Spice islands.

"In Africa—the Cape of Good Hope, Goree, Senegal.

"In the sea that is inclosed by these three continents, which connects them all, and furnishes to us in many respects our best and surest communication with them—the Mediterranean—every port and post except Gibraltar, from one end of it to the other, including the impregnable and invaluable port of Malta; so as to exclude us from a sea, which it had ever before been the anxious policy of Great-Britain to keep in her hands—and to render it now, truly and properly, what it was once idly called, the Sea of France.

"In the West-Indies—St. Domingo, both the French and Spanish, Martinico, St. Lucie, Guadeloupe, Tobago, Curaçoa.

"In North-America—St. Pierre and Miquelon, with a right to the fisheries in the fullest extent to which they were ever claimed; Louisiana, (so it is supposed) a word dreadful to be pronounced, to all who consider the consequences with which that cession is pregnant, whether as it acts northward, by its effects upon the United States, or southward, as opening a direct passage into the Spanish settlements in America.

"In South-America—Surinam, Demerara, Berbice, Essequibo, taken by us and now ceded;—Guiana, and by the effect of the treaty fraudulently signed by France with Portugal, just before the signature of these preliminaries, a tract of country extending to the river Amazon, and giving to France the command of the entrance into that river.—Whether, by any secret article, the evils of this cession will prove to have been done away, time will discover. In fact, (be that as it may) France may be said to possess the whole of the Spanish and Portuguese settlements upon that continent. For who shall say, that she has not the command of those settlements, when she has the command of the countries to which they belong; cum custodit ipsos custodes? She has, in truth, whatever part of the continent of South-America she chooses to occupy; and as far as relates to the Spanish part, without even the necessity, a necessity that probably would not cost her much, of infringing any part of the present treaty.

"Such is the grand and comprehensive circle to which the New Roman Empire may be soon expected to spread, now that peace has removed all obstacles, and opened to her a safe and easy passage into the three remaining quarters of the globe.—Such is the power, which we are required to contemplate without dismay! under the shade of whose greatness we are invited to lie down with perfect tranquillity and composure! I should be glad to know, what our ancestors would have thought and felt in this situation? What those weak and deluded men, so inferior to the politicians of the present day, the Marlboroughs, the Godolphins, the Somers's, the king Williams, all those who viewed with such apprehension the power of Louis XIV. what they would say to a peace, which not only confirms to France the possession of nearly the whole of Europe, but extends her empire over every other part of the globe. Is there a man of them, who would not turn in his coffin, could he be sensible to a twentieth part of that which is passing, as perfect matter of course, in the politics of the present moment?

"But to all these mighty dangers we have, it seems, one great security to oppose; not that degrading and bastard security to which I have before adverted, and to which, I fear, I must again recur—that France is lassata, if not satiata; that having run down her prey, she will be content to spare it, and be willing for a while to leave us unmolested; but a rational, sober, well-founded security, applicable to the supposition that she may not be wanting in the will to hurt us, but will happily not possess the power. This great security, we are told, is our wealth. We are, it seems, so immensely rich, our prosperity stands on so sure and wide a basis, we have such a pyramid of gold, so beautifully constructed, and so firmly put together, that we may safely let in all the world to do their worst against it; they can never overturn it, and might spend ages in endeavouring to take it to pieces. We seem to consider our commercial prosperity, like those articles of property, timber, marble, and others of that sort, which, however valuable, may be safely left unguarded, being too weighty and bulky to be carried away.

"Sir, the first circumstance that strikes one in this statement, is, that odd inconsistency, by which a country that makes peace on account of its poverty, is to rest its whole hope of security in that peace, upon its wealth. If our wealth will protect us, it is a great pity that this discovery was not made long ago; it would have saved us many years of painful struggle; have kept in our hands a great additional portion of these very means of protection, and have lessened considerably the dangers against which such protection is wanted."

The succeeding pages are devoted to the establishment of this position, not more alarming than just;—"with its present feelings the country never can go to war again, let France do what she will"—and having proved this, Mr. W. adds—"Sir, are these idle dreams, the phantom of my own disordered imagination? or are they real and serious dangers, the existence of which no man of common sense, let his opinions of the peace be what they may, will attempt to deny? The utmost that any man will pretend to say, is, that he hopes (and so do I) that the evils apprehended will not happen; and that, great as the risk may be, he thinks it preferable to those risks which would attend a continuation of the war. None but the most weak or inconsiderate, if they are not disaffected, or absorbed in the sense of some immediate personal interest, will feel, when they shall well understand the subject, that there is any cause of joy or rejoicing." We believe, indeed, the delirium of joy is pretty well over, though the daily efforts of some persons, included in Mr. W.'s exceptions, are directed to produce its revival; and to stigmatize as audacious, as men actuated by *selfish, dark, malignant passions, all who presume to think with Mr. W. on the subject of peace, and not implicitly to subscribe to the infallibility of themselves and their employers. We have even been assured that a member of administration proposed to dismiss a gentleman from a public situation, the duties of which he had conscientiously discharged, to the universal satisfaction of all who have had an opportunity of observing his conduct; and, at a critical time, with much personal danger to himself, because he had dared to disapprove the peace, and support his opinions by fair argument. The proposition, however, is said to have been rejected with firmness, by the premier, who justly represented such a proceeding as highly oppressive in itself, and as subversive, in its effects, of the freedom of the press. His conduct certainly did him honour; though it was no more than a knowledge of his character would have led us to expect; for, however we may differ from him in opinion on the subject of the peace, we shall be ever ready to do justice to the amiable qualities of his heart and mind.

TO READERS AND CORRESPONDENTS.

WE hope "Daphnis" will excuse the insertion of "A Monody on" We cannot, indeed we cannot, bear this whimpering style. The voice of sincere grief will always command attention, and excite sympathy; but the drawling moan of mincing affectation raises no passion, but contempt. Yet, among our numerous fools, Daphnis may find an approving reader, and, in many an impartial paper, he will find a vacant corner for insipid verse.

For still, the Soul of Candour! I allow'd
These jingling elegies amused the crowd,
That patriot sits hung blubbing on each line,
That lady critics wept, and cried "divine!"
That love-lorn sheep reclin'd the pensive head,
And sentimental ensigns, as they read,
Wiped the sad drops of pity from their eye,
And burst between a hiccup and a sigh.

W. GIFFORD.

We hope that "JAQUES" will soon have a fit of poetical melancholy. So agreeable an associate we could wish to hear conversing in literary society, but that some of his "Reflections" might originate in "Solitude."

The unreasonable querulousness of "Zelinda" reminds the Editor of a passage, so picturesque and characteristic, that our peevish correspondent may, if she please, bring the picture home.

Anxious Melania rises to my view,
Who never thinks her lover pays his due;
Visit, present, treat, flatter, and adore;
Her majesty, to-morrow, calls for more.
His wounded ears complaints eternal fill,
As unloiled hinges, querulously shrill,

* Vide the Twin-brothers, the True Briton and San passion.

"You went last night with Celia to the ball."
 You prove it false. "Not go! that's worst of all."
 Nothing can please her, nothing not inflame,
 And arrant contradictions are the same.
 Her lover must be sad to please her spleen;
 His mirth is an inexpressible sin:
 For of all rials, that can pain her breast,
 There's one that wounds far deeper than the rest;
 To wreck her quiet, the most dreadful shelf
 Is, if her lover dares enjoy himself!

"A Militia Officer" is equally prodigal of his weak reasons and his strong passion, in behalf of his holiday soldiers.

And here all authors make a doubt
 Whether he is more wise, or stout;
 Some hold the one, and some the other;
 But, howsoever they make a pother,
 The difference is so small, his brain
 Outweighs his rage, but half a grain.

We are weary of receiving, and of burning wire-drawn poetry, upon frivolous topics. For epitaphs on cats or on kittens, for the toilsome intricacy of *rebus*es, or the obvious orthography of an acrostic, the copiousness of the English language does not afford a sufficient variety of degrading epithets to the Editor, to allow him to express half his contempt. The mechanical weavers of such flimsy stuff should arise from their little looms, and reflect upon a sensible passage from the modern Pope.

....."When the heaven-born muse
 Shames her descent, and for low earthly views,
 Hums on a beetle's bier the doleful stave,
 Or sits chief-mourner... at a May-bug's grave,
 Satire should scourge her from the vile employ,
 And bring her back to friendship, love, and joy."
 GIFFORD.

P. D. has laid aside his harp. We hope it does not hang upon the willows. Our frequent invitations to this writer are dictated by a sincere spirit. We respect his literary character, and relish his easy verse.

"Beatrice" will relieve the dreariness of politics, and animate the lethargy of our own compositions, by her fluent style, and sprightly wit. Her railery is always well mannered, and men are willing to be laughed at, by one, who excites merriment, by the ward of Good Humour.

At the sight of "An Elegy*," we cannot help shaking the head and looking glum. To the wailing author of these doleful strains, we must apply the caution of Horace to Albius Tibullus.

.....Ne dolas plus nimio memor
 Immitis Glycera, neu miserabiles, Decantes elegos.

The imitation of ANACREON is festive and poetical. The carousing poet, with his eye in a fine frenzy rolling, discerns many a jovial reveller.

....."Sub arcte
 Vite bibentem."

"Asmodeo" is looked for with a lover's impatience. He is sure of a kind reception. We are not insensible of his partiality to this paper, and we gratefully assure him, that he cannot address us too often.

A new correspondent in the Lounger, signed H. E. is heard, with the most respectful attention, in behalf of Richardson's novels. Of the Pamela of that author, we cannot be very vehement in our eulogy. To our careless eyes, Pamela has always appeared an insipid sort of a maiden; but many scenes and many characters in Clarissa and Sir Charles Grandison are boldly sketched, with the brightest pencil of Genius. Lovelace is a glaring, though noxious meteor; and, from the outrageous virtue of Miss Howe, even the most prim of Philadelphia pruders might learn new lessons of austerity.

"A Drawing-room Beau" is a humorous caricature, ably hit off, by some moral Gilray, who delights in tracing the distorted features of affectation. We shall always find room in the Port Folio for such pictures.

To the translator of Sketches from La Bruyere, both his author and the Editor are indebted. The first has, hitherto, been very lamely rendered, and the only translation, which we have seen, is one done into English, under the abused name of Nicholas Rowe, an author of the most soft and sprightly diction. We are pleased to perceive even a fragment of a version, by a gentleman, who not only understands the original critically, but is well versed in that knowledge of life and manners, which professor La Bruyere stipulates to teach.

MISCELLANEOUS PARAGRAPHS.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

THE following matrimonial event happened at Gosport:....A publican there was informed, that his daughter had lately set off to be married to one of the black cymbalists of the Wiltshire band, and that only a speedy interference could prevent their being married. The father pursued the couple, but arrived too late to prevent the union. Application being made to the officer, the bridegroom was confined some time, for being absent without leave, and the bride was conducted home, by the mother and constable. She attended to her father's door, where the mother led the van; the constable desired the bride to follow, but she so well timed her manners, by politely saying, "After you, sir," that she persuaded the constable to take precedence, while she took to her heels, and completely effected her escape. He, who wishes to be instructed in the morality of Kotzebue's drama, and of most French plays, will learn all that is necessary from the following.

They hold that our nature exists in its utmost purity among savages, and that civilization, and social intercourse are curses. Conformably to these ideas, subjection is servility, and authority tyranny; while liberty and independence are such infeasible rights, that even between a parent and a child, no such sentiments as authority and obedience should subsist. They say that the miseries of mankind do not proceed from divine sufferance, from general depravity, or from the fulfilment of the mysterious plans of Providence, but from the perverse oppression of the great, who delight in the miseries of their fellow-creatures.

Allured by the charm of antithesis, modern readers sit down to the perusal of the "Pitiable Adulteress," "The Noble Lie," "Generous Revenge," "Honest Thieves," "The Guiltless Parricide," "Errors of Virtue," "Amiable Indiscretions," "The Innocent Slanderer," "Delicate Anger," and a thousand other absurdities.

IN a catalogue of curious books, lately offered for sale in London, we perceive an Homer editio princeps, of 1448; an Apuleius, 1469; Cicero ad Atticum, 1470; Ciceronis Officia, 1466; Livius, 1470; Quintilian, 1470; Nepos, 1471; and Justin, 1470, all of the editio prin; together with Anacreon Brunckeri, Ovidius Burmanni, and a Combe's Horace, in the most magnificent style of typography. The Deux Ponts Greek classics. Variorum Classics, 122 vols. Russia binding. German editions of the classics, 203 vols. Virgilius Heynii, and the splendid Madrid edition of Don Quixotte.

Mr. Serjeant Best has lately been worsted in a pugilistic rencontre. The London punsters, who are always upon the look out for a good thing, declared that it was certainly degrading to a serjeant to receive a corporal chastisement.

The duke of Somerset presided at the last public dinner of the literary fund, which was attended by upwards of four hundred gentlemen. Catches and glees were sung after dinner, and messrs. Fitzgerald, Boscawen, and Birch, recited some fine pieces of original poetry. By the treasurer's report, it appears that this laudable institution prospers highly. Among the new subscribers are the duchess of Devonshire and earl Spencer.

ORIGINAL POETRY.

FOR THE PORT FOLIO.

FROM THE SHOP OF DACTYL AND COMMA,
 DEALERS IN ODES, POEMS, SONGS AND ELEGIES, POETS
 CORNER, NO. 2, CAMBRIDGE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE PORT FOLIO.

SIR,

Having opened a literary shop at this place, where (begging pardon of the Government of the College) there are few good judges of our commodities, we have consigned a package to your care, and if this sample please you, we shall be happy to deal farther with you.

We are, sir,
 Your most obedient, &c.

DACTYL AND COMMA.

SONG.

LET grave philosophers declaim
 Against our joys, and boldly blame
 The pleasures of the vine;
 Should Zeno's self, in glory bright,
 Upon this tipling world alight,
 And swear that drinking was not right,
 I still would love good wine.

Tho' amorous Damon should compose
 A sonnet to his mistress' nose,
 And make her all divine;
 Tho' every grace the maid adorn,
 Tho' pure as is the breath of morn,
 Tho' ripe as is the golden corn,
 I'd give her up for wine.

Although her cheeks should blooming glow,
 Though music from her lips should flow,
 With pleasure I'd resign
 The charming fair, nor would I prize
 The love that sparkles in her eyes;
 My roving fancy from her flies,
 'Tis drawn by generous wine.

Let others sing of other joys,
 The sportsman and the huntsman's noise,
 Or pleasures of the line.
 Let them describe, in numbers gay,
 The bliss of shooting on the spray,
 The lark, who ushers in the day,
 But let my theme be wine.

Come then, my friends, and cheerly stand,
 With each a bumper in his hand,
 Around the juice divine;
 Instead of toasting Daphne's face,
 Or Nimrod, first upon the chace,
 With fervid grasp your glass embrace.
 And toast the God of Wine.

* GOLDSMITH, who had a sovereign contempt for this dismal style of poetry, makes his good Vicar say, Deborah, my life, you know grief is dry; let us have a bottle of the best gooseberry wine to keep up our spirits. I have wept so much, at all sorts of elegies of late, that, without an enlivening glass, I am sure this will overcome me.

SELECTED POETRY.

[The muse of Cunningham has sung sweetly, and with no borrowed strain, in pastoral. He has, with rare felicity, blended sentiment with description, in one of the truest themes of poetry. The ensuing verses, it is believed, were never republished in any American miscellany. They combine moral thoughts, and varied imagery. The picture of the moon, in the sixth stanza, and of the "pendent poppies," in the sixteenth is very charming.]

THE CONTEMPLATIST,

A NIGHT PIECE.

"Nox erat.....
Cum tacet omnis ager, pecudes, pictæque volucres."

THE queen of contemplation, Night,
Begins her balmy reign;
Advancing in their varied light,
Her silver vested train.

'Tis strange the many marshall'd stars,
That ride yon sacred round,
Should keep, among their rapid cars,
A silence so profound.

A kind, a philosophic calm,
The cool creation wears,
And what day drank of dewy balm,
The gentle night repairs.

Behind their leafy curtains hid,
The feather'd race how still;
How quiet now the gamesome kid,
That gambol'd round the hill.

The sweets that bending o'er their banks,
From sultry day declin'd,
Revive, in little velvet ranks,
And scent the western wind.

The moon, preceded by the breeze,
That bade the clouds retire,
Appears among the tufted trees,
A phoenix nest on fire.

But soft....the golden glow subsides,
Her chariot mounts on high,
And now, in silver'd pomp, she rides
Pale regent of the sky.

Where Time upon the wither'd tree
Hath carv'd the moral chair,
I sit, from busy passions free,
And breathe the placid air,

The wither'd tree was once in prime,
Its branches brav'd the sky:
Thus, at the touch of ruthless time,
Shall youth and vigour die.

I'm lifted to the blue expanse,
It glows serenely gay,
Come, Science, by my side advance,
We'll search the milky way.

Let us descend... the daring flight
Fatigues my feeble mind,
And Science, in the maze of light,
Is impotent and blind.

What are those wild, those wand'ring fires,
That o'er the moorland ran?
Vapours....how like the vague desires,
That cheat the heart of man.

But there's a friendly guide, a flame,
That lambent o'er its bed,
Enlivens, with a gladsome beam,
The hermit's osier shed.

Among the russet shades of night,
It glances from afar,
And darts along the dusk, so bright,
It seems a silver star.

In coverts, where the few frequent,
If Virtue deigns to dwell,
'Tis thus, the little lamp, content,
Gives lustre to her cell.

How smooth the rapid river slides,
Progressive to the deep,
The poppies, pendent o'er its sides,
Have charm'd the waves to sleep.

Pleasure's intoxicated sons!
Ye indolent! ye gay!
Reflect....for, as the river runs,
Life wings its trackless way.

That branching grove of dusky green
Conceals the azure sky,
Save where a starry space between,
Relieves the darken'd eye.

Old Error thus, with shades impure,
Throws sacred Truth behind,
Yet, sometimes, through the deep obscure,
She bursts upon the mind.

Sleep and her sister Silence reign,
They lock the shepherd's fold,
But hark! I hear a lamb complain,
'Tis lost upon the wold.

To savage herds, that hunt for prey,
An unresisting prize;
For having trod a devious way,
The little Rambler dies.

As luckless is the virgin's lot,
Whom Pleasure once misguides,
When hurried from the halcyon cot,
Where Innocence presides.

The passions, a relentless train,
To tear the victim run,
She seeks the paths of peace in vain,
Is conquer'd and undone.

How bright the little insects blaze,
Where willows shade the way,
As proud as if their painted rays
Could emulate the day!

'Tis thus the pigmy sons of power
Advance their vain parade;
Thus glitter in the darken'd hour,
And like the glow-worms fade.

The soft serenity of night
Ungentle clouds deform;
The silver host, that shone so bright,
Is hid behind a storm.

The angry elements engage!
An oak, an ivied bow'r,
Repels the rough wind's noisy rage,
And shields me from the shower.

The rancour thus of rushing Fate
I've learnt to render vain:
For whilst Integrity's her seat,
The soul will sit serene.

A raven, from some greedy vault,
Amid that cloister'd gloom,
Bids me, and 'tis a solemn thought!
Reflect upon the tomb.

The tomb, the consecrated dome,
The temple, rais'd to Peace,
The port, that in a friendly home,
Receives the human race.

Yon village, to the moral mind,
A solemn aspect wears;
Where sleep hath lull'd the labour'd hind,
And kill'd his daily cares.

'Tis but the church-yard of the night,
An emblematic bed,
That offers, to the mental sight,
The temporary dead.

From hence I'll penetrate in thought,
The grave's unmeasur'd deep,
And tutor'd hence, be timely taught,
To meet my final sleep.

'Tis peace....the little chaos past,
The gracious moon restor'd,
A breeze succeeds the frightful blast,
That through the forest roar'd.

The nightingale, a welcome guest,
Renews her gentle strains;
And Hope, just wand'ring from my breast,
Her wonted seat regains.

Yes, when yon lucid orb is dark,
And darting from on high,
My soul, a more celestial spark,
Shall keep her native sky.

Fann'd by the light, the lenient breeze,
My limbs refreshment find,
And moral rhapsodies, like these,
GIVE VIGOUR to the MIND.

LINES

ADDRESSED TO A SLANDERED FAIR-ONE.

[If the voice of soothing poetry can charm away the canker of the heart, she, who has been unjustly slandered, may find relief in the following.]

Why should you, lov'd Sensible, should you be pale,
The portrait of grief you appear;
You look like yon lilly, that droops in the vale,
With my lips let me dry up that tear.

Disdain a reply to Malignity's tongue,
Let patience to clamour submit;
It is better that Slander should say you were wrong,
Than that you the wrong should commit.

The atheist, if really such madmen exist,
Belief will delirious decry,
In infidel doubtings pretend to persist,
What they cannot conceive, they deny

Thus some of your sex, old and ugly, will rail,
Like atheists all goodness they doubt,
Insist that all rakes may o'er beauty prevail,
Because themselves could not hold out.

You must pardon the cry, think not strange what
I say,
They mercy from you must receive,
Be it known to your tenderness, 'tis the world's way,
Who injure, will never forgive.

Smile, smile, and smile on, let day beam on your
